

BIBLIOTHECA

REGIA MONACHENSIS.

20
Brit. 92^m Selection

<36613933150015

<36613933150015

Bayer. Staatsbibliothek

G,

2 Brit. 92 m-4

SECTION

REPORTS AND PAPERS

OF THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Vol. 1

SELECTION
OF REPORTS AND PAPERS
OF THE
HOUSE OF COMMONS.

VOL. 4.
Education.

1836.

SECTION

OF

REPORTS AND PAPERS

OF THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Vol. A

February

1881

Contents of Vol. 4.

Ms. Paging

13. Third Report of the Commissioners on Education
in Ireland (1826) ————— 1

89. Fourth Report of the Commissioners on Education
in Ireland (1827) ————— 137

441 Fifth Report of the Commissioners on Education
in Ireland (1827) ————— 359

442 Sixth Report of the Commissioners on Education
in Ireland (1827) ————— 387

443 Seventh Report of the Commissioners on Education
in Ireland (1827) ————— 503

509 Eighth Report of the Commissioners on Education
in Ireland (1827) ————— 539

Md. paying

510. Ninth Report of the Commissioners on Education
in Ireland 1827 ————— 1001

341. Report from Select Committee on Education in Ireland Reports (1828) ————— 1147

70. Report of the Commissioners on Funds granted for Education in Ireland (1834) — 1155

THIRD REPORT

OF THE

COMMISSIONERS

OF

Irish Education Inquiry.

Dated Dublin, 16th September 1826.

Presented by His Majesty's Command to both Houses of Parliament.

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be Printed,
28 November 1826.

THE REPORT

OF THE

COMMISSIONERS

THE REPORT - - - - - p. 1.

THE APPENDIX - - - - - 16.

Irish Education Inquiry.

Dated Dublin, 16th September 1850.

Presented by His Majesty's Command to both Houses of Parliament.

Ordered by The House of Commons, to be Printed.

LONDON: Printed by W. Clowes and Sons, 7, St. Paul's Church-yard, 1850.

3

THIRD REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS

THIRD REPORT

OF
THE COMMISSIONERS

OF
IRISH EDUCATION INQUIRY.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY :

WE, the undersigned Commissioners nominated and appointed by a Commission under the Great Seal, bearing date the Fourteenth day of June one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, humbly beg leave further to report as follows :

THE FOUNDLING HOSPITAL of Dublin was established in the year 1704, and was originally intended for the confinement and correction of vagrants as well as for the maintenance and education of deserted children. In consequence of an Act passed in the year 1776, it appears finally to have assumed the character which its name imports. The usual practice in the hospital has been, to receive foundling infants from all parts of Ireland, and to place them as speedily as possible under the care of nurses in the country, with whom they remain until they attain the age of seven or eight years. After this period, they are again brought back to the hospital, and are there maintained and instructed until they arrive at the age for apprenticeship.

Education of the Lower Classes.

The objects of the Institution may therefore be considered as twofold—the preservation of the lives of foundlings, and their education in such a manner as to render them useful members of society. The difficulties which attend any undertaking of this kind will be found far greater than might be expected by those who have not had experience on the subject. It is evidently the design of Providence that the infancy of children should be superintended by their parents, and a great departure from this principle (however unavoidable it must be with respect to foundlings) will be attended by circumstances of an untoward and perplexing nature.

We make this observation not for the purpose of depreciating the utility of such an institution, but to impress the importance of confining its extent as much as possible within the limits of the necessity in which it originates; and that its operations should be as nearly as possible assimilated to that system for which the vices of society have rendered it, though sometimes, perhaps, a necessary, at best an imperfect substitute.

At no period since its commencement have the results realized in the Foundling Hospital of Dublin been fully satisfactory to those concerned in its management, though hopes have been at all times entertained, with greater or less confidence, that at some future time essential amelioration would be effected; considerable improvements have from time to time been made, but never to such an extent as the benevolent views of the individuals who have laboured for their accomplishment may have led them to anticipate.

The year 1797 forms a remarkable æra in the history of this Institution. The abuses which at that time appeared to prevail in the management of some of its departments, became so great as forcibly to attract the attention of the Irish Parliament; its constitution was in consequence wholly changed; about two hundred persons of the first rank and character in the country had previously been governors and managers of the Institution; persons incapable of assenting for a moment to the existence of the abuses which prevailed, but who afforded in this instance, as in the history of other institutions, a strong proof, that the number and high station of the individuals to whom the management of a great public establishment is nominally committed, too often produce, from the division of responsibility, and the imposition of a duty which it is well understood they are none of them practically expected to perform, a greater licence for the malversation of inferior officers who are supposed to be under their control.

Amongst these abuses the most prominent was the mismanagement of the children in their earliest infancy; great negligence and inhumanity were found to mark the conduct of the women employed in carrying children to the hospital, from remote parts of the country; many died upon the road, others almost immediately after arriving within the walls of the Institution, and the neglect in the medical department of the hospital towards the children who survived the hardships of the journey, was a still more serious subject for reprehension.

After the lapse of time which has since taken place, we do not feel it necessary to recapitulate the painful detail of facts then brought to light, and which may be found in the Journals of the Irish House of Commons of the year 1797.

By an Act of the Irish Parliament, 38 Geo. 3, c. 35 (1798), which was passed in consequence of the investigation above alluded to, the whole management of the Institution was vested in nine governors, named in the Act, with a direction, that upon the death or resignation of a governor at any time thereafter, the remaining governors should elect and appoint his successor.

Such is the constitution of the establishment at the present time; and much credit is due to the successive governors for having seldom permitted a week to pass without assembling in the hospital for the execution of their arduous duties. The governors named in the Act applied themselves without delay to the improvement of every branch of the Institution, and they were zealously seconded by the voluntary services of a number of ladies, who formed themselves into a committee of superintendence for the regular visitation of the infant department and of the female school. It is highly gratifying to reflect, that during the twenty-eight years which have since elapsed, these exertions have not been discontinued, and that with very little intermission ladies have successively been found who have devoted a portion of their time to the execution of this important duty. To their attention the order and improvement which have ever since prevailed more or less in these departments must in a great degree be attributed.

One of the first acts of the new governors in 1798, was to provide a number of wet-nurses in the house for the infant children on their admission; and the system of artificial feeding, which had previously prevailed, was abandoned. To the care of these women the children are committed for the few days during which they remain in the hospital before they are conveyed to the nurses who are to take charge of them in the country. The nurses selected for the latter purpose usually reside in the counties contiguous to Dublin, principally in Wicklow, Kildare and Carlow. Prior to 1797, the sum of 2*l.* per annum was paid to a country nurse for undertaking this office. This allowance was in the year 1797 raised to 3*l.*, and a further bounty of 2*l.* was given to the nurse at the end of the first year, if she produced in good health the child that had been intrusted to her care.

The nurses are paid at the hospital every summer, and they are obliged, when they receive their money, to bring the children with them as their title for payment. The nurse, on such occasions, is not aware whether the child will be taken from her, or whether she will be allowed to carry it back with her to the country for another year. The affection which the nurses almost invariably conceive for the

the children, and the reciprocal attachment of the children towards them, appear to be in many cases as strong as if a natural relationship really existed; and this circumstance affords undoubted proof of the kind treatment which the children in general receive. The scenes of deep distress which take place when the period arrives for the ultimate separation of the nurse from the child, are described as most trying to the best feelings of those who witness them; and it is a well established fact, that when the critical age of seven or eight years is approaching, at which the children are usually taken into the hospital, the nurses very frequently forego the remuneration to which they are entitled for the past year, and abstain ever after from producing the children, rather than incur the risk of being deprived of them. Other causes may sometimes operate to occasion this detention, or prevent the return of children to the hospital; but it cannot be doubted that in the great majority of instances it is to be accounted for in the way now stated.

Education of the Lower Classes.

The Reverend Mr. Daly, the rector of Powerscourt, in the county of Wicklow, informs us, that not fewer than a hundred of these nurses reside in his parish. He says, "I can state that all the women in my parish who have infants to nurse, if they were sure that the children would be taken from them, would not go up for their salary; they would lose their three or four pounds to keep the children; but they take them up, the salary being a great object to them, in the hope that they may get the salary and the child; and they have often said, 'We will not take them another year—we will keep them.' There are a great number in my parish, which they have kept back and not brought up, who are now living along with the families who reared them." He has heard the women say, "When that child is five years old, I will not take it up to the hospital, I will lose the money." He adds, that the "unhappiest scenes he has ever witnessed were those of separating the children from the nurses, who had taken care of them for eight or nine years." He further informs us, that "these children are almost always called by the names of the other children of the family, and not by the foundling names; that they are not the objects of reproach or obloquy in the neighbourhood before they have been returned into the hospital, but that they are most dreadfully so when they come back again to be apprenticed. While they are called by the name of the people in the house, nobody knows whether they are their children or not; but when they come down with a blue coat and red cape from the hospital, they are looked at," he says, "in a very reproachful way."

During the period which has elapsed since the introduction of the reformed system into the Foundling Hospital, namely, from the 25th June 1796 to the 5th January 1826, the total number of children admitted has been - 52,150

As far as can be ascertained from the Returns made to us, these children have been disposed of in the following manner, viz.

Died in the hospital whilst infants	-	-	-	-	-	14,613
Returned as dead whilst at nurse in the country	-	-	-	-	-	25,859
Died in the Infirmary, after returning from nurse	-	-	-	-	-	730
Died in the country, grown children sent there for health	-	-	-	-	-	322
						41,524

Eloped from the hospital	-	-	-	-	-	413
Delivered up to parents whilst infants	-	-	-	-	-	1,093
Ditto from the grown department	-	-	-	-	-	34
Apprenticed to trades	-	-	-	-	-	5,466
Ditto to schoolmasters	-	-	-	-	-	204
Transferred to charter schools	-	-	-	-	-	526
						49,260

Remaining in the hospital and at nurse 5th January 1826 - 6,339

55,599

Deduct the number of children in the hospital and at nurse
25th June 1796 - - - - -

3,410

52,189

From this statement it appears that out of 52,150 children admitted, 41,524 are returned as dead in the books of the hospital, leaving only 10,626 surviving: and from this latter number are to be deducted upwards of 1,500 delivered up to parents or eloped, the mortality amongst whom there are no means for calculating. Of the total number of deaths, no less than 25,859 children are stated to have died whilst in the country.

It is obvious from the very nature of a Foundling Hospital, that the loss of life amongst the infants committed to its charge must, under any possible system of management, be greater than amongst an equal number of children not removed from the custody of their parents. Newly-born infants, transmitted perhaps from remote parts of Ireland, and intrusted during their journey to the hands of strangers, who are not in a situation to perform the offices of wet-nurses, are exposed to so many difficulties, that it may perhaps excite surprise that they so frequently survive their first passage to the hospital. And it is not to be doubted that such injuries are often sustained from exposure to cold and neglect, as lay the foundation of future diseases, which no subsequent care can fully counteract.

But although it is evident that the loss of infant life in an institution of this nature, must greatly exceed the common calculations exhibited in the tables of mortality, yet in this case the proportion is so much greater, that we are clearly of opinion there is a mistake of some magnitude in the account, which may be sufficiently explained by the fact, that a number of the children officially set down as having died in the country, have really been retained by their nurses, and many of them grown up to maturity, and taken their station in society without the knowledge or assistance of the governors of the hospital.

According to the rules of the Institution, the children are set down as dead when three years have elapsed without their nurses having produced them at the hospital; so that it by no means follows that many of the children may not be actually in existence, although reported officially as dead. A certificate of the death of a child dying in the country, signed by the clergyman of the parish, is given to the nurse, and is produced by her as a document, by means of which she obtains payment for the portion of her salary due for the time the child lived. For the 25,859 children returned as having died in the country, only 16,237 of these certificates have been received at the hospital, leaving 9,622 to be accounted for without any proof of their death. It will be found from the examination of the registrar, that, in his opinion, there are many cases in which the death of a child has actually taken place, although the dead certificate (as it is called) has not been produced, because the portion of salary accrued has been too small to induce the nurse to take the trouble of applying for it; and, till within the last eight or ten years, it was usual, on delivering a child to nurse, to pay one month's wages in advance, so that for all children dying within the first month, there would be nothing due; and, in his opinion, a large proportion of the children would die within that early period. We doubt, however, whether this opinion of the registrar, in the extent to which he would apply it, be well founded. It would fix upon the system of the Institution such a waste and destruction of infant life, that after the most attentive consideration of the views which he has suggested, we incline to believe, that in a majority of cases the children thus officially considered at the hospital as dead, are in reality in existence; having survived the usual age of drafting, and having been retained by their nurses for the reasons before stated, or passed from their families to other situations, without again returning to the hospital.

By Dr. Price's Tables it would appear, that of 52,000 children born under ordinary circumstances, the number who would attain the age of eight years is about 20,176. This proportion, however, should be considerably diminished as applying to the present case, in consideration of the circumstances in which children are brought to the hospital. It appears, as above stated, that 10,626, out of 52,150, are considered as surviving; if we add to this amount the major part of the 9,622 who are returned as having died in the country, but of whose deaths no certificate has been produced, and who, for the reasons above stated, may be supposed still to exist, there will be no cause to impute to this Institution an excessive mortality.

It is clear from the tables supplied by the registrar, that the number of children returned from the country nurses to the hospital, in the space of thirty years, from 1796 to 1826, amounts only to 8,666, of whom only 5,670 were apprenticed within the same period, and 526 transferred to charter schools. And if it has happened, as we are inclined to believe, that a majority of the 9,622 children, of whose death no certificates have been received, are in reality still in existence, it would seem to follow that the numbers which have thus been absorbed into the mass of the population, and have taken their places in society in a manner different from, and often it must be supposed, contrary to that intended by the governors of the Institution, cannot have fallen much short of the number of children upon whom the objects of the system have been fully realized.

Education of the Lower Classes.

We thought it desirable to ascertain the feelings of the children themselves as to the treatment which they experienced from their nurses, and we have given in the Appendix the examinations of several boys and girls upon the subject; the mere reading of this evidence will but imperfectly represent the affection tenderness and animation with which the children expressed their feelings.

It would be doing great injustice to these children to attribute the dislike which they invariably conceive for the Foundling Hospital to the confinement or restraints which the system imposes. Their dislike results undoubtedly in a still greater degree from their being, when transferred to its walls for ever, separated from those persons who had become the objects of their affections, and towards whom their attachment is so strong, that even for years after their admission they eagerly avail themselves of every possible opportunity of escape for the purpose of returning to them.

The foundlings being regarded as children of the state are, (when received into the hospital for instruction) educated in the religion of the established church. It is obviously, therefore, important, with a view to this object, that the nurses to whose care they are committed in the country should be members of that communion.

Until within the last two years, however, too little attention seems to have been paid to this circumstance. The governors appear to have considered that the severance of the child from the nurse at the age of seven or eight years, would be sufficient to efface any peculiar religious impressions which might have been conveyed to it in infancy. It happened for several years that the officer of the hospital whose peculiar duty it was to select these nurses, was himself a zealous Roman Catholic, and took the greatest pains that as many Roman Catholic and as few Protestant nurses as possible should be employed. The governors appear of late to have been impressed with the importance of a change of management in this particular, and accordingly in the month of June 1824, they determined "That all the children above the age of four years who were then with Roman Catholic nurses should be transferred to Protestant nurses." In the year and a half that has since elapsed (ended 5th January 1826) we find that no fewer than 2,150 children have been thus transferred and placed in the counties contiguous to Dublin, with Protestant nurses, selected and recommended by clergymen of the established church.

The particulars of this transfer, the parishes in which the children were placed, and the numbers transferred upon each day during the period, will be found in the Appendix, as also the circular letter addressed upon the occasion, by the governors of the hospital to the clergy.

The officers of the Institution, whom we examined upon the subject, have assured us, and we have no reason to doubt the fact, that there will be no difficulty in providing in the first instance a sufficient number of Protestant nurses for all the infants now sent into the country to be nursed. And as the average number annually admitted into the hospital under the present regulations is less than 500, we do not apprehend that the governors will for the future experience any difficulty in selecting proper nurses. If they should be able to do so, the inconvenience which at present arises from the transferring children from Roman Catholic to Protestant nurses, will be avoided; and as it is impossible to expect the same affection and care towards the foundling from a woman to whom a child of four or five years of age has been transferred, as if she had reared it from its infancy, it is very desirable to prevent the necessity of such a change.

The Foundling Hospital is fitted up for the accommodation of about 1,200 children, who have been returned from their nurses, exclusive of the infants who are lodged there on their first admission, previous to their being sent to the country. As these latter remain only for a few days, their number is always inconsiderable.

When the hospital is once full, it is evident that the number which can be received within its walls in any year from the country nurses, must depend upon the vacancies created by deaths, elopements and return to parents, or by apprenticeships, or other modes adopted for disposing of the children.

It is equally evident that the average number of children at nurse in the country, who attain in each year the age at which, under the present system, they ought to be returned into the hospital, must bear some regular proportion to the annual number of infants committed in each year to the care of these nurses. This average may be easily ascertained; and unless in each year care is taken to provide a corresponding number of vacancies in the hospital, an inconvenient accumulation of the children at nurse in the country must necessarily ensue. The Commissioners of Education, appointed under the 46th of the late King, in their Report upon the Foundling Hospital, dated 7th of April 1810, pointed out for the notice of the governors a rule for ascertaining this proportion, which it is much to be regretted has at no period been sufficiently attended to. The Commissioners observe as follows:—"In the course of the year 1803, on examining the tables of mortality kept since the commencement of the measures of reform in 1797, it was computed that about one in five, or thereabouts, of the whole number received at the gate would be alive (and to be drafted into the house) at the age of ten years;* this would give an annual average of about 400 to be drafted, the average of admissions being about 2,000: but unless the children already in the schools were turned out without any or little education, and apprenticed to such persons as might offer to take them without discrimination or selection, not more than half this number could be actually received, consequently half of the children of ten years of age must have remained with their nurses, and in the following year all the children who would then have attained that age. Thus, in the course of a few years, the funds, extent of accommodation, and other circumstances of the Institution remaining the same, the period of drafting must have been so postponed, as completely to have prevented the education of great numbers, and many must have become adults in the country without having participated of any portion of instruction from the Institution."

The means most relied upon for securing the proper number of vacancies in the hospital, has generally been by apprenticing the children; but we find that the numbers annually apprenticed for several years prior to the year ending 5th January 1820, fell very short, indeed, of the proportion which was required to make room in the hospital, "for the children of a proper age to be drafted from the country."

In the year 1817, 2,210 infants were admitted, whilst, instead of one-fifth of that number, only 74 were apprenticed. In 1818, 1,598 were admitted, and 93 only apprenticed. In the former of those years, 237 were drafted into the hospital; in the latter, only 34.

It is evident that in the operations of these and the preceding years, the foundations were laid of that vast accumulation of children in the country, which at length, about the year 1820, produced so much embarrassment as to lead to one of the most remarkable changes of system that has occurred in the management of the Institution. The number of children annually sent to nurse for several years previous to this time, was between 1,500 and 2,000, and the total number then in the country at nurse amounted to 8,740; the pressing urgency of the case

* "The number of children who actually attain the age of ten years is greater than in this proportion; but some are returned to their parents every year, and some are withheld by their nurses; sometimes in consequence of a strong attachment to them having been formed, and sometimes in consequence of their having become useful; these two causes reduce the number to be annually drafted, so as to render the foregoing computation to be not very far from the truth: absolute precision is manifestly unattainable."

appears to have then forced the governors to determine on adopting some decisive correction of their system, by such regulations as should necessarily diminish the number of admissions into the hospital.

Education of the Lower Classes.

With this view they determined to receive children transmitted from the country only during the summer months, the admissions from the city of Dublin being permitted to continue as heretofore, during the whole year. A bill was also brought into Parliament and passed into an Act in the year 1822 (3 Geo. 4, c. 35), providing that no child should be admitted except upon the payment of 5*l.* on the delivery of the child, to be levied off the inhabitants of the parish from which the child should come. And it has been subsequently provided by another Act of Parliament, (6 Geo. 4, c. 102,) that the parishes might levy the sums requisite for the maintenance of the child, until transmitted to the hospital, and for the expense of the transmission; the practical effects of this measure were immediately felt; the number of infants admitted fell at once from nearly 2,000 to less than 500, and in the succeeding years, the numbers have been as follow:—

	Children admitted.
Year ending 5th January 1823	-	-	-	-	419
1824	-	-	-	-	486
1825	-	-	-	-	511
1826	-	-	-	-	450

We have endeavoured, as far as possible, to ascertain what has become of the residue of children, amounting on an average to about 1,500, who if this check had not been resorted to would, judging by experience of former years, have been presented for admission to the hospital; we could not help in some degree apprehending that an increase of infanticide might have been the consequence, but the inquiries which we have made upon that subject have not afforded any grounds for supposing that such has been the result, and in the absence of any positive information upon the point, we can only state that we see no reason for thinking that the experiment has produced any mischievous or injurious effects.

While the admissions were thus limited, great exertions were at the same time made by the governors to increase the number of apprenticeships, and the principle of giving apprentice fees was adopted. As a further relief, 500 children were transferred to the charter schools in the Autumn of 1824; and we learn from one of the governors that it had even been suggested to the Board, to send a number of children to America, a proposition which we mention only for the purpose of conveying an idea of the difficulties and embarrassment which the accumulation of children at that time occasioned.

It has resulted from these combined causes, viz. the limitation of admissions on one hand, and the increased number of children apprenticed on the other, that the period is not far distant when the number of children connected with the Foundling Hospital will be reduced within very manageable limits, and the question in what manner they may be maintained and educated with most advantage to themselves and the public, becomes the only remaining subject of consideration.

The system of assembling children in large numbers in public boarding schools, where they may be submitted to a strict discipline, and afterwards sent forth into society, is in the eyes of many persons attended with peculiar advantages. It has been supposed to lead to habits of steadiness and morality, and to superadd to the advantages of literary instruction a strong sense of religious obligation.

By others it has been considered that the extinction of almost all the natural affections by which children might, under more favourable circumstances, be actuated, the confining them within an institution in which their daily experience must be totally at variance with the real scenes which await them upon being sent forth into the world; the supplying them without exertion, and almost without a thought upon their part, with whatever they can want; and the removing all incitements to exertion, and all occupation, farther than such as mere school instruction may supply, have a tendency to induce habits of indolence, apathy and discontent, precisely the reverse of those qualifications of which in after-life a child without a parent will stand most in need.

Education of the Lower Classes.

It seems obvious that such a system of training for the lower orders cannot be judged of by any analogy to its effects upon the education of the upper ranks of society.

In a public school chosen by the parents, from which the child may at their pleasure be withdrawn, and from whence at stated periods of the year it may be brought to its paternal home, with full opportunities for observation, intercourse, and inquiry, and for the renewal of its social affections, the state of things is essentially different from the case of a great boarding school, the inmates of which have no parents, no homes, no persons to inquire after them, and whom the master is secure of retaining, whatever his own conduct may be. A distinction still more important is, that the children in the former case, when ultimately taken away from the school, are received into their own families, but when taken from the latter, they are cast helpless upon the world.

On this subject the evidence of the Reverend Mr. Carlile, which will be found at length in the Appendix, deserves particular attention. It was a part of the duty of this gentleman, for a series of years, to superintend a school intended chiefly for Presbyterian children of the lower orders, in which the usual principle was adhered to, of receiving orphans or children whose parents were in such distress as to be wholly unable to take charge of them. The children in this institution appear to have been very carefully and anxiously superintended, and to have had every chance of succeeding in after-life, which such institutions can afford.

We learn, however, from Mr. Carlile, that the success has not corresponded with his hopes; that the children in general have not turned out so well as might have been expected in theory, by removing them from intercourse with the world. A large proportion have run away from the school, and a considerable number of those apprenticed deserted their services. Of fifty-seven children who had passed through the school previous to the year 1822, three had died, four had been withdrawn by their relations, eighteen had eloped from the school, and thirty-two had been apprenticed by the governors. But of those thirty-two, no less than sixteen had run away from their masters. Mr. Carlile adds, "that from what he had seen of the dispositions and habits of the children who had left the school, he conceives that they were much more likely to prove burdensome to their parents or relations than to assist them. That they acquire habits of idleness which they seldom conquer; that they have nothing to do but to be taught to read and write, and such other matters as may be done about the school; that they have not those habits of industry that are likely to fit them for life; that when they go out into the world, they are usually disgusted with common drudgery; that after they have been for some time in the school, the prospects of their future life get much higher than they were when they entered it." He mentioned an instance that had occurred immediately previous to his examination, "of a girl being greatly shocked at the idea of being bound apprentice to a ladies shoemaker, although at the time she came into the school she would have been delighted to have been taken into any kitchen, or received by such a person to assist in the common work of the family for her food." And he adds, "That such instances were perpetually occurring; that these views make them dissatisfied with their apprenticeships, and form one great cause for their leaving them; that there is the strongest tendency in the children to be ashamed of the circumstances of their education; that in some few cases he has found them in after-life disposed to recognize him again, but from the way they talk of it they show they consider it an effort; they say, 'we are not at all ashamed of it.' He states, with respect to the amount of religious impression which he has been able to make upon the children, "that they have very readily received scriptural instruction; that they may be made to answer admirably; that he has frequently rivetted their attention to such subjects; that when he comes to the point of practical effect upon them he has observed such effect, but in very few instances." On the whole, Mr. Carlile greatly prefers the instruction which may be had in Sunday and day schools. With respect to this point, he makes an observation, important as affecting female education. The subject of female profligacy is one upon which he observes, "It is peculiarly difficult, almost impossible for the conductors of a boarding school to touch; the consequence is, the child goes into the world totally unprepared to guard against temptation. The mistress (he says,) may, but very few mistresses (he apprehends) do touch upon

“ it; and if they do, it would have comparatively very little effect: whereas, a child living with its parents, and probably hearing reference made to a woman that has lost her character, and witnessing the horror with which another speaks of that vice, is more impressed with the danger of it, and made better to understand the effect that such a fall would have upon her future life than she would be by any thing that could be said in a school. And I believe, (he says,) that it will be found that that description of vice carries off a very large proportion of the girls that go out of these schools; they are not warned against it; it is a matter upon which a clergyman can say little or nothing. The mother and father could say with effect what nobody else could, and I have reason to believe, (he adds,) it would be found on inquiry, that what I have stated respecting the after-lives of girls reared in charity schools is the fact.”

Education of the Lower Classes.

The apprehensions expressed by Mr. Carlile as to the ultimate fate of the girls educated in charity boarding schools in general, are shared in at least an equal degree by the Reverend Mr. Daly, whose parish of Powerscourt, as one of the great resorts of foundling children, has given him much opportunity of observation. He says, “ That he has remarked that no children turn out so ill as the children that have been sent from the Foundling Hospital: by turning out ill, he means, that most of the females that he has known have turned out profligate; that they have not a fair chance of being settled in life as married women; that those girls are often destroyed in the places they are sent to; there is no one to call their masters to account for it.”

Mr. Beasly, who was lately chaplain of the Asylum in Leeson-street for the reception of unfortunate females, seems to have taken the same view. He expresses himself as follows:—“ There is a very large proportion, I think, of our inmates, certainly, I must say a large proportion, come from parochial schools and the Foundling Hospital. When I say a large proportion, I would not be understood to say that the proportion is large according to the numbers that leave those schools, but the numbers that come to us from those schools, I think, quite embrace between a third and a fourth; but whether that is an overwhelming majority, considering the numbers that leave those schools, or not, I do not know.”

Mr. Beasly adds, “ When I was a minister of a parish within fourteen miles of Dublin, so great was the evil which I saw arising from the children from the Foundling Hospital, I never gave but a single note to bring a child from it.”

Mr. James Digges La Touche says, “ That the strong impression upon his mind for a long time has been, that there was something exceedingly futile in the expectation of good from boarding schools, where the children are received early, and shut out from all intercourse with society, and then just at the most dangerous age cast upon the ocean of life, without any friend and without any experience. A shipwreck,” he conceives, “ must too often follow; it is a wonder it is ever avoided. It strikes me,” he says, “ that a child educated in a cabin really enters life, as far as circumstances are concerned, with more advantages than a child educated in a boarding-school.” He considered them when coming forth as “ overgrown children, totally unacquainted with the world, and totally unfit to deal with others.”

The experience of Mr. Paulus Emilius Singer, a governor of the Lock Hospital, and also of an asylum for females rescued from the paths of vice, has enabled him to give us important information upon this subject. We learn from him that the Lock Hospital contains about 150 patients; it is always full; from 7 to 800 appear to pass through it within the year. Of the number in the Lock Hospital there were, at the period of our examination, six foundling girls, and one from a Roman Catholic establishment on George's-Hill, and one from the Arklow Charter School. Mr. Singer thinks the proportion of 8 out of 150 may be about a fair average proportion. That as to the Penitentiary, the total number that have passed through it since its institution had been 284; that of this number thirty-eight had passed through different charity boarding-schools; that the age at which the girls who have been educated in those charity schools, and who have become addicted to vicious pursuits, was, on the average, from fifteen to sixteen years. He says, that from the very moment he saw persons of such a description so circumstanced, he endeavoured to ascertain the cause why persons who had got this education should turn out so badly afterwards: the reason, in his opinion, is, that these girls are removed, in the first place, from their natural protectors, whoever they may be, whether parents or other relations; they are taken into the school, and placed among strangers; the consequence of which is, that the natural feeling or tie that first bound them is broken, and, being unfitted for the situations they go to, from the education received, they become the victims of the first temptation that falls in their way. Upon being asked from what class of schools the greater number of thirty-eight in the Penitentiary had come, he says, "Certainly from the Foundling Hospital."

Education of the
Lower Classes.

We can hardly imagine any large boarding school in which such consequences can be averted, except one in which the managers of the school should possess the means, and feel the inclination, to continue their assistance and protection to the young persons after entering into life. It will appear from our Report to be presented on the Female Orphan House, that such prospects have been realized with the best success, in the instance of that establishment, under the care of Mrs. La Touche. But, while we admire the singular benevolence and perseverance which distinguish the management of the asylum last mentioned, we have to express our conviction, that it would be in vain to reckon generally and constantly upon exertions of a similar nature in the direction of such Institutions.

In considering the fate of the children who had been educated within the walls of the Foundling Hospital, it was impossible for us not to contrast it with the probable condition of those who, having been retained in the hands of their nurses, had been disposed of by a course so different from that to which they were destined by the rules of the Institution.

These children have taken their respective places in society amongst the peasantry of the country, without being exposed to any particular observation, and without affording reason to conclude that the result has been in any material degree either more or less beneficial to themselves than if they had been the children of the families to whose care they were committed.

In the words of Mr. Daly, who speaks from abundant opportunities of observation, they have received "the same protection that the children of the nurses received, and the same care, and they have turned out in life just the same."

It could not, however, fail to occur to our notice, how much the education and ultimate destination of these children might have been improved had they been originally committed to the care of a description of persons somewhat superior to those in whose hands they were actually placed; and if the obligation had been distinctly imposed on such persons, of sending them to good daily and Sunday schools in the vicinity of their homes, and if it were a matter of well-understood duty upon the part of the clergymen in whose parishes they should reside, to superintend their religious instruction, to act as constant inspectors upon the conduct of their nurses, and to hold all necessary communication with the governors of the Foundling Hospital in respect to them; we think it cannot be doubted that the education, literary, moral and religious, of a child so circumstanced, until the age of apprenticeship, would be superior to any thing which the practice of the Foundling Hospital has as yet realized; nor is there any reason to suppose that it would be more difficult to apprentice children from such situations than it is from the hospital in Dublin. In the former situation the child has been exposed to no obloquy, but in the latter his arrival as an apprentice from the hospital has marked him out as an unfortunate object of contempt and persecution.

Upon this point we have been struck with the evidence of Mr. Kinahan, who gives a portion of his time gratuitously, as secretary of the Mendicity Asylum in Dublin. He informs us, that in that last refuge of the wretchedness of the metropolis, "those who have been educated in the Foundling Hospital conceal it, because it would be thrown out against them afterwards by their fellow mendicants as a circumstance of degradation; for (he adds) even these poor people have their feelings."

However

However unreasonable this feeling may be, there can be no doubt that it exists in a peculiar degree throughout Ireland.

Education of the Lower Classes.

A foundling apprenticed directly from the house of his adopted parent, would, we think, be much more likely to succeed in his new situation, than one from the Foundling Hospital. A boy attending a day school in the country is engaged in the scenes of real life, but a child locked up in the Foundling Hospital knows nothing but what is artificial; the former has acquired some experience, the latter is without any; the former would still have the advantage of a home, and of a friend to observe the conduct of his new master, and to afford him protection in case of ultimate need; but according to the present system, the apprentice from the Foundling Hospital is placed in the hands of a stranger, unrestrained by the observation of any protector; a circumstance which in the case of females peculiarly helps to account for the disastrous consequences which so frequently ensue. The child who retains a connection with the protectors of his infancy will feel under a restraint, from his own sense of the value of character; from which we fear that a young man or woman removed for ever from all such connections too often feel themselves absolved.

It appears from the experiment already made, that clergymen have been found cheerfully to undertake the superintendence of the Protestant nurses to whom the children have been recently transferred; and there can be no doubt that they would be equally disposed to continue their superintendence, if the children were left with these nurses till a more advanced age, and would willingly co-operate in a system in which it should be their province to take care that the children should be put to good day and Sunday schools, and have particular attention paid to their religious instruction.

We are not prepared to suggest the course of discontinuing altogether the practice of educating a portion of the children within the walls of the hospital, but we have no difficulty in offering it as our earnest recommendation, that the governors should give a fair and full trial to the experiment which we suggest, of permitting such children as have been placed in the hands of careful Protestant nurses, under the superintendence of clergymen willing to discharge that important duty, and with good day schools in their neighbourhood, so to continue, until the time arrives when they may be apprenticed or otherwise disposed of from those situations, without bringing them back into the hospital; the experience of a few years cannot fail to lead to a just estimate of the relative advantages possessed by the two systems.

The saving of expense which would result from this plan, though considerable, would, in our opinion, be found the least of its recommendations. During the trial of this experiment the Foundling Hospital would still continue open, as at present, for the admission of children; their distribution in the country, and their readmission in any cases, when from particular local causes such a course may be necessary.

In this recommendation it is obvious that no new principle is adopted or assumed. All that is proposed is to carry into effect, under an improved system of regulations, that operation which has already extensively taken place, from the powerful influence of parental affection and other natural causes.

It would of course be necessary, in order to give full effect to the intended plan, that the governors should maintain a constant and efficient correspondence with each clergyman, on the subject of the foundlings in his parish; as to the nurses, who would be required, there is every reason to suppose that the three or four counties in the vicinity of Dublin would afford the necessary supply.

Upon the present internal management of the hospital, a few observations will be sufficient. The constant attendance of the governors, and of the committee of ladies, has at all times operated as a powerful corrective of that relaxation in the performance of official duty, to which all large public institutions are exposed. The cleanliness, order and regularity of the establishment are highly creditable to the managers.

Education of the Lower Classes.

The literary instruction of the children in the schools, would admit of considerable improvement; the new methods in the art of teaching, though not altogether neglected, do not appear to have been as advantageously applied as might have been expected.

We beg, however, particularly to mention, as an exception to this observation, the preparatory school for very young female infants, containing, at the time of our visit, about 200 children, who are brought in at an earlier age than usual from their nurses; these children are made the objects of the most assiduous and peculiar care of some ladies, who give their time to the management of the school. This portion of the establishment owes its foundation to Mrs. Magee, whose loss the Institution has lately had to lament, and from whose active superintendence not only this school, but every department of the hospital, derived the most important benefits.

An establishment has lately been formed in the Foundling Hospital, which requires to be particularly noticed; we allude to a school founded and maintained by the Association for discountenancing Vice, for the purpose of training schoolmasters; it has been too recently established to have as yet produced much practical effect; the intention is to receive thirty candidate masters, and to maintain them for four months within the walls of the hospital, under the superintendence of a resident clergyman of the established church, and to provide a model school formed of some of the boys of the Foundling Hospital, by the instruction of whom the candidate masters may acquire practical knowledge of the improved modes of teaching; a portion of the time of these teachers will thus be occupied in giving instruction in the model school, while a greater portion of it will be employed in receiving instruction from the superintendent. The persons received are intended for country schoolmasters or parish clerks; in every instance they are to be recommended by a clergyman of the established church, who is to point out the particular place for which the candidate is destined; one or two members of the Association for discountenancing Vice, are to undertake in rotation the particular inspection of this school; as yet, it appears to be by no means advanced to that degree of perfection which it is expected hereafter to reach, having at the time of our examination, been confined, in fact, to about fifteen masters, and about 100 pupils, and no definite course of instruction having as yet been adopted; there can, however, be no doubt of the importance of the object, and that the plan may to a considerable extent be made to answer the expectations of the society which has undertaken it. Ninety persons may, according to the rotation prescribed, complete their instruction in this department within the year.

With respect to the food and lodging of the children in the Foundling Hospital, the regulations of the Institution have made very adequate provision; but we are obliged to observe, that a severe ophthalmia almost annually recurring, and extending itself at times to a most alarming degree, seems to indicate that it is referable to some permanent cause, which medical science might be able to discover and remove.

We have observed in the School for the Orphans of Soldiers, such good effects produced in the appearance and health of the children, from the adoption of a system of gymnastic exercises, that we cannot but express our opinion that it would be a decided improvement in the management of the Foundling Hospital, if some plan of the same nature should also be introduced into that establishment.

The management of the official departments of the hospital appears to us to admit of one decisive improvement, by the appointment of a general superintendent of the whole, constantly resident within its walls, whose authority should be paramount to that of all the other officers engaged in the Institution (respecting whom it should be his particular duty to report weekly to the governors), and who should be made thoroughly responsible for the conduct of the whole establishment. At present the several officers, the chaplain, the registrar, the physician, the house-keeper, the masters and mistresses, though all admitting their subjection to the governors, are in practice independent of each other; and whatever may be wrong in any of their departments, it is not sufficiently the business of any person to inquire into, or report, for the information of the Board. This alteration was suggested suggested by his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, and we are fully persuaded that its adoption would lead to considerable improvement.

Education of the Lower Classes.

We have subjoined tables of the income and expenditure of the Foundling Hospital since the year 1796, the period of its present reformed management. Its income arises, partly from the rent of a small estate, producing about 100*l.* per annum, from the sums received with children on admission, and which appear to vary from about 2,200*l.* to 2,500*l.* but chiefly from parliamentary grants, the amount of the last of which was 37,350*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* Irish currency.

We have only to add, that the adoption of the experiment suggested in this Report, will, in our opinion, necessarily lead to a considerable reduction of the expenditure of the Institution, as well as to the more extensive and important objects which it seeks to attain.

T. FRANKLAND LEWIS, (L. s.)

J. LESLIE FOSTER, (L. s.)

W. GRANT, (L. s.)

J. GLASSFORD, (L. s.)

A. R. BLAKE, (L. s.)

Dublin,
16th September 1826.

APPENDIX.

No. 1.—EXAMINATION of Mr. Thomas Finlay, 30 Oct. 1824	- - - - -	p. 18
No. 2.—Further Examination of Ditto, 19 Nov. 1824	- - - - -	p. 19
No. 3.—Further Examination of Ditto, 19 Dec. 1825	- - - - -	p. 23
No. 4.—Further Examination of Ditto, 21 Jan. 1826	- - - - -	p. 28
No. 5. Extracts from the Examination of his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, 17 Dec. 1824	- - - - -	p. 32
No. 6.—Extracts from the Examination of Mrs. Magee, 29 Dec. 1824	- - - - -	p. 41
No. 7.—Examination of the Honourable and Reverend John Pomeroy, 26 Nov. 1824	- - - - -	p. 48
No. 8.—Extracts from the further Examination of Ditto, 19 Dec. 1825	- - - - -	p. 57
No. 9.—Examination of the Reverend Henry Murray, 22 Nov. 1824	- - - - -	p. 59
No. 10.—Examination of John Creighton, Esq. 22 Nov. 1824	- - - - -	p. 71
No. 11.—Further Examination of Ditto, 24 Nov. 1824	- - - - -	p. 77
No. 12.—Examination of Mrs. Winifred Innes, 10 Dec. 1824	- - - - -	p. 78
No. 13.—Examination of Mrs. Margaret Ross, 10 Dec. 1824	- - - - -	p. 82

EXAMINATIONS of 19 Girls from the FOUNDLING HOSPITAL; viz.

No. 14.—Mary Birch, 10 Dec. 1824	- - - - -	p. 87
No. 15.—Sarah Roach	- - - - -	p. 88
No. 16.—Ann Burgh	- - - - -	p. 89
No. 17.—Jane Coghlan	- - - - -	p. 90
No. 18.—Esther Wade	- - - - -	p. 92
No. 19.—Anne Creane	- - - - -	p. 93
No. 20.—Eliza Stroaker	- - - - -	p. 94
No. 21.—Margaret Nelson, 13 Dec. 1824	- - - - -	p. 96
No. 22.—Mary Everett	- - - - -	p. 97
No. 23.—Jane Maxwell	- - - - -	p. 98
No. 24.—Eliza Clayton	- - - - -	p. 99
No. 25.—Bridget Hayward	- - - - -	p. 100
No. 26.—Rebecca Palmer	- - - - -	p. 102
No. 27.—Mary Harison	- - - - -	p. 103
No. 28.—Bridget Gale	- - - - -	p. 104
No. 29.—Mary Hogarty, 18 Dec. 1824	- - - - -	p. 105
No. 30.—Anne Calvert	- - - - -	p. 106
No. 31.—Mary Rider	- - - - -	p. 107
No. 32.—Ann Bryan	- - - - -	p. 108

EXAMINATIONS of 12 Boys from the FOUNDLING HOSPITAL; viz.

No. 33.—Thomas Grant, 13 Dec. 1824	- - - - -	p. 108
No. 34.—Richard Holmes	- - - - -	p. 109
No. 35.—James Sweeney	- - - - -	p. 110
No. 36.—Patrick Henley	- - - - -	p. 111
No. 37.—William Brady	- - - - -	p. 112
No. 38.—Thomas Rose	- - - - -	p. 113
No. 39.—John Jameson	- - - - -	p. 114
No. 40.—Joseph Stammers	- - - - -	p. 115
No. 41.—John Roberts, 18 Dec. 1824	- - - - -	ibid.
No. 42.—James Pennyfeather	- - - - -	p. 116
No. 43.—Thomas Garder	- - - - -	p. 117
No. 44.—Aaron Ruff	- - - - -	ibid.

- No. 45.—Examination of the Reverend James Aickin, 20 Dec. 1825 - - - p. 118
- No. 46.—Examination of the Reverend Thomas Percival Magee, 21 Dec. 1825 - - - p. 123
- No. 47.—Extracts from the Examination of the Reverend Robert Daly, 15 Dec. 1824 - p. 126
- No. 48.—Extracts from the Examination of the Rev. James Carlile, 25 Nov. 1824 - p. 131
- No. 49.—Extracts from the Examination of James Digges La Touche, esq., 14 Dec. 1824 p. 134
- No. 50.—Extracts from the Examination of Paulus Emilius Singer, esq., 29 Nov. 1824 - p. 135
- No. 51.—Examination of the Reverend John Beasly, 7th Dec. 1824 - - - p. 137
- No. 52.—Extract from the Examination of Daniel Kinahan, jun. esq., 1st Dec. 1824 - p. 138
- No. 53.—A Statement of the total number of Children at nurse in the country on the 10 Oct. 1825, specifying the number of each age; also, the number of grown Children in the country for health - - - - - p. 139
- No. 54.—A Statement of the number of Children transferred from Roman Catholic to Protestant nurses, in the year 1823 - - - - - ibid.
- No. 55.—A Return of the number of children transferred, from Roman Catholic to Protestant nurses, from the 10 June 1824 to the 5 January 1826 - - - - - p. 140
- No. 56.—Circular Letter to the Clergy of the diocese of Dublin - - - - - p. 142
- No. 57.—Extracts from the governess's Report-book - - - - - ibid.
- No. 58.—An Account of the number of Dead Certificates claimed and paid, for seven years, ending 5 January 1826 - - - - - p. 143
- No. 59.—An Account of the Expense of the Foundling Hospital, for seven years, ending the 5 January 1826 - - - - - p. 144
- No. 60.—A General Statement of the Receipts of the Foundling Hospital, from the 25 Dec. 1796 to the 5 Jan. 1826 - - - - - p. 145
- No. 61.—An Account of the number of Children admitted into the Foundling Hospital, from the different counties of Ireland - - - - - p. 146
- No. 62.—A Statement showing the number of Infants admitted into the Foundling Hospital, and of Children at nurse in the country, and of grown Children drafted into the Hospital for education, and how disposed of in each year, from the 25 of June 1796 to the 5 Jan. 1826 - - - - - p. 148
- No. 63.—A Return of the number of Children who died in the country, and whose deaths have been reported to the Hospital, from the 25 June 1796 to the 31 Dec. 1825 - - - p. 152
- No. 64.—A Statement of the number of Children apprenticed in the country and in Dublin respectively, for three years ending 5 Jan. 1826 - - - - - ibid.
- No. 65.—Weekly Report of Children in the Infirmary, of those discharged cured, and of those sent to the country for health, and of those that died in the Infirmary, from the 1 January 1823 to the 31 Dec. 1825 - - - - - p. 153
- No. 66.—Extracts from the Minutes of the Board, dated 10 and 17 June 1824 - - - p. 156

APPENDIX.

EXAMINATIONS:

Appendix, No. 1.

Examination of Mr. Thomas Finlay; Saturday, 30th October 1824.

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finlay,
30 October 1824.

YOU are Registrar of the Foundling Hospital?—I am.

How long have you held that office?—Since the 5th July 1823.

State the duties of your office?—I act as secretary to the board, and keep a registry of all the children in the place; I pay the nurses, and pay the different bills after they are passed by the board, and the drafts signed by the board; I pay them, and return them to the accountant.

Describe the different books kept in your custody?—There is a register at present kept, under my care, of the admission of infants into the hospital, stating their supposed age, name, parish, from whence sent, and the name and residence of the nurse; and an account of the payments made to the nurse during the time the child remains out, or until its death. The custody of that register is temporary, in consequence of the clerk in the Foundling Hospital having been discharged. I keep the register of the children drafted into the house for the purposes of education, and how they are disposed of; a register of those sent out as apprentices; and I keep a check ledger of nurses wages and payments.

Payments made by whom?—I should have said to check the pay papers when signed by the inspector; the children are inspected when the nurses are ordered in for payment, after the 5th July in each year. I keep a ledger to check those.

What was the cause of the dismissal of that clerk you referred to?—I cannot exactly say the cause: he was a very old man.

Was it for misconduct?—No.

Enumerate the other officers of the hospital?—The chaplain, the Rev. Henry Murray; accomptant, Mr. Hendrick; surgeon, Mr. Creighton; apothecary, Mr. Madgett; providore, J. W. Palmer; head nurse, Mrs. Ross; the head schoolmaster, Mr. Flinley; then there are three teachers under him, and an orderly master. In the female department there is Mrs. Innes, superintendent of the female schools.

Is there not a matron?—The housekeeper is called Matron.

Who is housekeeper?—Mrs. Clifford; she has an eye over the entire establishment; there are five class mistresses under her, the superintendent. There is also another school, called the Preparatory School; Miss Dillon is the mistress there, and one mistress under her. I have a clerk in my office.

The management of the hospital is vested in a board of governors?—Yes.

How often do they meet?—Every Thursday at 11 o'clock.

Do the ladies of Dublin continue to give the superintendence in the infant department they did some years ago?—There are governesses instituted to attend.

Have you any book that will show the number of the visits of the ladies at the institution, and the occasions upon which they were made?—No, there has been no book kept by me; the governesses keep a report book; they occasionally report to the governors any thing they see amiss.

Do you mean each one keeps a book of her own?—No, I believe not; the attending governess keeps one in her own possession.

Is that book now in the hospital?—No, I suppose the attending governess has it.

Who is that?—Mrs. Magee, the archbishop's lady, or Mrs. Ruxton.

About what number of children may now be in the house at the Foundling Hospital?—There are at present in the grown department 944; and in the preparatory school there are 191 female children, from seven to eight years of age.

State the number for which you have accommodation?—There is a preparatory school for female children of the age of seven years; there are at present 191 in that.

In the infant department, how many have you actually in the hospital?—That I cannot tell—probably ten to day; they generally send them out every day—the infant nurses come up every day—they get them out as soon as they can.

About how many children may you now have out at nurse?—I think on the 10th of October the number was 5,300, and about 170 children of different ages out for health; about 5,500 is the number.

How many could you accommodate altogether in the hospital?—I think the hospital could accommodate about 1,300 or 1,400; the establishment last year was 1,200 grown children, and it is now reduced to eleven: the governors thought it was rather too crowded.

Are there any particular disorders now prevalent among the children?—Measles and ophthalmia.

How many are ill of ophthalmia now?—I cannot tell—the total number in the infirmary this morning was 166, and they are discharged three times a-week by the surgeon.

How often does the surgeon attend?—Every day.

Are you aware of a considerable number of children being lately sent from the Foundling Hospital to the charter schools?—Yes, 500.

Are you aware that those children have very generally introduced the ophthalmia into those schools?—I have heard of it; but I have also heard that the ophthalmia was prevalent in the charter schools, and has been constantly so.

Was it any person's duty to ascertain the state of health of those children before they were sent out of the Foundling Hospital?—Yes, the surgeon's; the children selected were sent to him for inspection before the lists were made out for me.

Were the children sent out, generally speaking, the eldest in the Foundling Hospital?—No.

Mention the principle of selection?—The order of the board was, that the Reverend Henry Murray and the head schoolmaster should select the boys; the attending governesses and head schoolmistress the girls. The order for transferring the children from the hospital to the Incorporated Society was made some time before the payment of the country nurses, which is the usual time for drafting children from nurse. I do not know on what principle the selection was made.

You have stated, in conversation, that Monday next is the pay-day of the nurses?—Yes, the ensuing week is appointed for payment of dead badges and premiums to nurses.

Does that payment continue the whole week?—Yes; it is very troublesome and tedious.

About what time would it occupy?—If the nurses all came in, it would be done in two or three days; the time appointed is a week.

Would there be any inconvenience in discharging the business of that nature each day after four o'clock?—Yes, certainly, because I am obliged to examine the register of all those children; there is a particular investigation relative to the children who have died.

How many hours will you be occupied each day?—From ten till four o'clock.

What books is it necessary for you to have to pay the nurses?—The registries.

Appendix, No. 2.

Further Examination of Mr. Thomas Finlay; Friday, 19th November 1824.

IN what state are the accounts the Commissioners called for?—I sent them in this morning. 19 November 1824.

[The same were produced.]

Upon inspecting this return, it appears that the number of children in the infirmary exceeds the usual average; to what do you attribute that?—I asked the apothecary this morning the cause of it, and he mentioned that the principal were cases of slight ophthalmia and colds.

How long has the ophthalmia prevailed to any extent in the hospital?—Since July, the time the children were drafting in from the country.

Is it of that description which has been called Egyptian Ophthalmia?—I do not know indeed; it is very slight.

Does it in any instances assume an aggravated form?—I heard there was not a single bad case, that is, no eye has been lost; some of them look very sore.

Does the disease continue long upon the children?—I cannot exactly say; I should think not, for they are changing constantly; the surgeon discharges the hospital three times a week.

Are they subject to relapse?—I do not know.

Do you know what remedies are applied?—No.

Next to the ophthalmia, do you know what are the prevailing diseases in the infirmary?—Colds, I believe.

With the exception of ophthalmia, is the state of the children healthy?—The state of the children in the schools is very healthy; they look very well, the girls particularly.

Do the children from the country bring the ophthalmia with them, or do they catch it in the hospital?—I think they must have brought it with them last year; on drafting the children from the country, they were attacked with the ophthalmia, particularly the children in the preparatory school, who were separated from the other children.

Was it a prevailing disorder about the country before the children came?—I do not know; the surgeon said one day, when he was examined before the board, that the ophthalmia was very prevalent.

Is it found to be very contagious?—I should think so; I believe it is contagious.

Is it possible to use any means to prevent the children catching it of one another?—The best way, I believe, is to keep them separate.

When did the ophthalmia first make its appearance in the hospital?—I think in July last

Had you ever known it as an epidemic disease in the hospital before that?—It was last year, particularly among the younger children.

At what period?—The same period.

Was it ever in the hospital before last year?—I was not in the hospital before last year.

Are all the children ill of the ophthalmia included in the number of 213?—That was the total number returned to me as in the infirmary.

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finlay,
19 November 1824.

You consider all the children about the yards and in the school-rooms as free from ophthalmia?—Certainly; I suppose they are.

We observe, by this return, that, in the quarter ending the 5th of January 1823, the number of children returned into the hospital from nurse was eleven; that in the succeeding quarter it was thirty-eight, in the succeeding quarter ten, and in the quarter succeeding to that, namely, the quarter ending the 10th of October, it was 1,267; can you give any account of the immediate cause of that great drafting into the hospital from the country?—The period ordered for drafting the children in from the country is immediately after the 5th July, when the nurses receive their annual pay. The children are also taken from those who have nursed them badly, or in any way neglected them, and given to other nurses.

In the corresponding period of the year preceding, the number was about half as great—626; is there any mode of accounting why the number upon the 10th of October 1823 was double that on the 10th of October 1822?—200 children of the age of six and seven years were drafted into the preparatory school.

Who determines upon such occasions what shall be the number drafted into the hospital?—The governors order that the establishment shall be filled up at the drafting.

To what amount?—1,200.

But, in point of fact, 1,200 is not the limit?—1,200 was the limit previous to 1823, then there were 200 added.

In the present year, the quarter ending the 10th of October, the number returned into the hospital from nurse being 1,546, the total number in the hospital appeared to be 1,142, how do you account for that?—The children transferred to the Incorporated Society—there were 500 transferred to them.

There were only 244 transferred in that quarter?—256 were transferred before, and it was to replace the vacancies in the hospital.

It appears from this return, that, in the quarter ending the 10th of October 1824, there were 1,546 children drafted into the hospital from nurse; that, in the same quarter, there were 244 transferred from the hospital to the charter schools, and that the number in the hospital was only 1,142; in what manner do you account for the difference in the number?—I can account for it in this way: there were 160 infants received into the hospital in the same quarter.

But there were in the same quarter 892 children sent out to nurse?—There were 732 of those 1,546 returned children, and again sent to nurse, that leaves an increase of 814 received into the hospital.

Two hundred and forty-four were transferred?—Yes; there were also 169 apprenticed out of the hospital, four eloped, seven were given to their parents, and twenty-three died.

It would appear then, that in that quarter there were 160 infants received into the hospital, and 892 infants sent out of it; how long had the 732 infants, which constitute the difference between 160 and 892, been in the hospital before they were sent out to nurse?—Probably, from three days to a week each.

We observe, in this return, that, in the quarter ending the 10th of October 1824, there were 892 infants sent out to nurse from the hospital; you have stated that those infants had continued in the hospital on the average from three days to a week each; does it not necessarily follow there must have been received into the hospital, during the same period, about the same number of infants, namely, 892?—I think the return, when it states 892 infants, includes those returned from nurse, that came into the hospital, and also 160 admitted into the hospital as infants.

What do you mean by the expression in this return, "Infants sent out to nurse?"—The accounts are kept under that head in the hospital, and they are called infants as long as they remain at nurse, until they are drafted into the hospital to remain.

Under the head of "Infants sent out to nurse," are there included all the infants from three days old to a week sent into the hospital; will you describe what other class of infants you mean to include in the return under the number of 892?—All the children returned by the nurses of whatever description, and all sickly children sent out to nurse.

Do you mean that the nurses in the country returned into the hospital within that quarter such a number of infants, whom you afterwards sent out into the country during the quarter, as would account for the difference between the 160 and 892?—Certainly.

Is that rapid circulation of the children of constant occurrence?—No, only for the last two or three years, and during the general pay.

Describe for what causes the children are brought up from the country, and immediately returned again?—It is the regular way. There is required a certificate from the clergyman of the parish where the nurse resides, of their having been taken care of, and sent to church and to school, such children as are old enough. If the nurse does not bring those certificates, they are considered as unfit persons to have the care of children, and they are of course taken from them and given to other nurses.

What may be the most advanced ages of the children constituting the latter class, namely, those brought back from the country from improper nurses, and sent out to others?—From six years to ten; ten is the highest—those capable of receiving education.

Are we right in supposing, that under the number of 892 you mean not merely to include infants, properly so called, but children from six to ten years old?—Yes.

Are we right further in supposing, that the very great majority of the whole number of 892 is of the latter class?—Yes, certainly; all but 160.

Does not it occur to you, that the return requires very material correction in this respect?—It does.

In the documents in the hospital, is it usual to designate children ten years old as "infants?"

—As long as they are continued at nurse the accounts are kept under that head.

Have

Have not some of those remained at nurse till they were fourteen years old?—Not many latterly; occasionally children are brought in; children that are unhealthy; children that are sent out again immediately.

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finlay,
19 November 1824.

When so sent out, how long do they continue before they are disposed of?—Probably two or three years; they very often take them as apprentices, and they are bound to them as such.

In stating that the number of infants sent out to nurse was 892, you appear to us to be taking credit to the establishment for having disposed of 632 children, whom we should not consider as properly deserving the name of infants; namely, children from six to ten years old, who had been returned by the nurses into the hospital and sent out by you to other nurses; can you point out in this account where you debit the institution with the same number of 632 children, at the moment of their having been received into the hospital?—It will not appear upon this return in the way in which you require it to be made up; but they are brought into the house.

We observe, that, in the quarter ending the 5th of July 1824, there were 256 children transferred from the hospital to the charter schools; and in the ensuing quarter, 244; and those appear to be the only occasions in which any children have been transferred from the Foundling Hospital to the charter schools: can you state the cause of that transfer having been resorted to at the period in question?—I believe the reason was, to enable the governors to bring in the children of the age of eleven and twelve years, to reduce the number of old children in the country.

Were those children who were so drafted, children who had been for a series of years in the hospital, or were they children who had recently arrived from the nurses in the country?—I believe the greatest part of the first number had been received into the hospital between July 1823 and July 1824, and of the latter number most of them were immediately sent from the country to the charter schools: they merely passed through the hospital for the purpose of keeping the account.

Can you state the average age of the children whom you describe as having merely passed through the Foundling Hospital, in their way from the nurses to the charter schools?—I believe the average was about eleven or twelve.

Have you any document that would furnish to us the names of those children, and their respective ages?—I have.

[The witness was directed to supply a list of the names and ages of the 500 children drafted from the Foundling Hospital to the charter schools, and the periods during which each child had been in the hospital, and the places in the country where they had been nursed.]

You have said that in that quarter, namely, the quarter ending the 10th of October 1824, there were 244 children transferred to the charter schools; will you point out in this account any mention of that number having been received into the Foundling Hospital?—They are included in the 1,546.

By whom was the selection of children directed of those who were sent to the charter school?—The selection of the females was left to the governesses and the superintending or head mistress; the males were selected by the Rev. Mr. Murray, the chaplain, and the head schoolmaster.

Were there any suggestions or directions furnished to Mr. Murray and the schoolmaster by, or according to which, the selection was to be made?—No, the order was merely that they should select them.

What do you conceive is the greatest age of any of the children now at nurse in the country?—I believe, as well as I recollect, there are about 100, or something more, above eleven years of age.

Are there not any of twelve?—I am not quite certain; I do not think there are many.

Are there any thirteen?—There may be a few not accounted for, not yet come in: from ten years to twelve or thirteen years of age, there are, I believe, about 120 that did not appear for pay last August; the nurses have been written to about them.

[The witness was directed to furnish a return of the total number of children now at nurse in the country, and to specify the numbers of those that are now under the age of one year; what number more than one, and less than two, and so on, to the highest age.]

—There are about 180 that are old children of those that have been in the hospital and are sickly, but still at nurse under the head of "Children at nurse."

Can you state on recollection what was the greatest age of any children drafted into the charter schools?—I should suppose there were a few of fifteen or sixteen; I am not quite sure; I cannot exactly say.

Whose business is it to regulate the terms of the apprenticeship, and the number apprenticed out?—The superintendents of the school. When they have any children fit to go out they send their names to the chaplain; they are then examined by the chaplain, and if he approves of them, he returns them to the board, and the board order them to be put on the apprentice list.

Have you any particular duties connected with the apprenticing of the children?—I apprentice them*.

In what manner do you find masters for them?—The clergyman sends up a printed form, and a sealed letter directed to me, describing the character of the person applying.

What clergyman?—Of the different parishes.

* See Mr. Finlay's Letter of the 20th November, appended to this Evidence.

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finlay,
19 November 1824.

It appears there were 169 children apprenticed during the quarter ending the 10th of October 1824; about what proportion of that number were apprenticed in Dublin?—Very few, scarcely any.

Is there any particular reason for that?—The fact is, the masters in the country do better for them; in Dublin they often elope; in the country there are very few elopements.

[The witness was directed to ascertain and state the number apprenticed in the country and Dublin respectively, in each quarter, for the last two years; also a return of the number of children that have been apprenticed at the factory at Buncrana.]

With respect to the children apprenticed in Dublin, is it the duty of any particular officer to ascertain the circumstances and character of their intended masters and mistresses?—It is the duty of the chaplain, registrar, providore, and apothecary, to take it in turn, when applications are made from the city, to go to the houses of the applicants and inspect the places, and report the same.

One fourth of that duty devolves upon you?—Yes.

In what manner do you execute it?—I examine whether so far as is stated in the return is correct; and inquire, as well as I can, into their means, and judge from the appearance of the place.

Do you, in every instance, feel bound to have a personal communication with the master or mistress?—Yes.

Have you reason to believe you have often been deceived by such persons?—No, I do not think I have; for I do not think I have certified for more than three since I went to the hospital.

Do you find there is, in general, a sufficiently full demand for apprentices to relieve you of the number you wish to dispose of?—Latterly, a greater demand than we could supply.

Does that observation apply to Dublin, or Ireland generally?—Ireland generally.

You say, at present, the demand is greater than the supply; can you state at what period there was not so great a demand for apprentices as you could have desired?—I think it is within the last two years the demand has increased.

Is there any manner in which you can account for that increased demand?—No, I cannot account for it: the country people are anxious to get the children as apprentices; very respectable people come from the country for them.

Is there any fee given with a child when it is apprenticed?—£. 2. on going out, and 2*l.* at the third year, upon the certificate of the clergyman of the good conduct of both parties.

In cases where it happens that the master or mistress die, or misconduct themselves, what becomes of the apprentices?—Generally the clergyman of the parish states the fact to the board, and recommends another master, and the board sanctions the transfer.

Have you never found any practical difficulties in your way of acting upon that principle of transfer?—No, I have not; there have been very few instances of it.

Instances must sometimes occur of gross misconduct on the part of the apprentice, how do you arrange in such a case, as the master may decline any longer to keep him?—The magistrate must dispose of that; the governors have not the power.

Have you any means of ascertaining how, at any certain period, the present for instance, any considerable portion of your apprentices are conducting themselves?—From the report of people coming for apprentices, (many of them coming the second time for apprentices,) the general report has been latterly, that the apprentices have conducted themselves very well.

Can you form any judgment as to the relative estimation in which apprentices from the Foundling Hospital and charter schools are held by masters and mistresses in the country?—No, I cannot; there is a little stigma upon the children of the Foundling Hospital sometimes.

We have understood there is a stigma also upon the charter-school children; we wish for the benefit of your opinion as to which class the stigma rests most strongly upon?—I cannot form any opinion.

Can you form any opinion as to which is considered more desirable, to take an apprentice from a parochial school in Dublin, where the children are lodged and dieted, or from the Foundling Hospital?—No, I cannot; I should myself, if I wanted an apprentice, take one from the Foundling Hospital.

Could you suggest any individuals to us who would be more likely than others to be able to tell us how large a number of those apprentices have practically turned out well in life?—I should think the clergymen of the different parishes where they have been sent apprentices.

Are there any parishes which more than others are in the habit of taking a number of those apprentices?—Yes, there are.

Name any such parishes?—The parish of Wicklow, the parish of Rathdrum, the parish of Arklow; a great many.

Have you any means of forming an opinion as to whether many of those apprentices become Roman-catholics?—Not with certainty.

Have you no means whatever?—No; if they serve the master for three years, the master cannot be paid the second fee without a certificate from the clergyman and churchwardens, stating that the children have regularly attended the church.

Do you apprentice children to Roman-catholic masters or mistresses?—No, never.

Do you consider the present amount of the apprentice fee as necessary in order to insure a sufficient demand from masters and mistresses?—I think it is sufficient, as there is a greater demand than can be supplied.

Do you think, if no apprentice fee were to be given, that any considerable demand would continue?—I cannot say; it appears some years ago the hospital was very full, and and overstocked with old children fit to go out, the governors then gave the fee, and it has been continued ever since.

Do you mean that antecedent to that period there was no fee given?—Yes; it was about five or six years ago the fee was first given.

[The witness was directed to ascertain when that regulation was made.]

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finlay
19 November 1824.

LETTER from Mr. Thomas Finlay to the Commissioners of Education Inquiry.

"Gentlemen,

Foundling Hospital, Dublin, November 20th, 1824.

"I BEG leave to correct that part of my testimony yesterday, in answer to your question 'Who apprenticed the children from the Foundling Hospital?' I should have added, 'that when the recommendations of persons applying for apprentices are received by me, they are laid before a board of governors, specially summoned for that purpose on the first Thursday in each month; the applicants are then personally examined by the governors, and if approved of, an order is made for granting the apprentices applied for, which is my authority for executing the indentures on the part of the governors.'

"I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,

"The Commissioners of Education Inquiry,
&c. &c. &c. }

"Your very obedient and humble servant,
"Thos. Finlay, Regr."

Appendix, No. 3.

Further Examination of Mr. Thomas Finlay; Monday, 19th December 1825.

THE following Papers were shown to the witness, and he was desired to furnish a continuation of the same, including the quarter ending the 5th of January 1826:—

19 December 1825.

"Weekly report of Children admitted into the infirmary of the Foundling Hospital.

"Statement showing the number of Infants admitted into the hospital, and of those at nurse in the country; and of Grown Children drafted into the hospital for education, and how disposed of; in each quarter from the 5th of January 1813, to the 10th of October 1824.

"A general statement of the Receipts of the Foundling Hospital in Dublin, from the 24th of June 1798, to the 5th of January 1824; and also for one year and a half, ending the 24th of June 1797.

"A statement showing the number of Infants admitted, and the Children at nurse in the country; and of Grown Children drafted into the hospital for education, and how disposed of; in each year from the 25th of June 1796, to the 10th of October 1824.

"A statement of the number of Children apprenticed in the country and in Dublin respectively, in each quarter for two years, ending the 10th of October 1824; and of the number of Children apprenticed to Mr. James Wilson, Buncrana Factory.

"A statement of the number of Children transferred from Roman-catholic to Protestant Nurses, in the years 1823 and 1824.

"A statement of the total number of Children at nurse in the country, on the 10th of October 1824, specifying the number of each age.

"Weekly report of Children admitted into the infirmary from the preparatory school.

"An account of the number of Children received into the hospital, and of those sent out to the country, and of those returned to the hospital from the country, and of those who died in the hospital, and of those who were apprenticed out, or otherwise disposed of, and of the number of children at nurse in the country, and of those in the hospital and in the infirmary thereof, in each quarter from the 5th of January 1803, to the 10th of October 1824."

We have observed, with the deepest regret, the loss which the Foundling Hospital has sustained, shortly after our last examination, by the death of Mrs. Magee, who had given to it such great attention. We would beg to ask generally whether her place has been in any and what degree supplied by other ladies?—There are none who have given it the same degree of attention, and I do not think it possible to find any lady who could give the same attention. Mrs. Ruxton, Mrs. Cleghorn, and Mrs. Alexander Hamilton, have attended frequently.

It is generally understood that each month has a visiting lady appropriated to it, who undertakes to give to the hospital her peculiar attention during that time?—Yes, but for the last year they have not done so. Mrs. Magee attended constantly, and the committee of governesses met generally on board days.

We are aware that Mrs. Magee had, in a great degree, superseded the necessity of that monthly arrangement while she lived, but we wish to be informed whether, since you were so unfortunate as to lose the benefit of her attendance, the original arrangement has been again resorted to, of a lady taking a month to herself; or whether there are two or three who take it upon themselves entirely?—I think the arrangement is, that the ladies shall take it for a month each.

Could you name to us what ladies have taken it for any of the last nine months?—I cannot say that any governess has taken a month regularly since Mrs. Magee's death: Mrs. Ruxton, Mrs. Cleghorn, the Hon. Mrs. Hamilton, and Mrs. Alexander Hamilton, have met from time to time. Mrs. Cleghorn has attended constantly.

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finlay,
19 December 1825.

Has there been any month, so far as you know, during which no lady has visited the Foundling Hospital?—No, I am certain there has not been a month without a visitor.

Is it your impression that any particular department of the Foundling Hospital has become materially deteriorated, in consequence of the withdrawing of that degree of superintendence we have alluded to?—No, the plans laid down by Mrs. Magee are followed as far as possible.

Is it your impression that the preparatory school is going on as well now as during her superintendence?—Yes, I think the schools in general are going on as well.

We speak of the preparatory school in particular, because we understood it to be peculiarly her own plan?—I think it is going on very well.

Is the infirmary more or less full now than upon the average of five or ten years past?—I believe it is less full now than it has been for years. I was speaking to the surgeon on Friday, and he said he never recollected the infirmary so well as at present.

Was there any ophthalmia in the summer or autumn in the Foundling Hospital?—Very little: there was the usual ophthalmia among the children coming in, but nothing equal to what we have had.

Was it greater or less than a fair average of years?—I should think it much less; and the reason, I believe, is in consequence of the system adopted last year, of bringing in the children as vacancies occur, by which means but few children, comparatively, were drafted into the hospital in July and August last.

We ask you generally for information, that will appear more fully in the accounts; has the number apprenticed in the year now elapsed been materially less or greater than it was in years past?—The demand has been equal, but there has not been the same number fit to be apprenticed; the children are very young; I think about 200 was the number.

Has the number of admissions been about the same as during the two or three last years?—Less.

What may be about the number admitted in the last year?—440 is the present number; that is about seventy less than the year preceding.

Can you attribute that to any particular cause?—No.

Can you account in any manner for the diminution in the number admitted in the last year compared with the preceding one?—No, I cannot.

Do you consider, as far as you can form a judgment, that the numbers sent up for admission are in a progressive state of diminution, and that they are likely to be less in the year coming on than they were in the last year?—No, I cannot say that; since the commencement of the law requiring 5*l.* to be paid on admission, the number of the two first years was nearly the same I think.

Is the diminution in the children sent in from the country, or those sent in from Dublin?—I cannot state that without reference to the registry.

[The witness was desired to furnish such information.]

Has there been any correspondence of peculiar interest upon the subject of the admission of children from country clergymen, or others, with the board?—No, not from country clergymen; there was a communication from Mr. Spring Rice to Mr. Goulburn upon the subject of the Foundling Hospital in Limerick referred to the governors.

What was the purport of it?—That they had admitted a number of children into the Foundling Hospital in Limerick, and that their funds were exhausted. The children would have been received here if they had been sent agreeably to the Act of Parliament.

Have you heard of any particular complaints of infanticide, in consequence of the restriction in the admission?—No, I have not.

Are you, from any source, prepared to offer any opinion upon the subject?—No, I am not.

We would wish to direct your attention to the following minute, of the 10th of June 1824: “Ordered, that, at the ensuing pay, all the children above the age of four years, and who are now with Roman-catholic nurses, be transferred to Protestant nurses.” And upon the 17th of the same June, there is this addition made to that resolution: “With reference to the order made last board-day, respecting the removal of children above four years old from Roman-catholic nurses, a return having been made of 4,200 children on the books above the age of four years; Resolved, that said order be amended by adding to it the words, ‘so far as may be practicable.’” Be so good as to state to us generally in what manner those two orders have been acted upon in the time that has since elapsed?—In the pay of 1824 it was impossible to comply fully with the order; there was not sufficient time, nor was it supposed that a sufficient number of Protestant nurses could be had. Mr. Murray examined all the children that were supposed fit to go to school, and those that he found totally ignorant he marked to be transferred.

Speaking of the pay-day that has elapsed in the present year, what arrangements were made in respect to that resolution?—From the age of five years old and upwards the children were removed, as far as practicable, from the Roman-catholic nurses, that is, as many as there was accommodation for during the time necessary for them to remain in the hospital, and Protestant nurses ready to receive them.

Are we to understand that all the children above five years old, who were with Roman-catholic nurses, were, on the pay-day in the present year, removed to Protestant nurses?—Most of them.

Were any steps taken to procure a sufficient attendance of Protestant nurses to take them?—I had a communication with several clergymen, and they almost all mentioned that there were plenty of Protestant nurses; it was supposed there were not, and I took steps to ascertain it.

Was your communication made in the nature of a circular?—There was a circular sent by by the permission of the Archbishop of Dublin, the Bishop of Ferns, and the Bishop of Kildare, through their respective dioceses, requesting the clergy to send up Protestant nurses.

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finlay,
19 December 1825.

[The witness was directed to furnish a copy of the circular alluded to.]

Was it of a nature that required an answer?—No.

Did the clergymen answer it?—No, they did not acknowledge the receipt of it; they acted upon it.

In what manner did the clergymen intimate there were plenty of nurses?—By sending them at the general pay.

Were there any letters written by the clergymen, stating the fact that Protestant nurses could be procured?—I do not immediately recollect. I had spoken to several clergymen at the hospital on the subject, and they told me Protestant nurses were to be had.

But so far as you recollect there were no communications to the board, or to you, in any way referring to this minute, or the subject of it?—I cannot immediately recollect that there was, but I will let you know.

Will you prepare for us a statement of all the children who have been transferred from Roman-catholic to Protestant nurses, in pursuance of that resolution, from the time it was past to the present, distinguishing the parishes to which they were sent, and the name of the rector of each parish?—Certainly.

Are we to understand that, as soon as we have obtained that return, we may come to the conclusion that no children above the age of five years remain in the hands of Roman-catholic nurses?—No, there are some; there were a few particular applications made by clergymen to allow them to remain, that is, particular children to remain under their immediate inspection.

Surely such communications must be in writing?—Very few, if any; the applications were made personally.

We will beg to call for a return of any correspondence, of whatever nature, that has passed between any clergymen of the Established Church and any officer or governor of the Foundling Hospital, upon the subject of that minute?—I will furnish such information. A number of clergymen when they come to town call at the hospital.

Are we to understand that no children above the age of five years remain in the hands of Roman-catholic nurses, except where a clergyman has especially interfered to desire that they may be left there?—No; there are some of the oldest children, those now fit to be drafted in to fill up any vacancies that occur. It was considered by the governors better to leave those children to fill the vacancies, than to change them for the short time they had to remain out, as probably they will all be brought in before July next.

We will beg for the name of every child above five years old who continues in the custody of a Roman-catholic nurse, distinguishing such as remain in that custody in consequence of the suggestion of a Protestant clergyman to that effect, from those who remain in that custody from any other cause; the return further distinguishing the ages of such children respectively?—Certainly.

Upon what occasion were the transfers effected from the Roman-catholic to the Protestant nurses?—At the general pay that takes place in July and August: the children are brought up once a year for inspection and payment of the nurses.

But not at other times?—No.

We will beg for a return of the several days upon which any transfers have been made in reference to this minute, and the numbers transferred in each day?—It shall be furnished.

Have you any means of knowing how the principle of transferring the children has answered in practice; and first, whether the dry nurses, if we may so call them, as far as you can collect, take due care of the children?—I have no doubt they do.

Is it a sum of 3*l.* or 4*l.* that is allowed to each nurse?—£.3. this year; but in the new currency it will be for infants, 3*l.* for nurses wages, and a gratuity of 2*l.* for good nursing; and from the age of one year and upwards 3*l.* and a gratuity payable to the nurse of 5*s.* on the clergyman's certificate.

The question is, when a child is transferred from a Roman-catholic to a Protestant nurse at five or six years of age, what is the allowance to the Protestant nurse?—£.3. British, from the 5th July last, the period the year commences, and the gratuity of 5*s.* as before stated. There is no difference between the pay of a Protestant or Roman-catholic nurse.

There was a good deal of evidence offered to the Commissioners last year that such allowance was too small, and that it would require 4*l.* to procure a sufficient degree of application from Protestant nurses of any degree of respectability to take charge of the children; are we to collect it as your opinion, derived from experience, that 4*l.* is not necessary?—My opinion is that 3*l.* was too little, and that an increase was necessary.

But it has not been increased?—It is increased by their being to be paid in the new currency, and by the gratuity of 5*s.*

Is there any increased rate of allowance for children in the hands of those Protestant dry nurses above the age of five years?—It has been ordered by the board that a gratuity of 10*s.* in addition shall be paid through the clergymen of the parishes, to be laid out by them in aid of the education and clothing of the children from the age of five years old and upwards.

Do the clergy correspond upon that subject with the board?—They have not done so; the regulation was decided on last Thursday.

Is it intended that the correspondence in question on the part of clergymen should be carried on by filling up printed forms of certificates, or otherwise?—A circular will be sent to the clergymen stating the regulation.

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finley,
19 December 1825.

Have you ever met with any clergymen who were not disposed to take the trouble of superintending concerns of that nature?—I have not.

Have you always experienced a readiness to undertake it?—Yes, I have always experienced a readiness on the part of the clergymen to co-operate with the governors.

In case of the non-residence of the rector, we presume you look to the curate?—Yes.

Have you any reason to suppose that there is any parish in any diocese to which you have referred where you are not likely to meet with a sufficient degree of superintendence either from the rector or curate upon that subject?—I cannot say that.

Experience has not suggested to you any ground for entertaining such an apprehension?—No; I think there has been a great wish on the part of the clergy to assist.

We observe a particular heading in several of the accounts, of "Children who have died at nurse," are we right in our apprehension that that heading in fact includes not only all the children who have died, but also all those who have been retained by their nurses from principles of affection, and who, though not returned to the hospital, are nevertheless really alive in the country?—It includes those unaccounted for as well as those dead.

Under the head of "Children unaccounted for," of course are comprised all those who have remained with their nurses, and grown up to manhood?—Those who have been three years without appearing; that has been the system adopted.

When a child actually dies, is there not a demand for payment almost invariably made by the nurse, founded upon what is called a dead certificate?—Yes, there are two periods in the year appointed for such payments.

You could of course make a return to the Commissioners of the number of dead certificates that have been acted upon in each succeeding year?—Yes.

[The witness was directed to furnish such information since 1797.]

Are we right in supposing, that if we subtract the number of dead certificates from the number whom you state officially to have died, the difference will constitute nearly the number of children who may have been retained from motives of affection by the nurses?—The number will be those unaccounted for, either those retained, or those that have died, and have not been reported.

Is it your opinion there is any material number of children who die, that do not become the subjects of those dead certificates?—I think there are but few at present.

Any considerable number?—Not a considerable number; very few.

Is Mr. Flinley still the master of the school?—Yes, he is.

Have any new masters or mistresses been appointed in any of the schools since we examined them?—The superintendent, Mrs. Innes, has been superannuated.

Is that the only change?—Miss Dillon has been promoted to superintend the general school; she was at the preparatory school.

Who superintends the preparatory school?—Miss Surridge.

Was she a foundling girl?—No; she is, I believe, the daughter or sister of a clergyman.

Can you give us any information as to the state of the school for the education of schoolmasters, that was in the course of establishment in the hospital last year?—No.

Does it go forward?—Yes, there have been several in it, and some have been examined and sent out as parish clerks and schoolmasters, I believe.

Does it fall within any part of your official duty to take any cognizance of that institution?—No.

You cannot give us the names or number?—No.

To whom ought we to apply?—To the Rev. Mr. Aickin.

Does he keep all the accounts?—Yes.

Does he make use of the children of the Foundling Hospital to illustrate the lesson he may give the masters in the art of teaching?—Yes.

Do the candidate masters teach the children in the children's school, or are the children carried into the new institution?—They are carried into the new institution.

The candidate teachers do not go into the children's school?—No.

About what number of children are supplied for that purpose?—At present only twenty-four; they are to take 100 and educate them.

Are they only boys they take charge of?—Boys only.

Have you had any communications from the Incorporated Society in writing, or in any other way, since you were last examined with respect to the 500 children drafted from the Foundling Hospital into the charter schools?—A demand for a number to replace vacancies.

They wish you to keep up the supply?—Yes, the 500 for the charter schools.

Have those applications been made by letter?—Yes, there is a draft making at present.

[The witness was directed to furnish a copy of all correspondence in reference to any further supplies of children from the Foundling Hospital to the Incorporated Society.]

What number is the present demand for?—One hundred and eleven.

By what authority?—There was a letter from the Incorporated Society.

Has there been any letter from the Lord Lieutenant, or any other authority, authorizing the transfer?—No; a letter was sent to me, stating that there were vacancies for that number, and I was required to take steps to have them supplied; I laid the letter before the board, and I was ordered to supply that number.

[The witness was directed to furnish a copy of all orders of the board upon the subject.]

Have any children been supplied?—Sixteen are to go off to-morrow morning to charter schools.

Have

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finlay,
19 December 1825.

Have any children been sent to the charter schools subsequent to the draft of 500 from the Foundling Hospital?—Yes.

What number?—I cannot exactly tell, I think twenty-five on one occasion.

When was that draft made?—I think in the April quarter.

We will beg for a statement of the names and ages of all children who have at any period been transferred from the Foundling Hospital to the charter schools, subsequent to the draft of 500 above adverted to?—It shall be furnished.

Did the applications from the Incorporated Society state upon that occasion when the twenty-five were sent, what number of children their vacancies enabled them to receive?—I think it stated that there were vacancies for so many.

The question went to inquire whether the total number that the Incorporated Society offered to take were sent?—They were; whatever they wrote for, and said there were vacancies for, were sent.

Do we understand you now to say there is accommodation for 111?—Yes.

Can you explain why only sixteen are to be sent?—They are taken in drafts of so many each week.

Has any order passed the board for affording weekly supplies of such children until the 111 be filled up?—I was ordered to supply them with 111 children of a certain standing in the house.

Boys or girls?—All boys.

From the house or from the country?—Those in the house that have been in one year.

Is it left to your discretion as to the manner in which to select them?—The order was that those 111 should be selected by Mr. Murray and me.

And in what manner do you propose to regulate that selection?—To take them from the drafts that came in in 1824, beginning at the last that came in that year; and if they are not passed by the surgeon in the way ordered, to take the next in rotation.

Do you mean you will begin at the first children who came in in 1824 from the country?—At the last that came in in 1824.

Why will you exclude the children who came in in 1823 from their chance?—Those children will be fit to be apprenticed in the ensuing year from the hospital, if there should be a sufficient demand.

Will you proceed by taking the seniors in point of admission who have come in since the beginning of 1824?—I propose to take the last sixteen on the list.

Can you collect whether the children themselves consider it a promotion, being sent to the charter schools, or view it with dislike?—I have no opportunity of knowing that; the selection is made the day before they are to go.

You have witnessed the selection of twenty-five sent already?—Yes.

Did you make the selection?—No, they were drafted from the country.

Have you had any opportunity of observing whether the children liked or disliked being sent off to charter schools, or whether it appeared a matter of indifference?—It appeared a matter of indifference; they came to my office to be examined, and to have the necessary entries made in the registry.

They evinced neither joy nor sorrow?—No.

They know where they are going?—Yes, they know they are going to the charter schools.

What do you conceive will turn out to be the average age of those twenty-five?—I cannot say exactly as to the twenty-five; I believe about ten or eleven, but those going to-morrow it will be, I think, eleven and twelve.

In what manner are they conveyed from the hospital?—In a carriage; they are to take them off from the hospital immediately on their way to the country.

Will you describe the carriage in which they are conveyed?—I have not seen it.

Is it a coach or chaise?—I should not think that it was either; I have not seen it.

Do the whole go in one carriage?—I do not know.

What carriage will come for them to-morrow?—A caravan, they call it.

Who will be the person into whose custody they are to be delivered by the officers of the Foundling Hospital?—Vickers is the name of the person.

Where are they to be sent?—Strangford.

Have you any knowledge whether those children are to be taken to the society's house in Aungier-street, or to be transmitted directly to the country?—I believe they are to be sent to the country direct.

Are we distinctly to understand, that in making the selection of the twenty-five in question, there was no principle attended to of getting rid of children, who either from deformity or any material defect in understanding, might be considered the least desirable to be in the hospital?—No; certainly not.

Is that a feeling that will enter into your consideration in making the selection of fifteen?—Decidedly not.

On the other hand, you would not select the very best on the principle of promotion?—The way I propose doing it is to let the last sixteen drafted in 1824 be taken and sent to the surgeon for examination.

[The witness was directed to furnish immediately a copy of the correspondence respecting the children to be sent to the charter schools.]

Appendix, No. 4.

Further Examination of Mr. Thomas Finlay; Saturday, 21st January 1826.

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finlay,
21 January 1826.

THERE are some Papers which you, as registrar of the Foundling Hospital, were called on to produce the last day you were examined, relative to the correspondence of the clergy of the Established Church with the hospital, respecting their superintendence of the children in the country and procuring Protestant nurses; have they been prepared?—I have brought with me the correspondence upon that subject.

Do you mean the whole correspondence?—Yes.

Produce the papers you have brought.

[The witness delivered in the same.]

What you have now delivered in is the whole of the correspondence upon that subject?—The whole of the correspondence upon that subject.

Do those papers which you have now delivered in contain the whole of the correspondence upon that subject?—To the best of my belief they do.

Can you state what is the actual number of the children now in the Foundling Hospital, the infant, the preparatory school, and the grown department?—The return sent in of the number on the 5th of January states, within one or two, I believe of the present number.

[The Return was handed to the witness.]

Will you have the goodness to ascertain exactly how many children were in the Foundling Hospital, in the preparatory school, and the grown department, on the 5th of January last?—The grown department includes the preparatory. There were 1,305 children in the hospital, for education, on the 5th January; and twelve infants remained in the nursery on that day.

Of the 1,305, can you state how many were in the preparatory school?—206.

Does that appear upon the face of the return?—No, it does not; the establishment of the preparatory school is 200, but there are occasionally a few more or less.

Then are we to understand that about 1,300 children, of whom 200 are in the preparatory school, form at present, in your view, a fair average of the number contained within the walls of the establishment?—That is the establishment ordered to be kept up. I order in children to supply any vacancies that may occur.

Then we are to understand that it is neither 1,200 nor 1,400, but that 1,300 is the regular number?—Yes, that is the present establishment.

Was it ever carried so high as 1,400 of late years?—I think in August 1824 there were 1,400 children in the house, but it was but for a short time.

What do you conceive is the annual expense of maintaining a certain number of children in the hospital, beyond its usual establishment, meaning their diet, clothing, and any additional expenses their admission may put the establishment to?—I cannot tell exactly.

Suppose 100 grown children were brought into the hospital, and left there for a year, what would be the increase of expense to the establishment in consequence?—As near as I can recollect I should think between 600*l.* and 700*l.*

Is it your impression that a child is fed and clothed in the hospital for between 6*l.* and 7*l.* a year?—It is; I think it has been done for less than 7*l.* per annum.

[The witness was requested upon his return home to consider that matter maturely, and to write a letter to the Board, stating what the fact is, and in what manner it is made up.]

(Witness.)—The estimate for diet this year is 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per day; but the estimate for clothing I cannot tell. I think together it is under 7*l.*

[The witness was informed that the Commissioners wished to have exact information on the subject.]

Would 100 children more cause any additional expense to the institution, except their victuals and their clothing?—I think it certainly would require another master or mistress for them; it appears to me there are too few at present.

[The witness was desired to furnish a detailed account of the Annual Expenditure of the Foundling Hospital for the last seven years.]

Has any alteration lately taken place with respect to the head of "Allowances made to the country nurses"?—There has; I stated, in my last examination, that the rate of the nurses wages is continued at 3*l.* per year, but in British currency.

It was previously 3*l.* Irish?—It was; there is also a gratuity of five shillings, payable to the nurse, upon her producing the clergyman's certificate.

Can you state what number of children have of late been put under the care of those Protestant nurses, to whom the children have been transferred from the Catholic nurses?—I think in some cases there have been as many as six children transferred to one nurse.

Have the cases been frequent where the nurse has only got one child?—Several cases.

Where a nurse has got six children, she will have 18*l.* per annum for taking care of them?—£. 18. British, and 5*s.* gratuity for each of the children; and an allowance for clothing, &c. paid through the clergy, of 10*s.* for such children as are above the age of five years.

We observe from the return which has been made, that the number of clergymen to whom the care of the children is confided is exactly 100; was that the result of chance, or was it so intended?—It was mere chance.

Is it to be understood that the number is not to be increased?—No, certainly not; there is no limitation.

We believe they are confined to three dioceses, Dubin, Ferns and Kildare?—Yes; there are very few in Meath.

We

We observe that in the list you have furnished us of the clergymen who have undertaken to attend to the children, a considerable number of curates; we beg to know what distinction the governors make in the cases on which they would communicate with the rector, and those on which they would communicate with the curate?—There is no regulation upon the subject, either curate or rector, whoever recommends the nurse is considered sufficient.

We presume then that the board addresses the circular letter to the rector?—To the minister of the parish.

And then whoever, the rector or the curate, answers the letter, becomes the correspondent of the board?—Yes.

Do you find that the number of Protestant nurses at present recommended by those correspondents, is fully adequate to take off the number of children, that you wish to place in their hands?—I think the number is fully adequate to take them off.

You will observe in the return which you have made us, that the total number of children admitted into the hospital since the year 1796, amounts to 52,150; of whom it is stated, that there have died in the country 25,859; you have stated upon a former occasion that that latter number, however, included not merely the actual deaths ascertained by dead certificates, but also all children of whom the board had ceased to hear for three years, that all the latter were presumed to be dead, and so inserted in that column; are the Commissioners right in their apprehension that such was the tenour of your evidence?—That was the tenour of my evidence.

It now appears by another return you have made us, that the number of children whose deaths have been actually certified to the hospital, amount only to 16,237, the difference is 9,622, which we presume constitutes the amount of the children of whom the board has ceased to hear for three years consecutively, but whose deaths were not certified to the hospital?—Yes.

We wish to know your own impression of what is become of those 9,622 children?—My impression is that the greater number of them are dead.

What leads you to that conclusion?—Formerly, on giving out an infant to nurse, the sum of 5s. was paid in advance to the nurse at the time she took the child; the child often died a very short time after it was so taken out, and the wages due at the time of its death probably not much exceeding the sum advanced, the nurse might not take the trouble of looking for it.

Are you not aware that that would account only for such children as died in the hands of the nurses, within about one month from the time that the nurse received the child?—It would account for that proportion, and which I think is considerable.

For that proportion only?—For that proportion only who died within a short period after they had been taken out; a nurse would not come forty or fifty miles to receive a few shillings.

That would account for that proportion only during the period at which the practice to which you have referred prevailed?—Yes.

When did it cease to exist?—I cannot state it from memory.

Go as near as you can?—About seven or eight years ago, I believe.

Then you conceive that the number of 9,622 includes all such children as died in the hands of nurses within the period of a month after they were delivered to them, and refers to a period of seven or eight years ago?—I think it includes a large proportion of them.

What other class of children do you think that number includes?—A number of older children who may have died shortly after the general pay in each year, and from the small sum of wages then due the nurses have not applied, and there are some who may have been detained from affection.

Could not the nurses, without putting themselves to much trouble, receive any fractional amount of wages?—No, they must appear at the hospital, produce a certificate of the death, and be examined on oath.

What has been the least amount of money collected on a dead certificate?—I have paid a shilling, I believe, in one or two instances.

We understand then that a nurse has thought it worth her while to apply for a shilling?—I think she did not in such case come solely for that purpose; she must have had other business.

Have you very frequently paid money on dead certificates to a less amount than 5s.?—I think not; I believe very few have applied for so small a sum as 5s. or 10s.

What do you conceive to be the average amount of the fractional payments so demanded?—I think the average is above a pound.

Could you exhibit any account that would enable us to judge for ourselves of the nature of the amount paid on the dead certificates; are the payments kept in a separate book?—They are.

[The witness was requested to furnish the same.]

Is the personal attendance of the nurse ever dispensed with?—No.

In no cases?—In no case since my appointment; I never heard of any.

Do you think that a nurse often does not bring a child to the hospital, when it approaches the age of six or seven years, in order to avoid the risk of having the child taken from her?—This is certainly the case; but it is for the purpose of holding the child until the following year, and of receiving two years payment, but not from affection, as I conceive; I think, the proportion is very small of those who have been detained from motives of affection.

On what grounds do you come to that conclusion, considering it right to apprise you, that

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finlay,
21 January 1826.

that it is a different conclusion from that to which other witnesses have come residing on the spot?—From an examination of the registries of the children of each year's admission: those books are made up as soon as possible after the children have been drafted into the hospital; they are now made up to 1812. I have taken a memorandum of the numbers who were paid for to within a year or two of the period for drafting them: the nurses know very nearly the time the children will be taken into the hospital, and if they have received pay to within a year or two of that time, those children may in such cases have been detained from affection.

We beg you to explain yourself a little more distinctly?—On examining the registries of the children as far as they have been completed, I have taken a memorandum of the numbers of those children whom I suppose to have been detained from affection.

We beg to know in the first instance upon what principle you have satisfied your own mind as to the cause of detention?—I consider the cases in question to be chiefly those in which the children have been paid for, up to within a year or two of the supposed time for their being drafted into the hospital.

In what manner did you ascertain the number of children that you suppose to have been detained?—From the numbers appearing on the registry on the principle just mentioned.

We observe from the return you have made us, that in the year ending the 5th of January 1801, the number stated to have died in the country is 1,298; and we observe that in another return you have made us of the number of children whose deaths have been reported to the hospital in the same time, there have been only 524; the difference of 774 children whom you return to have died, but whose deaths have not been reported to you, forms an item in the account which we wish you to explain—what do you conceive really to have become of those 774 children?—I conclude that those 774 were the children who were not reported to the hospital to have died, and who had not been brought for payment for three years previous.

Do you conceive them to be alive or dead at the time to which the question refers?—I conceive that the greater number of them must have been dead at the time the account was made up.

And that the nurses of course had voluntarily foregone the remuneration to which they were entitled for the fractional period of the year in which the child had lived?—I do.

Have the goodness to reconcile that with an answer you have given on a former day in these words—you were asked: "Is it your opinion that there is any material number of children who die, who do not become the subjects of these dead certificates;" and your answer first, "I think there are but few at present." You were then asked whether there was any considerable number, and you answered first, "not a considerable number;" and you afterwards corrected your evidence by adding the words, "very few." Reconcile that evidence with what you now state to us?—I stated "at present," meaning at the present time.

Do you mean to take a distinction between the state of things at present, and the state of things in 1801?—I do.

State the distinction?—The distinction will be seen on reference to my evidence here this day, relative to the nurses getting 5s. on taking the children out, and many of them dying at a period when there was so small a sum due for wages that they did not think it worth the trouble of applying for it.

How do you understand that as being a distinction between the two periods; is it not a cause that would be equally in operation at one time as the other?—No; great numbers of infants were admitted and sent out to nurse at that time, in comparison with the present.

Still must not the proportion in a hundred or a thousand children have been the same in the one case as the other; how would the alteration of the number affect the subject in question?—The total number of children at nurse in 1801 was not near so great as the total number at the present time; but the number of infants sent to nurse in that year was considerably greater than now; and it appears that a very few children remain unaccounted for at present, compared with the former period.

We will then refer to a more modern period. We observe that within the last year you return to us, that the number which died in the country amounted to 361; but in the other account rendered to us, the number of those whose deaths were actually certified there were but 177; that is rather less than one-half of those whom you have returned to us as having died. We would beg of you to explain to us what in your opinion has become, within the last twelve months, of the 184 children whom you returned as dead, but whose deaths have not been certified to you?—Those 184 include a period of three years.

We are quite aware of that; but the question is, what, in your opinion, has become of those children; do you conceive them to be really alive or dead?—I conceive that a great number of the 184 are dead.

When do you conceive they died?—I cannot say when they died.

Must it not have been within the three years?—Certainly.

And you consider, that the nurses have voluntarily foregone their just claim for remuneration with respect to 184 children?—I do, in many cases.

What do you think has become of the other cases in which that motive has not operated?—I think that some of those 184 children decidedly may have been detained by the nurses: some of them from affection, but what number I cannot say.

Can you not give as precise an opinion as to the one date as you can with regard to the other; namely, the year 1801: have you not the same grounds?—I conceive that to be the case.

We

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finlay,
21 January 1826.

We have put the example of the last year to you in order to evince that there is not such a distinction, as you suppose, between the commencement of the period referred to in the return, and the present part of it; it appearing to us, that the principle, whatever it is, operates at present in the same manner as heretofore. We would wish to ask whether it is your impression, that, at present, the nurse in the majority of cases foregoes her claim to remuneration?—I think, in the majority of the cases of those 184, they must have foregone their remuneration.

Upon what grounds do you come to the conclusion, that the majority of those 184 children are dead, and that the nurses have foregone their claims rather than that they are alive and have been retained by the nurses?—The ground upon which I come to the conclusion is, that a number of children probably die immediately after the general pay. I have heard it mentioned that a number of children in the very hot summers die shortly after their return to the country: many, from fatigue; some of them, I have no doubt, get fevers and die.

Have you any other reason for coming to the conclusion you have but that which you have stated?—No, I have not.

Will you recall to your memory whether there has been any correspondence from clergymen since you have been registrar to the board, stating that there were foundling children detained by the nurses in the country, and wishing to know what steps were to be taken with regard to them?—I think there have been letters upon that subject.

Can you recollect whether any answers have been sent to those letters?—I do not recollect; there have been inquiries made by clergymen on the subject; under the Acts of Parliament relative to the hospital, the governors have not the power of recovering those children that are detained by their nurses.

Have you known of any proceedings being taken by the governors of the hospital to recover, as you term it, those children?—None that I know of; I have inquired into the subject, and I understand that the law does not give the necessary powers to the magistrates for this purpose; the law appears defective in this respect.

You will observe in your former evidence, taken the other day, that you stated you thought that there are but very few children at present who die who do not become the subjects of these dead certificates; you will observe also the facts that in the very last year the number returned to have died is 361, and the number of dead certificates during the same period is even less than half that amount; if you consider that the other half of the amount are really dead, do you not think that you were greatly mistaken in giving the evidence before adverted to?—I had not the registries to refer to at that time; it was my impression at the time, and I still think the numbers are comparatively few who remain unaccounted for.

What we wish to ascertain precisely is this—seeing that there are two modes of accounting for the appearances, one by assuming that the children have all died, and secondly, that a considerable portion have been detained in the country—what we wish to know is why you are inclined to think it is to be accounted for in the first way and not in the second?—From examining the registries, and seeing that there are such a number of young children unaccounted for, I do not think that the nurses would have kept back so many from motives of affection. The nurses do not detain them until it comes within a year or two of drafting. The impression upon my mind is, that the nurse endeavours to receive as much payment as she can.

The question is, seeing that there are facts undisputed which can be accounted for in either of two ways, namely, that the children are all actually dead, and that the nurses have voluntarily foregone their just claim to remuneration, or on the other hand, a proportion of the children have not really died, but have been detained from motives of affection by the nurses in the country; we wish to know on what grounds you are now satisfied (if you are so satisfied) that the facts are to be accounted for in the first mode and not in the last, or if there is any other mode by which you can account for it?—The way in which it strikes me is, that the nurses having, up to a certain period, brought the children to the hospital for payment, and not coming up on the drafting year, are induced to detain the children under these circumstances.

What do you call the drafting year?—The year in which each class of children are to be brought into the house.

But is that governed by a fixed rule which is known to the nurses?—No; the last year, children of ten years of age were drafted.

And at what age the year preceding that?—Eleven and twelve.

Are we to understand, in the first place, that there has been any fixed rule on the subject, and secondly, that it has in point of fact been attended to?—I think very closely, for a series of years.

Does not it often happen that the children are brought up by the nurses, and detained when so brought up with the nurses without any expectation on their part that that would be the case?—Certainly.

What is the fixed rule as to the age at which the children are to be drafted into the house?—There is a letter and number for each year; and as there are vacancies in the hospital, the oldest children are brought in.

Is there any fixed rule as to the age at which the children are to be drafted into the hospital; eight, nine, ten or eleven years, for instance?—The rule is, that the oldest children are brought in each year regularly; they have been drafted down to the age of nine or ten years.

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Finlay
21 January 1826.

Is there any fixed age at which the children should be drafted into the hospital, or is there no fixed rule upon the subject?—The fixed rule is to bring those in which are the oldest.

The oldest children are sometimes of the age of eleven, sometimes ten, and sometimes nine; is that so?—The children of two distinct ages may happen to be drafted at the same time; supposing there are 500 children of one age, and there are only 400 vacancies, 100 of that number must remain out until the next year.

Is it not the practical operation of the rule, that sometimes the children are admitted at eleven, sometimes at ten, and sometimes at nine years of age?—Certainly; and there may be instances under peculiar circumstances of children being brought in under the regular age of drafting.

What do you mean by the regular age of drafting?—The oldest children.

Does the expression “regular age of drafting” imply any particular age at which the children shall be received?—I have given in a return of the number of children at nurse, and their respective ages, to which I would respectfully beg to refer.

[The return was handed to the witness, who examined the same.]

(Witness.)—It appears by the return, that at present there are 49 children of eleven years old, and 360 of ten years old at nurse; as many children of those two ages as there are vacancies for in the hospital will be drafted into it in the present year, and so on in rotation.

Does not it follow from the application of that rule, that children are now admitted into the hospital at rather younger ages than when the pressure of accumulation of children was greater, namely, a very few years ago?—Surely.

Then we are right in supposing that the operation of this rule is to admit children sometimes of an older age, and sometimes of a younger age?—Yes; still bringing in first the oldest children.

Do you consider that the nurses in the country are aware before-hand of the practical operation of a rule so shifting in its application, and only determinable upon a careful examination of the books in the Foundling Hospital?—Supposing at the commencement of the year a certain number of children, say two or three of those that are to be drafted, are taken the first day, the nurses hear of it immediately; it is astonishing with what rapidity they communicate these particulars to each other; I have heard of nurses who having been at the hospital-gate with their children, and hearing that those of the same age were drafted, have returned home, and on the following year have presented themselves to receive two years wages.

Can the nurses have any opportunity of knowing the number of vacancies at any particular period?—Certainly not.

When a child dies in the country, is there any allowance for burying the child, in addition to the wages?—No.

Appendix, No. 5.

EXTRACTS from the Examination of His Grace The Archbishop of Dublin;
Friday, 17th December 1824.

Examination of
The Archbishop of Dublin,
17 December 1824.

YOUR Grace is one of the governors of the Foundling Hospital?—Yes, I am.

How long have you been so?—I think since the latter end of the year 1822; since I came to the see of Dublin.

Have considerable alterations and improvements been made since the time of your grace's superintendence?—There has been an endeavour to improve it in many respects, which it seemed to require; the other governors and myself have made exertions to rectify, as far as we could, what we found in experience not to work well in the institution.

Would it be too much trouble for your Grace to describe the nature of the alterations that have been made under your superintendence?—The great evil that I, being a new governor, felt pressing upon the institution, was the prodigious accumulation of children at nurse, kept to a very late age, much too late an age for the purposes of beneficial instruction afterwards. The number was very considerable; I cannot exactly say how many there are now, but the number is much reduced; it was not so much the absolute number either, as the number above a certain age remaining at nurse, that was alarming; I cannot specify the exact number, but there must have been close upon a couple of thousand (I speak now upon general conjecture) who were above the age that I for one thought likely to admit of any benefit from the instruction of the hospital, on their return to it. We had them remaining at nurse of the ages of twelve, thirteen, fourteen, and I believe even of sixteen years; this appeared to be so great an evil, and there was so little hope of any useful result from introducing children so circumstanced into the institution, whilst the worst consequences to discipline and morals must be the effect of their intermixture with the existing pupils, and the evil being also of such a nature as, unless some immediate effort were made to throw off the superabundance, must go on to perpetuate itself; that I was induced, with the concurrence of the other governors, to apply to Mr. Goulburn, to learn whether it was practicable to have a certain portion of the overgrown boys advantageously disposed of in some of the foreign settlements. This, however, could not be effected; and as the only remaining mode we could devise to remedy this overwhelming evil, we made an application to government to permit 500 of our children to be drafted out from the hospital, or rather from the nurses, as we had the oldest of them there, to the charter schools,

Examination of
The Archbishop of Dublin,
17 December 1824.

schools, and a grant was made last session to the charter schools to enable them to meet the expenses attending this arrangement. I think the most important change that has taken place has been with reference to this particular subject, and in order to promote our views upon it the more effectually, we introduced a new species of school within the walls of the hospital, called the Preparatory School, consisting of 200, confined entirely to girls, in order to get them in at an early age, about seven years old: we thought that would answer two good purposes; in the first place, it enabled us not only to reduce the number at nurse by 200, but also to get in such young persons as we could afterwards present as a proof of the benefit of admission at an earlier age, and of an improved system of teaching and regulation to be engrafted upon it; we were also able to bring it comparatively within a small compass, and having placed it separately under the direction of a committee of the ladies who are governesses of the institution, we were enabled by their exertions to introduce the new and improved system of subdivision and monitresses, which was not in use in the general schools of the hospital. In these, at some distant day, under the idea of introducing Dr. Bell's system, a change had been made, and persons recommended by Dr. Bell had been placed at the head of the male and female schools; but at the same time, from whatever cause, the system taught by Dr. Bell was never really introduced; so that whilst the old scheme (if scheme it could be called) was given up, the one for which it was relinquished was not introduced in its room, so that matters were placed in a worse condition than before, and the mode of teaching has consequently been a bad one. I cannot give a stronger proof of this, than by mentioning a fact or two respecting the mode in which the mistress of the General Female School usually carried on the management of it at the time I became governor. In an exceedingly large room, in which from 400 to 500 children were assembled at school, and in which noise and irregularity, from want of method, continually prevailed, this gentlewoman (who is also of delicate health) had no other mode of attempting to enforce order in any particular case, than by calling, at the utmost exertion of her lungs, to the disorderly children, and also to the under mistresses by name—this call was followed by reply and rejoinder, &c. at the fullest stretch of voice, by all parties, so that even the very attempts at order only produced more confusion and greater clamour. To show the total want of method or plan still further, I must state, that in that immensely large room, and amidst so great a number of children, the mistress sat at one end, not raised upon any eminence, scarcely seeing or being seen by any one of the children with distinctness; and it has been only a late discovery, that of procuring for her an elevated platform which gives her a view of all parts of the school, and of supplying her with the aid of signals, whereby perpetual shouting may be avoided in the general regulation of the school. In the newly-introduced school, called the Preparatory School, these, and every other judicious improvement devised in later times, have been attended to with the happiest effect. The advantages of this improved system are already abundantly manifested in this young institution, and both for good order and progress in learning, manners, and behaviour, it presents now a model for the entire establishment; the children are not above a year in this new establishment, and yet I have little doubt that if called before this Board, they would stand an examination most respectably. Of that, however, I am not prepared to speak with actual knowledge. The governors are so circumstanced as to have but little acquaintance with the teaching of the children; for as they consist principally of persons who have a great deal of business of their own to attend to, they can give but a limited portion of their time, once every week, except upon very extraordinary occasions, and during that time the common routine business of the hospital occupies them in a great measure. I some time ago proposed a solemn meeting of all the governors, to digest an entire body of regulations for the hospital; I have postponed it till this late day, for the purpose of deriving every benefit possible from the experience of the sort of plan intended to be proposed, worked upon a small scale, before we commenced upon a larger. If we found any impediment in this preparatory trial, we should at the same time easily discover the mode to remedy it; and then, after such a trial on a small branch of the institution, we should be better able to establish a set of regulations to work through the entire. Notice of a meeting for this purpose was given four or five months ago; but we found we were not quite ripe for it then. The governors, however, have been satisfied that benefits must arise from the projected plan. And we shall now soon be enabled to appreciate the full value of it, and to be satisfied of the best way of working it. In this way we stand at present, having made certainly an impression on the old system; having got in a number of children upon whom we can employ our new system to a good purpose, and been enabled to approach the object so desirable, of getting the children into the institution at a proper time of life. I cannot say more, than that we have opened a door to a considerable number of improvements, which, if we are empowered to carry into effect, may be productive of very considerable benefit. Persons recommending alterations are generally sanguine as to the good effects likely to result. But even with this impression fully upon my mind my opinion decidedly is, that if we can carry the proposed alterations into full effect, we shall make this a truly valuable institution, and adequate to the objects for which it was designed. We have made also some arrangements as to the children at nurse in consequence of their very great number, and the immethodical way in which they were thrown into the hospital, and the sort of hands in which they were placed, they were likely not only not to receive improvement in the country, but to be prevented in a great measure from receiving the improvement which the institution itself was calculated to afford. The women to whom the children were entrusted to be nursed were of the poorest and meanest order. Much care was taken by the governors to rectify this; but their endeavours were defeated by the officer whom they employed in the department which governed the selection of the nurses. This person, upon whom all depended, was most unfaithful in the

Examination of
The Archbishop of Dublin,
17 December 1824.

discharge of his duty, and by his contrivance there was a certain description of nurses chosen for the children, in whose hands the governors would not knowingly have placed them. His object was to place them with Roman-catholic nurses, he being a Roman-catholic himself; and to say the truth, independently of such exertions being made, there would naturally be a greater number of Roman-catholic nurses to offer themselves, as well because there is a greater number of the lower orders of that religion, as because persons of that description are willing to accept of lower wages, not only from their greater poverty, but also from their being under an influence, urging them to receive the children of the hospital on any condition. The wages were originally too low, being but 4*l.* per annum, but they experienced about two or three years ago a still further depression, by which they were reduced so very low as to make it impossible that any person could support a child in any degree of decency; they were brought down to 3*l.* per annum after the first year, and the consequence of this has been that the children were not clothed, and generally most miserably fed; and so soon as they were able to creep about, they were generally sent out to pick up whatever they could get for firing from the hedges and plantations, and, in short, to steal whatever they could, and practise all dishonest tricks for the exigencies of the cabin. The children consequently came back to the hospital infected with all manner of bad habits, principally lying and thieving. And in addition to this, they too often returned in a state of disease and decrepitude, or at least with an enfeebled and sickly constitution. A system so destructive as this the governors have been endeavouring as far as they can to alter; and for this purpose they have made an application to Mr. Goulburn to be permitted to send in the estimate for the parliamentary grant, with an allowance for the nurses, increased to the amount at which it had formerly stood, namely, 4*l.* per annum after the first year, and he has been so convinced of the necessity of this alteration, that he has agreed to the propriety of their doing so. We have also been endeavouring to make a selection of nurses of late within the province of the archbishop of Dublin. And for this purpose I have employed the means in my power, as metropolitan, of sending directions to the clergy of the several parishes within my jurisdiction, and calling upon them to make the children of the Foundling Hospital within their parishes more the objects of their attention than they had hitherto done. On this subject we have adopted an entirely new plan. We send regular notifications to the parish clergyman of the children that we send out: the places to which they are sent, and the persons with whom they are lodged, and the clergy have had a general direction throughout the province to pay particular attention to the children, not only when advanced so as to be capable of learning, but also in their infant state, and to visit the houses where they are as frequently as possible. We have every reason therefore to suppose that this attention, so eminently requisite, will be diligently bestowed. We have been anxious also to arrange a plan whereby we shall be enabled to place the children with Protestant nurses. One great evil, amongst many arising from their being placed with Roman-catholic nurses is, that when separated from their nurses their natural affections are violently snapped. The only person a foundling child can have a feeling for, like that which is borne to a parent, is the nurse; and although the taking the child away from the nurse broke this natural feeling, yet as we were an establishment of the state, and bound to bring up the children in the religion of the state, we were not only obliged to transfer the children from their Popish nurses, but also to keep them separated from all connection or intercourse with them, after they returned to the hospital.

The Protestant nurses are of a much more decent description of people than those who received the 3*l.* among the Roman-catholics. The children placed with the former would be much better attended to in their diet, and clothing and behaviour; and besides these and many other advantages arising from their being placed with Protestant nurses, we feel ourselves enabled by doing so, to encourage a cultivation of that natural affection in the child, which, when otherwise situated, we were obliged to counteract. We shall now have no reason for breaking off the intercourse of affection between the nurse and the child. We have found this sort of artificial affection very strong—it extends as far as the children of the people with whom the foundlings are at nurse. They call these their brothers and sisters. If they grow up without such attachments as these, the poor foundlings feel themselves, as it were, alone in the world; and there are not the same means of excitement among them as among other children. This is a very material change.—Another very important change that has been made has been the alteration of the old scheme of letting the children in the hospital grow up to be masters and mistresses. They were formerly often trained up for such, but they are totally unqualified for this. We found those who were so employed altogether ignorant of the world, or if they had learnt any thing they had not learnt it to profit. We found them unacquainted with the measures of conduct, and even with the due value of terms so far as moral rules were concerned, and in truth in every way insufficient—besides they were not respectable nor respected. The children are impressed with a sort of awe of a person of an apparently higher description coming amongst them, but this awe they never were led to feel for one who had grown up amongst themselves. We have now adopted the principle universally, that none of those who have been trained up in the hospital shall assume the situation of masters and mistresses. When these were so appointed, they were instantly changed from a state of pupilage into one of actual authority—there was no gradual transition; accordingly there were perpetual quarrels from the children disputing and undervaluing their authority. With respect to the separation of the children of different sexes, we have also made changes. We have latterly been acting upon a system of exclusion—they were formerly intermixed. There was no proper line of separation at all; the governors have been induced to adopt the plan of bringing the kitchen in contact with the hall. This was a scheme recommended

Examination of
The Archbishop of Dublin,
17 December 1824.

twenty years ago by the governesses, who are in truth alone the persons who can give useful information as to the details of the hospital. The governors in general have known little about the details; the practical working of the hospital comes under the direct inspection of the governesses, and by them this change was recommended a long time ago; but it was looked upon as a hopeless scheme; first, on account of the expense, and next on account of its being a total change of the system, and tending to break down many of the old rules; and not meaning to speak disrespectfully of my fellow governors, I must say that in this, like most other old institutions, what they have been long accustomed to, there must be strong proofs of the necessity of alteration indeed before the change is assented to; however, this has been executed, and we have now got rid of the most mischievous sort of intercourse that ever tended to disturb the good order of any institution. The kitchen was formerly at a distance from the hall, and was placed in the female court; in the passage between the kitchen and the hall the girls and boys employed in conveying the food from the one place to the other were continually and freely intermixed. The galleries and passages also had places where the children might be concealed, so as if improperly associated, to escape detection. We have got rid of all this entirely. The girls have now the sole management with respect to the dinner, so that this no longer furnishes an opportunity for intermixture. With the same view also we have made a very material change as to the dormitories. The only thing that remains now to arrange, to effect our purpose completely, is a matter of not much difficulty—to close the windows of the boys apartments which look towards the girls court. We have lately closely inspected the entire buildings to see how this may be done, and to examine particularly how the light might be affected, and we find the thing quite practicable. The rooms will answer just as well after the alteration as in their present state, and thus we expect to have the two sexes cut off from every kind of communication, even from that of signs, &c.

It has been stated to us, that a new class of persons were about to be introduced into the hospital as candidate teachers, who were to be instructed with a view to their being schoolmasters and parish clerks?—Yes; that is so.

Is it possible to carry into effect a perfect system of separation between those young men and the females belonging to the hospital?—Yes; there is a perfect plan of separation. They are entirely cut off; and where there might be even a possibility of communication by signs, we prevent this by blinding the windows that look towards the female court; a change which, from the excessive number of windows giving thorough light, will in itself be an improvement. There will not only be a sufficiency of light, but there will be plenty of ventilation, so that we do not apprehend any inconvenience from the change; and this being made, the communication is completely cut off. But I should remark, that although all intercourse between the sexes will be removed entirely by the plans I have suggested, yet there is one of a much superior order, from which we are terrified only by the idea of expense. The scheme I allude to is, that of giving up the infirmary entirely for the boys school, and changing the present boys school-room, and the house which formerly belonged to the weaving school (and which, in truth, was at first the infirmary), for the new infirmary: this latter could easily be made sufficiently spacious; and being separated into two distinct buildings, would answer perfectly for the separation of males and females. At present, as it is, we purpose to separate the existing infirmary; as, by the present system, a great deal of what we have been endeavouring to secure, namely, a separation between the sexes, has been defeated by the infirmary being the common receptacle of the children of both sexes. We have indeed altered it, in some degree, to remedy this evil; but it still exists. They have only one school-room for invalid boys and girls when convalescent; and with our best caution there is still a possibility of intercourse. We have had, as I have mentioned, a plan in contemplation for dividing the building into two separate ones, and having two distinct entrances.—[His Grace described the proposed alterations.]—These and some other alterations in the quarter of the infirmary would be a great improvement upon the present plan; but the grand improvement of all would be, to make the change I just now alluded to; namely, that of transferring the boys school to the infirmary, and the infirmary to the buildings at present occupied for the boys school. There would be then no possibility of intercourse between the children of the two sexes, and there would be other advantages to the institution of a nature which cannot be derived from any other arrangement. Should Parliament consent to grant the money for carrying this scheme fully into execution, the true method of making the institution adequate to its objects would then be effectually secured. It probably would require not less than 3,000*l.* But 3,000*l.* were never better bestowed.

At what age does your Grace think it would be most desirable to bring them from their nurses?—I should very much wish such as were placed with Roman-catholic nurses, to be brought in at seven years old; I should be glad to have them at all events at an age not much later.

Is it possible to apprentice them before twelve or thirteen?—No, I should think not; seven is the age we have already ventured upon in the preparatory school; I merely speak of the wish; but when we look to what is reasonably practicable, it may be necessary to give up a year or so. If they stay above seven years with their nurses, it will not be so easy to give them the due improvement after that; but we should not have the same difficulty of leaving them longer at nurse, when matters were brought into such a state as would secure to us nurses of the same religion as that in which the children are to be brought up. In addition to this also the increasing attention on the part of the clergy, on which I confidently reckon, and the general prevalence of Sunday schools, would prevent the longer continuance at nurse from being so great an evil as it is at present: the children

Examination of
The Archbishop of Dublin,
17 December 1824.

would be making some proficiency in the country, and what they learned we should not have to endeavour to unteach them, as we are obliged to do at present with those who have been with Roman-catholic nurses. We might then upon the whole be enabled to extend the benefits of the institution to a greater number, without increasing the expense.

If the alterations were made in the hospital, which your Grace has suggested, what number will it be able to contain?—I do not think the number would be increased by the alterations we speak of. The number the hospital has contained, or is supposed to contain, we have endeavoured to make it contain; but this number it has not continually accommodated by any means. The present supposed amount is 1,400; 1,200 had been the stated number, and we have lately forced in the additional number of 200, by means of the preparatory school; at the same time that we have withdrawn very little accommodation from the others, because we took up that which was formerly the infant nursery, and a part of the buildings that was not occupied. But at the same time we found that these 200 did require some additional room, which we procured from store-rooms, and some others of that description. We find upon the whole it will not now (in the way in which we think accommodation ought to be afforded with a due regard to health and cleanliness) give more than accommodation for 1,300, and we are accordingly altering our estimate to 1,300. We should have 1,200 in the general school, and 200 in the preparatory. But we have not been able to keep up our number in the general school, in consequence of the great difficulty of getting the children in from nurse. We have pressed very much that the nurses should be called up, but they do not like to come except at the time of year when they have hitherto been used to come to town. They formerly came in July. The children were only drafted at one time of the year; the consequence was that there was dreadful confusion—they came in great numbers, and whatever discipline there was in the establishment was quite upset. The whole system of the hospital was suspended; it was a most mischievous thing. Now our plan is to call in the children from month to month; this is only now in the course of operation. We find it, as I have said, very difficult to get them in with punctuality; and we are obliged to hold out an inducement for the nurses to come up with their children. Yesterday we gave an order to call in a hundred more of the age of ten than what we had ordered in before, because we found that the proportion of those that reached us was so very small. We are now about 200 short of our number; this is directly opposed to our present plan, for our object is that the number in the classes shall not be disturbed. We have also carried on the system of apprenticing now to a greater extent than before. We do not confine it to one period of the year, but extend it generally over the whole from month to month. I think we shall in a short time have the matter of removing the children from the nurses completely effected.

Has not a change been made in the rules for admission of the infants?—Yes.

Has not that very materially reduced the number admitted?—Yes, it has; but the number is still very considerable.

It was formerly 2,000 a year?—Yes, but then of those 2,000 immense numbers died. Upon examining the returns of those children afterwards, the number deficient and those that died was very great, and therefore the object was not attained. Life is saved comparatively on the present scheme.

Has any calculation been made, founded upon the present number of admissions, and the diminished number of deaths out of the whole number admitted, as to the period at which it would be possible to provide accommodation for the whole in the hospital?—If we receive all that offer under the condition of the 5*l.* admission, we should still continue to receive so many, as that, unless a large allowance be made for deduction from the number of the children by apprenticing or deaths, it would not be easy to pronounce when that effect could be produced. I believe the number at present on the books amounts to about 7,000. It will be found, I apprehend, that in the last year the number apprenticed has been considerably increased.

Is it possible to ascertain to what extent Protestant nurses may be provided by an additional pound?—I think I might say to any extent we want; the number sent away within this last year of Protestant nurses extremely anxious to get children from the hospital was very considerable. I have already alluded to an officer of the house upon whom the appointment of the nurses principally depended, and who exercised every species of contrivance (being himself a Roman-catholic) to prevent the placing the children with Protestant nurses. In the matter of transfer to new nurses especially, this man had every thing in his power; upon the whole, the arrangement of the nurses was left entirely to him and Mr. Creighton the surgeon. In the last summer, at the very time when we were given to understand that no Protestant nurses could be had, letters were written to a number of clergymen to know whether they could send up any of that description, and we were informed that we could have them in abundance. One said he could send up thirty, another twenty, and so on, and they were accordingly sent up; but by the contrivances of the person alluded to, they were kept dangling in town for a week or ten days at their own expense, and then sent away without getting any of the children. When this was discovered, it was found impossible not to make a change, and this person, who had for so many years baffled every attempt to get Protestant nurses, was at length removed from the office; and now Protestant nurses may be had to any extent we desire. This has been perfectly ascertained. The number of Protestants of the lower orders is in fact much greater than is generally supposed. In parts of the country where the population consists very much of Roman-catholics, the poorer Protestants do not like to avow themselves; this happens partly from fear of the surrounding Roman-catholics, who are generally confederated on a principle hostile to those of a different

Examination of
The Archbishop of Dublin,
17 December 1824.

different communion—partly from the want of encouragement on the part of the wealthy Protestants, who either from mistaken notions of liberality, or from the desire of popularity, or the influence of fear upon themselves, or from electioneering views, are too often more disposed to show favour to the Roman-catholics than to the lower classes of Protestants. These therefore require to be drawn out by inquiry and encouragement. A clergyman frequently, on entering upon a new parish, is given to understand that there are not more than twenty or thirty Protestant families in the parish, when in a short while he possibly finds that there may be two or three hundred, and, in truth, this is generally the case where the clergyman takes pains to make the proper inquiry. It has been particularly found to be the case where the clergymen have made it their business to seek out Protestant nurses. In every instance where I have made any sort of investigation I find that they abound; and therefore I have no hesitation in saying, that for the number of infants that come into the hospital, Protestant nurses can be abundantly supplied.

Do the governors apprehend that the number of children presented at the hospital under the present regulation is likely to increase, or do they think the experience of the last three years has enabled them to ascertain what the average number may be?—I do not think we have had yet sufficient data from which we can form any certain conclusion as to those results; in towns there is often a difficulty and a pressure in providing the sum requisite for sending up children, and providing the amount requisite for their admission into the hospital; but in the country parts there can be but little; for when it is considered that no more than 5*l.* is to be paid by the parish with every child, it must be felt to be as cheap a way of getting rid of the necessity of supporting them as any other. Children deserted they cannot suffer to perish; and they could not have the child supported for any sum so small as that.

The number being suddenly diminished from 2,000 to 500, has it been possible to ascertain what has become of the 1,500?—I do not know exactly what to say upon that point; but it may be right to state, that the description of children we now receive is different from that of the great bulk of those that were formerly admitted; at present, the circumstance of having been in the Foundling Hospital, is not so much a matter of disgrace as it formerly was; the money given for admission seems as if it were a kind of purchase of education—the child is openly sent by the parish, as its adopted child; but formerly, the general impression was such that the peculiar character which marked the institution of the Foundling Hospital spread over all the children reared within it, and cast upon them the disgrace attached to the nature of the establishment.

Will your Grace be so good as to explain a little more particularly the difference between the two classes of infants—those now admitted, and those formerly admitted?—The character of illegitimate was formerly commonly connected in idea with the children brought up in the hospital; this character is not necessarily connected with the institution now, the mere poverty of the parent may now be supposed to have occasioned the desertion of the child; before, the general feeling was, that the foundlings were the produce of unlawful intercourse.

Under the existing regulations, could a child be received merely on the score of the poverty of the parents in the country, unless that poverty was accompanied by an actual abandonment of the child on their part?—No, certainly.

Under the existing regulations of the Foundling Hospital, can a child be sent up to the hospital from the country, without a certificate that its parents cannot be ascertained?—I apprehend not; I have not had it in my power to attend particularly to the routine business at the hospital. There is a regular printed form prescribed, and if that be complied with, all is right; the whole is regulated exactly according to the Act of Parliament.

The Commissioners have been very much struck both by the appearance of the charter-school children drafted from the Foundling Hospital, and the children in the school itself, as to the extent to which they labour under a disease of the eyes; has it been at all a matter of consideration with the governors to ascertain the cause to which that has been owing, and whether any means could be adopted to remedy it?—One great cause is clearly mismanagement, and want of due attention. The doctor has been always most anxious, as soon as the children affected by this disease appeared to be tolerably relieved from it, to push them out of the infirmary into the general school. There has been some exertion of authority requisite to restrain this. He has been very improperly allowed to take to himself the entire control of the infirmary as a matter of his supreme jurisdiction, and with respect to this complaint he has generally sent the patients out too soon. There has been an arrangement lately made in the institution, that of establishing some small colleges (I may call them) of the children in eligible situations. We have got one in the neighbourhood of my country place at Tallaght, consisting of about twenty or thirty of the children, and there are some others in one or two other places. In these, the children are placed for a temporary accommodation, when we could not accommodate them in the hospital. In these minor seminaries the children are attended to with great care, being always under the superintendence of some benevolent and intelligent persons in their immediate neighbourhood, interested for the welfare of the institution. These are kept with great attention to cleanliness and propriety, and order, and yet, into these places this disease has been introduced, by sending into them, from the infirmary, children not perfectly cured of the disease. The reason I mention these small country seminaries particularly is, that in these we have had opportunities of perfectly ascertaining the fact of the disease having been introduced into them by the premature admission of children not perfectly cured in the infirmary. One of these was immediately under the inspection of my own family, who paid great attention to it, as did also the clergyman of the parish; and to them it was

Examination of
The Archbishop of Dublin,
17 December 1824.

perfectly known that there was not one of the children in the smallest degree affected by ophthalmia, until a new child was sent there who had been afflicted by it in the infirmary. The surgeon had been particularly requested to take care not to send out any child to this seminary that was not perfectly cured; he pronounced this child to be so, but it spread the disease immediately through the whole of the children. Want of care, therefore, I have no doubt, has been a chief cause of the prevalence of the disorder. At the same time, it is very possible that the sudden transition of the children from the close smoky cabin of their nurses to the large whitewashed room of the hospital on their first admission, may have created a tenderness of the eyes, which might render them peculiarly susceptible of that disease which has of late years become extremely prevalent.

Is it a severe disease?—I am told so, and at present I understand it prevails in an aggravated form. At the board of Stevens's Hospital, about a fortnight ago, Dr. Percival presented reports as to the state of disease in Dublin, and he spoke of ophthalmia, particularly as raging in Dublin at this moment like a plague, so that its severity appears not to be confined to the Foundling Hospital, but to have afflicted Dublin at large.

* * * * *

May we not assume, my Lord, as a general principle for regulating the admissions into the hospital from the country, that the number of children apprenticed in any year must, quam proximè, ascertain and regulate the number that can be admitted or drafted from the country into the institution in the same period?—It will, to a certain degree.

Must it not have a very great influence?—No doubt; it is a principal element in the calculation. Deaths will also have a considerable effect.

It appears from the returns that during the whole period of the twenty-seven years and a quarter above referred to, that the total number drafted into the hospital from the country was 7,913, being nearly equal to one sixth of the total number originally admitted into the hospital; does it not then seem to follow, as a general principle, that it would be necessary upon any consistent and well-ordered system of administering an institution of this kind, that provision should be made for drafting into the hospital a number equal to at least one-sixth of the average number of its admissions?—It would appear that at least provision should be made for one sixth.

The average number of admissions having been 2,000 during the first twenty-four of those twenty-seven years (and until the late regulations for limiting the number of admissions were resorted to), it would then follow, that the number that ought to be drafted from the country ought to be one sixth of 2,000, in order to prevent accumulation in the country?—Certainly.

It appears, my Lord, that in the year 1808, only thirteen, instead of 333 (as being the sixth part of 2,000), were in point of fact drafted into the hospital; and in 1810, only seventeen were drafted in; does not your Grace, in the transactions of those years, see the sure and obvious foundations laid for the present most inconvenient accumulation of children in the country?—Undoubtedly.

Can your Grace inform us whether the governors of the Foundling Hospital have acted upon any fixed rule known to your Grace, in reference to this most important principle for the conduct of the institution, or whether we are to consider that the efforts that have been made occasionally to apprentice the children, have been the result of the extremity of pressure, arising from the neglect of the principle which these questions have been intended to suggest?—I have no doubt the state of things has arisen from that and neglect: until very lately the matter of comparative calculation seems not to have been taken into the account. It has however been very seriously thought of within a short while back. The changes now making in the hospital will affect the number at nurse very materially.

Your Grace will be so good as to observe, that the reference to the past is only for the purpose of eliciting what ought to be the general principle that should govern for the future, and which we conceive has not been attended to in time past?—We have felt the neglect of those principles, in times past, so strongly, that it has been our anxious desire to have the institution placed upon sounder principles of regulation.

Has it ever occurred to your Grace, to consider the balance of advantage and disadvantage that would result from a system of placing the children originally in the care of Protestant nurses carefully selected, and with due provision for the children attending proper day and Sunday schools, and allowing them to be apprenticed at the proper ages from the houses of those nurses without any passage to the Foundling Hospital; the question is confined for the present to the moral consequences to the child, and to his future prospects of success in the world—of the balance of financial advantages to the institution, we are not at present speaking?—If the Foundling Hospital were conducted upon a right system, and one soundly administered, I should not prefer that mode. But were it left to labour under the imperfections that have hitherto attended the working of it, I should then deem the mode proposed preferable, provided the conditions could be complied with; but I fear that would be more difficult even than to effect the proper working of the system of the hospital. Could we be sure in every case to secure a Protestant nurse, that would be disposed and capable to assist the clergyman of the parish in having the child brought up properly, and were we on the other hand to continue still subject to the imperfections that have attended the system in the hospital, I have no hesitation in saying, that the plan proposed would be preferable. But giving credit for the improvements that the system of the hospital is capable of receiving, I should decidedly prefer the improved system of instruction the children would then receive to the scattered system of instruction in the country; besides, in the comparison of the two schemes, generally, it deserves to be considered whether the children receiving receiving the education of the cabin would be considered by the public eligible as apprentices.

Is it your Grace's opinion, that the average of education, such as can be administered in the Foundling Hospital, with regard to moral and religious considerations, is upon the whole better or worse than the instruction administered in Sunday and daily schools under a well-ordered system in the country—we assume, that as good education could be administered to the foundlings in the houses of the nurses as to the children of the nurses?—If both were well worked, I would prefer the system of the Foundling Hospital. I think such a system gives that substantial discipline that affects a child through life, and that cannot be had in a cabin.

Does your Grace consider that that discipline operates beneficially upon the character of the child that is the subject of it?—I allude particularly to the importance of a fixed habit of subordination—the feeling ourselves part of a system in which each is to keep his proper place. In the case of a great public school, broken into parts, and each part under due regulation and control by effective authority, I cannot but think there is the best chance of such feelings and habits being produced and established. And of this there can be but little expectation under any system of Sunday or daily schools, even were such schools sure to be found always in the neighbourhood of the cabins in which the children might be placed. The system of discipline I speak of is one which fits a man for the purposes of society, and which in truth cannot easily be had, unless coupled with large numbers on which it is to act. This, if well wrought, and upon a sound principle, converts the subject into a moral and religious machine, and ensures the regularity and tranquillity of the social system. This can never be effected by the plan of scattered and desultory teaching, and still less in connexion with and under the direction of such persons as are to be found in Irish cabins. Small schools, could the children who are the inmates of the cabins even have the benefit of them, would not effect the purpose. It is only to be effected in large bodies, and under uniform, unbroken, and systematic regulation. The domestic tie, it must be admitted, furnishes an advantage which should properly be placed to the other side of the account in the scheme of cabin instruction, and yet it is much to be questioned, whether a foundling child, growing up amongst the children of a family by whom it would be considered in the degrading light of a charity child, be likely to experience much of the comforts of domestic society, and the endearments of a domestic tie. That the mere foundling infant should experience some of the kindly feelings of a mother from its nurse, and should be treated with something like domestic tenderness, whilst in the years of actual infancy, may well be conceived; but that it should continue up to the age of apprenticeship to enjoy domestic comforts, is not so probable. On the contrary, it appears to me, that the child would be likely to experience much greater happiness in the hospital than in the cabin, besides escaping the infection of the vices which prevail among the lower orders, and which they could not fail to contract from their young undisciplined associates with whom they would be in daily contact.

Is it not your Grace's opinion, that the domestic tie is at least as valuable, possibly more so, to the foundling or the orphan, than it is to the child whose parents are known, seeing that that is the only domestic tie that such a child has to look to?—Certainly; I think it of great value where it exists.

Is it not your Grace's opinion, that a public boarding-school system for education, however well regulated, has on the other hand defects peculiar to itself, both with respect to the temper, morality, and religious feelings of those who pass through it?—With respect to religion, there is great reason to feel fearful, because aggregation is in most cases injurious; at the same time it must be admitted that private education has also its own vices, which war against religion likewise. But as to temper, I am satisfied the public system is useful. It breaks down that selfishness of temper which the private scheme is found so commonly to generate; by the collisions which it produces, it prepares its pupils for the active scenes of life, and corrects the overweening confidence which tends to disturb society and to diminish the usefulness of the individual; and, upon the whole, it gives a tone to the character which cannot be attained in the solitary system of education.

Is it not your Grace's opinion that the collisions and contests incident to the real life of the peasantry in the country, though perhaps less in degree, would in quality be more natural and more consonant to the future experience of the children, than such as they are likely to meet with in the artificial system of a great boarding school?—If there were reason to expect that the foundling child would be equally caressed in the cabin with the children which naturally belonged to it, and consequently feel itself to be upon an equal footing with its little companions, I should think it might be so; but when the child grew up so as to be aware of its true condition, and to know, and perhaps be made to feel, that that was known also by all around it, then the case would be materially altered; the child would then feel about its neck a perpetual weight, it could not hold itself equally erect with its little playfellows and competitors, there would be no longer that sort of collision that would prove beneficial; its effect would not then be to correct the temper and to improve the man, it would not be the collision of equals. The impression on the one side of a superiority, and on the other of a dependence, would produce only a collision ending in the exasperated feeling, or the abject depression of the inferior.

Is it not to be apprehended that the same, or a still greater degree of depression may result from the system of the Foundling Hospital, arising from a sense of the opprobrium, however unmerited, but which we have reason to fear does attach to those who have been educated within its walls?—I think as far as the children are concerned within the hospital they cannot have that feeling with regard to each other. They are placed upon an

Examination of
The Archbishop of Dublin,
17 December 1824.

Examination of
The Archbishop of Dublin,
17 December 1824.

equality there, so that the collision there obtains its full effect. If then there be there established a respectable system of education, and that the children have been consequently instructed as they ought, and their minds have been duly cultivated by a judicious treatment, I should think upon the whole, that the circumstance of origin may not form any great drawback upon the character of the individual going abroad into the world: if the character has been rightly formed, I should hope there would not be any great mischief from that cause. It should be recollected that it is in the early period of life chiefly the character is formed, it is then that, though silently, it is effectually taking its shape. If there be then a wrong direction given either to the temper or the morals, it would not be an easy matter to correct it afterwards; and if up to fourteen or fifteen the child be kept free from any of the exasperating and disturbing circumstances to which I have alluded, and has had full play for its faculties and powers, it will then have acquired a strength and firmness that may enable it, whether boy or girl, to sustain itself against what, at an earlier period, might have made an injurious impression. But, however, not to dwell upon what may be considered mere speculation upon the point, I wish to be considered generally as saying this, that if I could conceive the public system of the Foundling Hospital well worked, and upon a sound principle, I would decidedly prefer it for the formation of useful character to the other plan which has been suggested.

Is there not ground for apprehension that the mere circumstance of confinement within the walls of such an institution, and the dissimilarity of the events of every day spent within its walls compared with those of real life, will induce inexperience and inaptitude for the real scenes that await the child on going out of the institution, and that such may operate prejudicially, both upon the happiness and even the good conduct of the child who is the subject of it?—In the present state of society of this country, I think the seclusion of great value, and even with the drawback which the question implies, and which I admit may to a certain degree exists, I would still much prefer the public institution.

Does not a participation of the evils of that very society necessarily await the child educated within the institution, at a moment when he may be least likely, from his age and previous habits, to contend with them?—The individual could not possibly escape them in the other case, because they would form a part of its earliest habits, without even a suspicion of their objectionable nature; they would enter into the original formation of the child's character, and would ultimately govern the man: the only chance of resisting these must be looked for in the early inculcation of principles which might counteract them; and in the cultivation of these principles up to an age at which the character might acquire stability; but in the continued education of the cabin, the child would not only be without these principles, but would be, from its early perceptions, continually familiarized, not only with the most corrupting forms of expression, but also with ideas of vice, and in addition to all this, there would be actually a feeling of faction introduced into the child's mind from the earliest period; now in the education of the hospital, under a well-regulated system, all these would be studiously kept out, until a period when a moral and religious barrier might be formed against their intrusion.

Has your Grace had any sufficient or satisfactory opportunities of forming an opinion of the actual fate of the majority of the females, who pass through the hospital in a very few years, after the commencement or termination of their apprenticeships?—I have not, but I can readily conceive it to be very unfortunate; for I do think that the system of the Foundling Hospital has been for a great series of years a bad one, I think it has not been conducted upon such principles as would ensure a solid improvement of character; I consider that the discipline I have spoken of has not been sustained, and that the form of discipline (if indeed it deserves the name) which has obtained in the institution has been radically defective.

Does your Grace conceive that any system of discipline, or moral or religious instruction, that could be adopted in the hospital would be sufficient to fortify the minds of the majority of young females, at the age of fourteen, fifteen or sixteen, in the hands of such masters as they could hope to find, under circumstances of temptation and even menace?—I think that is a case not confined to the Foundling Hospital, but affecting the condition of society, it embraces the question whether good instruction is likely to guard against the effects of temptation or not; I conceive those in the Foundling Hospital, if they receive good instruction, receive the same benefit as those educated in a retired way in other ranks of life; it seems also a question deserving most serious consideration, whether the female children continuing in the cabin up to the age of apprenticing, are not placed in peculiarly dangerous circumstances, they stand in a situation altogether different from that of the young females of the family; the endearments of domestic society, from which the latter are in no danger, may be ruinous to the former, should there be male children of the same age in the family; the condition of a female foundling growing up to the age of fifteen or sixteen in a cabin, is in a variety of ways most perilous.

Is it not open to doubt, whether if a child had been apprenticed in the immediate vicinity of its artificial parent, with the option of resorting again to that home, in case of ill usage or misconduct, and with the additional advantage of the members of that home having an opportunity of watching the conduct of the master, he would on the whole have a better chance than if, for a few years antecedent to the apprenticeship, the habits of connexion with that home had been severed, and the child had been sent to a master at such a distance, that no opportunities either of protection or observation could occur?—We would prefer, and have always, as I understand from the governors, preferred, to have the master or mistress in the neighbourhood of the place where the child had been educated, provided the child had been

Examination of
The Archbishop of Dublin,
17 December 1824.

been with a nurse whose connexion with the child it was not desirable to discountenance. There has not been much opportunity for trial of this, because the course of practice has generally been such, that the desire for the most part has been to break off the connexion between the nurse and the child; and in truth, the evils that have afflicted the hospital, as to the subsequent conduct of the children in life, have been in a great measure caused by the circumstance of the wrong placing of the children in the first instance. The breaking off the whole of that system, we conceive, will produce a very material change; at all events it will leave us at perfect liberty to apprentice the children in the neighbourhood of their nurses, or give us an option of doing so; whereas it was formerly the disposition of the governors to withdraw them from their neighbourhood.

Is it not your Grace's opinion, that supposing the zeal and intelligence of the persons at present concerned in the management of the Foundling Hospital should succeed in introducing a superior discipline, there would still be great danger that under a system of gratuitous superintendence the system might hereafter become no better than heretofore?—I think no system can be called good that does not maintain itself, and therefore if it were not established with such checks and guards as would tend to preserve the system, I would not consider it deserving the name. I call that system good that will be able to work well if the individuals who have put it in motion should be altogether withdrawn. But in the Foundling Hospital there can never be a good working machine unless there be some direct and authorized governor, which it totally wants; for the board of governors cannot possibly fill that place. Now in the House of Industry there is a gentleman appointed governor who has a decided control there, and who can see every order strictly enforced. One grand difficulty in the Foundling Hospital has been to secure the execution of the orders. The board meet and prescribe remedies for what they find wrong, and order a certain course of proceeding for the future. They give directions to the registrar to see the order enforced. This is not properly the registrar's business; nor, compatibly with his other duties, is he adequate to the task: neither is the chaplain the person competent to discharge that duty. Our present chaplain is a zealous, a clever, and a meritorious man; but he has come to a time of life when a younger man would be more useful in his place. An active and able man in that situation, being also considered as master of the hospital, might supply the deficiency. There is at all events an officer wanting in the hospital. Unless there be some person empowered to command, and enjoined to see that all the officers of the institution do their duty, and that all orders be strictly executed, the system cannot work well. If this were effected, the business of the hospital would then be reduced within a practicable compass. Without this, no institution of such a magnitude can possibly work well.

Your Grace is one of the visitors of Wilson's Hospital?—I am.

There is in that institution a person of the description mentioned?—There is.

And that institution is found to be very advantageously conducted?—It works very well indeed. It is, however, easily managed in comparison with this.

Appendix, No. 6.

EXTRACTS from the Examination of Mrs. Magee; Wednesday, 29th of December 1824.

YOU act as one of the governesses of the Foundling Hospital?—I do.

How many governesses are there?—There are more nominally than there are really. I think all that can be stated to act are the ladies who compose the committee, Mrs. Ruxton, Mrs. Cleghorn, Mrs. Alexander Hamilton, of Rutland-square, and myself. To us four the alterations in the female school are committed. Mrs. Hamilton, in consequence of the ill health of her daughter, has never attended the committee. The committee was established with power to add to the number if we found it necessary. Lady Anne Gregory is the only person who has attended as governess since the formation of the committee. Finding it very difficult to procure governesses, and when they are procured more difficult to get them to act in concert, we adopted the plan of making the committee of governesses a permanent committee, one of whom should constantly be in attendance, and also getting a number of ladies who should act as visitors, who should feel no responsibility, but who should assist in all the business, those ladies being married or unmarried as the case might be. The visitors as yet appointed are the Misses Magee; the Misses Cleghorn, who have never attended; the Misses Grierson, who did attend; Mrs. John Lees, who never attended; and Mrs. and the Misses Lefroy, who have never attended.

Examination of
Mrs. Magee,
29 December 1824.

Is your attention directed generally to the whole concerns of the hospital, or are there any particular departments that you confine yourselves to?—The female department is fully under our authority to the end of the year. The governors granted to the ladies full permission to exercise their discretion with regard to all the mistresses and servants upon the female side, except the heads of the departments which the committee wished to be considered as not being in their province to remove. At the end of the year we are to place before the governors all our written rules and regulations, and by the end of January, they are to alter, confirm, or reject, what they think proper. We consider then the supreme authority they have vested in us as ceasing, unless they please to renew it.

If you found it necessary to dismiss any one of the teachers or superintendents, is it done summarily of your own authority, sanctioned to the end of the year; or do you first seek for the sanction of the governors?—We have not sought the sanction of the governors this year, we have done it entirely of our own authority.

Examination of
Mrs. Magee,
29 December 1824.

What description of persons did you find employed as teachers and superintendents in the hospital when it first fell under your care?—The superintendents were, I think, very respectable persons, and still remain. As far as I can judge, Mrs. Ross at the infirmary is a proper person. Mrs. Clifford, the housekeeper, appears to me to be very suitable in every respect, and well qualified. Mrs. Innes, the head of the female school, I cannot speak of as being competent to the important station she holds, though much, and I believe deservedly, esteemed by all the governesses. All the rest of the mistresses and servants whom we dismissed were either persons in a low situation of life, or who had been taken from the foundling children, and had been appointed without ever having left the house.

Had they been selected for their own merit, or were they selected or promoted to the situations as matter of favour?—I was not there at the time of the selection; some of them were selected no doubt from their own merits. I cannot say that any were put there with a full knowledge on the part of those who appointed them that they were unfit; but I believe the great reason for selecting some of them was, that they did not know what to do with them, because they were unfit and unqualified to earn their living any where else; but they were also unqualified in the highest possible degree for those situations.

In what way were those persons disposed of?—Some have been sent to the country: the proposal made by the board, at the recommendation of the committee and of the chaplain, was, that they should either take their choice of going to the country, upon the aged and infirm poor list as it is called, (which is, as I understand, that for each person 3*l.* a year is paid by the institution to the country nurse; and to each is allowed one suit of clothing, of the description given in the house every year; and they may besides earn what they can in the country, to benefit themselves,) or to receive 4*l.* as a gratuity, and provide for themselves. Some of them chose the latter; and I cannot say that any of them chose the former. With some of them it was rather compelled, as we found that the taking the 4*l.* and going away was only throwing them into distress. We are endeavouring to get situations for some of them if we can; but some of them have such infirmities that we cannot expect to provide for them. They are either almost blind, or have some deformity or bad health, that prevents them getting their own livelihood.

In what way have those persons been replaced?—By persons whom we have engaged.

Are they any of them individuals who have been educated in the Foundling Hospital?—No.

Do you know whether any of them have been educated in charter schools, or places where they have been boarded and separated from their parents?—None of the upper class of mistresses to our knowledge. We have endeavoured to get them uniformly of a higher description; and we have at present none that have not apparently had a respectable education, and with whom we did not receive a highly respectable character. The cook and laundry mistresses have been in situations as upper servants. The cook was educated in the Orphan House.

If the selection was carefully made amongst the cleverest of the girls, and the best educated, do you still think it would be desirable to introduce persons who have been educated out of the hospital, and who are more acquainted with the general circumstances of life?—Yes, I conceive that the persons educated in the hospital are totally unfit for instructors, however clever, and however well educated.

Will you state why they so appear to you?—One objection is, that they have not that knowledge of the world that enables them to distinguish the degrees of right and wrong; I have found upon examination, that I could never justly order punishment for any child solely upon their representation; another objection is, that living entirely in the house, they do not know accurately the meaning of words as applied to common uses; they wanted also those feelings of affection and a knowledge of the intercourse of life, which persons acquire by living in families, and in the world.

Do you think that they were more severe in their dispositions, that they had less feeling of kindness and tenderness towards the children, than other persons educated out of the hospital?—I cannot speak to that of my own knowledge; but I believe that they were more severe, and I think they must unavoidably be so from the circumstances I have already mentioned of their ignorance, and a want of a clear discrimination in their own minds between right and wrong; they were, besides, too nearly upon a level with the children to be regarded by them with due respect.

Were the principles of truth as strongly established in their minds, as in the minds of persons who had been educated out of the hospital?—If I am to speak from the results, I should say not; that is, compared with persons of similar education; but at the same time, I think I should not say that I would not depend upon what they would directly assert, as well as upon the veracity of an equal number of persons taken out of the lower situations in life.

Was the difference in the characters of the instructors who had been educated in the hospital, and those since introduced, not educated in the hospital, very strongly marked?—I think so; and more particularly in the Preparatory, where we have had a better trial of it; that is, a more regular one; because there was so much to undo in the other. I think the great want of capacity for instructors in the persons educated either in the Foundling Hospital or in the charter schools is, that it must be, generally speaking, mere head teaching which they can give; because, that knowing nothing of the varied scenes of life, they have neither experience nor judgment to direct the application of the lessons to the hearts and conduct of their pupils. Such teachers are advanced at once from a state of childhood, ignorance of the world, and dependence, to a situation which requires a knowledge of themselves and of human nature, which it has not been possible for them to obtain. These remarks have been peculiarly verified in the Foundling Hospital, where the system of education has been for many years so very defective; they who have learned by rote must teach by rote. To a by-stander, the Foundling mistresses seem to teach well; they spoke fluently what they had learned from Mr. Murray, the chaplain; and the children, or rather some few of them, answered readily what they had been taught; but of the true meaning of the words, and the comprehension of religious doctrines and religious principles, they were lamentably ignorant. I took a class of children that were preparing for Mr. Murray's lecture, and I took a single verse in one of the chapters of the Acts, and went through it word by word. I should state that this was the first and the best class in the whole school; I asked them the meaning of every word as they stood before me, and not one child in the whole could give me a proper answer to any one question I put.

How long had any of those children been in the hospital?—Some of them four years and five.

Were those girls old enough to be apprenticed?—Yes; I should think there was not one under fourteen, and some of them were sixteen and upwards. When I say a proper answer, I mean such an answer as I believe we should now get from any child who has been a year in the first class. I say as I believe, because that I have not been able lately to examine them myself.

Do you attribute the improvement that has taken place to the employment of a better class of mistresses?—Yes; added to a better general system of regulation, which could not have been accomplished with the former mistresses, and to the assistance the ladies have given.

Have you had much opportunity of knowing how the children have turned out that have been apprenticed from the hospital?—My observation has not been very extensive upon that point. What I did know was not favourable; they are said to turn out generally very ill.

Do you believe that what is said is true, or is it merely prejudice?—I believe it to be true as far as I can judge; but one instance excepted, I speak from belief; it was that belief that led me to take the steps I did; and it was that belief that made me call the ladies together in the first instance, and which made the committee represent so strongly to the board that some change was indispensably necessary.

Have such alterations been made as you think will ensure that the girls now about to be apprenticed will turn out better than those apprenticed heretofore?—Not those to be immediately apprenticed. The change has not been sufficiently long to enable me to speak with certainty. But I have sanguine expectations of great improvement after some time.

Can better situations be provided for them now than was the case five or six years ago?—I hope it will be the case if the board give encouragement to it, which they now seem inclined to do; for the general feeling formerly was, that it was not desirable they should be in better situations. The governors have recently agreed, as an experiment, to give encouragement to ladies to take the foundlings into their families; and have passed a resolution, that any lady who shall take any of the children upon the recommendation of a governess, may have her for one year as an apprentice; that she should then, if the child did not suit, be permitted to return her into the hospital, and that she should then be replaced upon the General Apprentice List; and on the apprenticing day be given to any proper person who applied, stating to that person that she had been in service. But if the child be approved by the lady, she must keep her for the remainder of her term, whatever it may be. The reason for such a plan is, that ladies so very decidedly object to binding themselves for seven or five years. If the child were to be bound only for one year, no injury would be done, because she would not be thrown at the end of it upon the world, but she would be transferred, and the fee be reserved for the transfer, no fee having been given to the lady.

Have many girls been so provided for?—Only one or two; there are others bespoken.

Are most of the girls sent out to services or to trades?—I believe mostly to services; but the apprenticing department does not come under the ladies superintendence. We are endeavouring to take a little more pains in the manner and mode in which the children are sent out. We have directed that the children who are selected on the apprenticing days for apprentices, shall not, if possible, leave the house without the previous inspection of a governess or of a visitor; and that the superintendent shall take care that no child signs her indenture without having read and been made to understand its conditions. One young person, who had committed a breach of her contract, told me she never knew what the terms were till I mentioned them to her, as she had signed the paper without knowing a word that it contained. This I found was a common case.

Is there any difficulty in providing situations for them?—I understand there is; and that it is the reason that the governors are induced to give with servants to persons in very low stations an apprentice fee. They give, I believe, 2*l.* when the child goes out; 2*l.* at the end of the first year, to the master or mistress, and 3*l.* at the end of the apprenticeship to the child.

Is the instruction the children receive now such as to be satisfactory to you?—I think so, mostly, but not entirely. The religious instruction is still insufficient.

Are they taught working and such industry as is useful to girls?—They are; they learn sewing, housework, washing, cooking, spinning, stocking mending and knitting; but since I have been a governess no finer needle-work has been done than the work in the house supplies.

Is there sufficient work for the girls in making and mending their own clothes?—That alone would not be sufficient; but there is likewise all the house-linen, and two suits of clothes for each infant sent to nurse, all the boys shirts and mending, and also the clothes for the apprentices that go out and the spinning and the knitting.

Examination of
Mrs. Magee,
29 December 1824.

Are the clothes that are given to the apprentices when going out, the same as those worn by persons in a similar situation in life, or are they any thing in the character of a livery?—At the recommendation of the ladies, the board has lately made a new regulation upon the subject; the children did go out in the dress of the hospital, which caused two disadvantages; one was, that the child, in passing through the country, was marked, and at all times appearing in it till it was worn out, we found it was considered a mark of reproach, and that the child was ashamed of and disliked it. Another reason was, that it caused confusion in the house-clothing. The child who went out took the best clothes in the house, and the child that followed her must get new ones; we found this occasioned irregularity in several respects, and therefore we represented to the governors that it would be better to allow a dress not peculiar, and also that it would be rather less expensive. They were also sent out in a manner distressing to them; they were sent out without any species of bonnet, shawl, or cloak, just in the dress in which they are seen in the hospital; they often had to travel twenty or thirty miles in the country in extremely hot or cold weather, without a cap upon their heads: the gentlemen have now permitted us to give them a cloak and a coarse bonnet, and a calico gown, &c. the cost of which entire dress is 1 l. 5 s.; we suggested that any thing that made the girl, at that time of life, appear to go out under circumstances of reproach, should be done away.

Is straw platting done in the hospital?—Yes, it is just introduced.

Will they be able to make bonnets for themselves?—Yes; and we expect for sale, so as to make the straw plat no loss to the institution, but rather a gain.

Are not some of the children taught spinning?—Yes; the plan is, that the children shall be divided, so as that the girls who spin and sew one week, shall be cleaning, washing, &c. the next week. The fixing the number of the girls who shall spin, and the number who shall sew, has been a matter of some difficulty, and the principle upon which it is to be arranged, is not yet finally settled.

In what way is the yarn spun by the children disposed of?—It has been employed hitherto in manufacturing their clothes and knitting their stockings.

Is any part of the work disposed of for money, or is it consumed in the hospital?—It is consumed in the hospital.

Do the infants, when they are first admitted into the hospital, fall at all under the inspection of the governesses?—Yes, they do; that is considered in our department.

They remain but a few days in the hospital?—Yes, so I believe; but I can speak less upon that than upon many other parts of the institution. Owing to the distance of the building, and my very delicate state of health, and the quantity of other business which I had to transact, I have not regularly visited the infirmary, nor entered very minutely into its concerns.

Is the management of that department such as to be satisfactory to you?—There are many parts of it that are not satisfactory; but I understand that Mrs. Ross is considered to be competent and attentive. I have never gone there but I have found the apartments neat and clean. One very unsatisfactory circumstance is the want of a proper separation of the male and female wards. Another is the want of separation of the infant ward, and of the wet nurses received into it. These nurses are admitted, as I am told, as they may offer themselves at the gate, without any testimonials of character, written or verbal, and without any inquiry whatsoever as to their previous conduct. Their wages are at the rate of 6 l. per year. It cannot be supposed that such women are of a respectable description, and I think that they ought to be so situated as to render it impracticable for them to hold any intercourse with either the male or the female children. Yet they have hitherto been placed in the centre of the establishment.

Have you at any time had occasion to consider the state of the children in the interval between their being sent out to nurse and being returned into the hospital, as to their management or their health?—I have seen instances in the infirmary, in the infant ward, at various times, of children brought back again in a very dreadful state. I have seen them brought in there under very distressing circumstances back from the nurses.

Do you believe, upon the whole, the nurses take good care of them?—My knowledge is not sufficient to enable me to speak extensively upon that subject. I think a great many are much neglected, and many are well taken care of.

Do you think that the mortality among the children at nurse in the country is greater than among a similar number of children living with their parents in the country?—I think so; but I have never had any opportunity of considering the point of comparison.

Do you know whether there is reason to believe that the children are much injured by the carriage from the country to the hospital?—I have heard it said that they are; I have no knowledge of it; I should think from what I knew in the country, that they frequently must be injured.

Do you observe a marked change in the appearance of the children after they have been admitted into the hospital, and have been some time there; does their appearance and general character change perceptibly?—I think it does; for when they first come into the hospital they suffer generally for some little time after. Sometimes they fret; they used to fret more than they do now, I conceive, from their occupations and general arrangements not having been so well managed as they are at present. I believe that their nurses have often purposely taken pains to render the children insubordinate and unhappy upon their leaving them; I mean the Popish nurses. I have reason to believe that the children are often prepared prepared to resist the instruction which they are to receive, and to dislike the persons who are to instruct them. A sudden change of diet, clothing, lodging, and in short of all the habits and feelings of the children at an advanced age, must be somewhat prejudicial to health. A plan is now adopted to render the change more progressive; and it seems likely to produce good effects. This is simply to place the new drafts for some time in a separate school, where all these things can be regulated according to circumstances.

Have you been able to observe what length of time the children continue to fret?—I do not think they fret much, and not at all after a very short time. The head mistress in the preparatory speaks in high terms of the docility, affection, and general good behaviour of the children in that school.

Does it appear to depress their understandings as well as their spirits?—Not in the least in the preparatory; in the general school it may have done so, from the cause which I have already mentioned.

Does it produce an obvious change in their external appearance?—I think it did formerly. I cannot speak decidedly upon that point, but I think I have seen them look better when they first came into the hospital than after they had been there a short time; and after the new drafts come in, great numbers are always sent to the hospital.

Is it chiefly with ophthalmia they are afflicted when they first come into the hospital?—I am told that many are afflicted with ophthalmia, and that they are much afflicted also with complaints in the chest and the stomach.

Has the ophthalmia prevailed in the hospital to the same extent ever since you have been acquainted with it, or has it been much worse sometimes than others?—My acquaintance with the hospital has been about a year and three quarters, and during that period it has not been so bad as I understand it has often been previously: it has not been allowed, by the means which have been taken to prevent it, to spread through the hospital. When I came there first the children appeared to be much affected with it.

Has it not continued very prevalent down to a late period of this year?—I do not know how many cases there have been, as the children have been sent to the infirmary, and therefore separated; but I should say that it has been very prevalent.

Have you known any cases where actual blindness has followed?—I have known several cases of injured sight, to a degree which rendered the young women incapable of earning their bread; and the superintendent reports to me some of total blindness. She says many have almost lost their sight by that dreadful disease, who, before it attacked them, appeared to have no tendency to it. I have reason to believe that the ophthalmia is very infectious; and that, until within the few last months, proper care was not taken to prevent the spreading of the infection in the house. A child, who was sent to nurse to Mrs. Powell, at Tallaght, and who had been in the infirmary, and who was pronounced by Dr. Creighton to be convalescent, communicated the disease to Mrs. Powell, to her husband, and to all the children in her house. The sufferings of the family have been great, and Mrs. Powell is still apprehensive that she shall not recover her sight, as after many months it is still dim and imperfect.

Are those children foundlings?—Yes; there are thirty female children placed under Mrs. Powell's care, and the superintendence of members of my family; and she has also two apprentice children, who are foundlings.

Do you happen to know whether all of them were afflicted with the ophthalmia?—Yes, all of them that were there at the time; but she had not then her full number.

Are you aware that the children sent from the hospital to the charter schools have carried with them, in every case, this same disease?—That must have been, I should suppose, in consequence of passing through the infirmary; they came first to the infirmary, and consequently took the infection there.

Did any of them fall under your own observation?—Only those in the house; they generally passed before me before they left it; but a number were sent from the infirmary whom I did not see.

Had you any reason to suspect they were labouring under the disease?—Not any that I saw; but those who went from the house, if the disorder had appeared in their eyes, would have been sent to the infirmary; and those who were drafted out of the infirmary, I did not see.

When fresh children are brought in from the country, do you think it likely that a large portion of them will successively take the ophthalmia?—I think it likely that they do take it when they go into the infirmary. Many that came last year caught it; whether they brought it with them, or caught it in the infirmary, I cannot say; but there are still many of them in the infirmary.

Do you believe there is any child in the school who labours under the disorder to such an extent as to communicate it to any other person?—Not to my knowledge; and I should suppose there is not, because the orders are very strict to send them to the infirmary as soon as it appears they are infected.

Do those orders apply to the preparatory equally?—Yes.

If the children could be placed under Protestant nurses, and were taken care of in the country, do you think it would be desirable to bring them into the preparatory school as early as they are now brought?—I should say it would be desirable.

Do you think they are better taught in the preparatory than they would be if they were to go to school in the country and were with a good nurse?—Yes; I think they are much better taught in the preparatory than they could be with any nurse I have ever seen or heard of.

Do you think upon the whole their education is better, not confining it to reading and writing writing merely, but extending it to such things as it is desirable they should know?—I think it is; writing appears to me to be the least valuable part of their instruction.

Examination of
Mrs. Magee,
29 December 1824.

At what age do you think it most desirable to bring them into the preparatory?—That must depend so much upon their previous circumstances; if they were not well attended to, I should say six years; if they were, I should think eight was quite soon enough; and in the general school, I should think they might sometimes be allowed to be out till ten; if they were in schools belonging to ladies, or carefully superintended by ladies, where their principles were properly attended to, and where there was nothing to undo when they came into the house, four years would in such cases be sufficient for them to stay in the hospital; but if they are not brought in till ten, and have been with improper persons, it is not possible to get rid of the impressions they have received.

What is the annual expense of a child in the preparatory?—I do not know; I understand it is less than in the general school.

Have you happened to observe whether the children in the preparatory are more or less healthy than the children in the general school?—More healthy, I believe. When I first came into the hospital, the children in the general school were remarkably sickly and wretched in their appearance; the preparatory children are considered to be remarkably healthy by those who have had an opportunity of comparing them with children elsewhere. They are pleasing in their manner, and very easy to manage; I can speak of them with nothing but approbation.

Has a decided improvement taken place in the general hospital as well as in the preparatory?—Yes; those who are not diseased are much more healthy than they were. The preparatory has always been nearly what it is at present. It is a recent establishment.

Do the same disorders prevail from time to time, or is there much difference in the diseases the children labour under?—I do not know—I have not turned my attention to that point. I will beg to state why I conceive the children are so much more healthy now than they were before; it has arisen from more care being taken of them; they are not better clothed or differently fed than they were; but there was so much neglect, that the children were allowed to catch cold, and were, I believe, defrauded often of their provisions, and various things of that kind.

Is the general conduct of the girls in the hospital such upon the whole as to be satisfactory to the governesses, or is there any thing to complain of?—It is much improved; it was every thing the contrary of satisfactory; but now we have them so much under observation, it is difficult for them to do any thing highly improper undetected; we think there has been a very great change in their conduct.

Do they appear in general to be well disposed and kindly affectioned, or is there reason to fear the contrary?—At my first attendance they were reported to me to be such wicked creatures, "it was impossible to make any thing of them, they were not like any other children in the world." I questioned the class mistresses a short while ago, and they all agreed upon the whole that they could not expect in that class of life, with their previous circumstances, to have better children. My personal observations confirm this opinion. There are few of the children who, as far as I can judge, do not seem to meet me with an eye of affection, at least there is no contrary expression, although I am one of the persons who order their punishment. Formerly, any child who was particularly ill conducted, if she was of sufficient age, was the first to be placed upon the apprentice list; and as the children are very anxious to go out as apprentices, this plan was an encouragement to their obstinacy. We order, that any child punished for a great offence, or frequently for smaller ones, shall be struck off the apprentice list for six months.

Is there not an arrangement about to be made to introduce into the hospital a number of young men, who are to be trained as schoolmasters under the direction of the Association for discountenancing Vice?—Yes.

Is the arrangement for the accommodation of those persons, and separation of them from all persons in the hospital, such as to be satisfactory to the governesses?—We have no sort of apprehension from them; but we have every apprehension from the present intercourse of the boys and girls, and we think that is one of the points that should be most anxiously inquired into—the separation of the whole of the male department from the female. The training men will be under so much restraint and restriction, we do not apprehend any bad consequences.

Is it not considered desirable that the whole of the female department should be separated from the male?—We feel that no language can be used too strong upon the subject, and that arises from personal observation. I have turned my attention to it constantly.

Is there any difficulty in carrying it into effect?—Nothing except the expense.

Would it consist in any thing else but building walls, and so on?—I should believe not.

Has any detailed plan been prepared to be laid before the governors?—Yes, it is to be laid before the governors to-morrow; there is one very expensive and complete plan; another which is not so expensive nor so complete, but it would be better than the present plan. It is injurious to the boys to have their play-ground in the outer court, to say nothing about the girls. It has hitherto been the custom in the hospital to give a girl and a boy to the same house to be nursed together, and the consequence of that is, that the girls and boys come into the hospital with previous acquaintances and previous attachments, and therefore they seek for interviews with one another. It might be thought that peremptory orders would keep them separate, but it is impossible; I find if there be any window or door, or any thing by means of which they can communicate with one another, in spite of every rule and regulation they will do it. I find them all set at defiance, and the boys and girls caballing caballing together; I speak of it as a point of discipline, not of any impropriety in itself; and then they write letters to one another.

Does the practice continue of sending a boy and a girl together to each house to nurse?—I believe it has been so hitherto; I do not think there has been any order to prevent it; I have prevented it where I could.

It seems putting an end to the practice would be the best way of putting an end to the consequence?—Certainly; two boys or two girls might go with advantage to the same place; they who are nursed together call each other brothers and sisters, but there does not appear to me to be any benefit arising from the acquaintance, because it must be broken afterwards; but two girls being together there is a benefit, because they come together into the house, and afterwards they continue sisters through life.

Is the schoolmaster a person who at all comes under your observation?—Yes, he is; the male and female department being mixed. I have had occasion to give directions in which the master was concerned.

Has it occurred frequently that you have had to apply to the governors to interfere with him?—No; I have never known him to refuse any request of mine, or to be otherwise than respectful and civil to me.

Is his conduct such as to be satisfactory to the persons who superintend the hospital?—I think not; I do not mean that he is guilty of any great misconduct, but he cannot be spoken of as satisfactory.

Is he satisfactory as a teacher?—I believe not; as the head master, I have known him to be wanting in setting an example of that discipline and regularity necessary at the head of such an institution.

Is he a person who by his conduct and character obtains respect?—I do not think that he is in general held in respect in the institution.

How long has he been in the situation?—I believe eight years. Mr. Murray told me that when Mr. Flenley was appointed, he was adverse to the appointment; I believe thinking him altogether unsuitable; that he could not keep it if it was not for Mr. Murray's assistance in support of his authority. Some of the gentlemen who have been examining into the school with a view to regulate for the training school, had, as I was informed by one of them, intended to prepare a memorial for the board, to say that from what they saw, that Mr. Flenley's want of system and want of proper management was so great, they could not introduce the training masters into the school; they then thought that it would create a jealousy by interfering with the regulations of the hospital if they did so, therefore they adopted another plan. They have got an order from the board that they are to have a certain portion of the Foundling Hospital boys given up to them for instruction.

Is there any person in the hospital who has the general superintending authority at all times?—It appears to me, that there is upon that subject a misunderstanding. I think there is a great want of what I may be allowed to call superintending responsibility; and unless there be something more done in that respect, I think that neither of the departments can go on properly. The chaplain is supposed to be the head master; but either he has not had the authority given to him, or he thinks so; he does, I am sure, what he conceives to be his own duty. I do not mean that he would pass by any misconduct, but I think he does not seek it out, it must be brought before him. He does not appear to me to feel, that beyond his own personal duties, any responsibility rests upon him. The same may be said of the registrar.

Would it not be desirable that some person should have the general superintendence over the whole of the institution?—Yes, I think so.

Would the chaplain be the person to have that authority?—I should think so.

Would it not be right that the superintendent over the female department and the master in the male department should have an authority under the chaplain?—Certainly within their own department. I should think the chaplain would be sufficient to have a superior authority over the superintendents, and over the whole establishment generally, and the registrar to be responsible for the properly conducting the household part, viz. the housekeepers, the providore, the butler, &c.

You would confine the master and mistress to the school department only?—Yes; as inspectors, as they are at present. We have in the female department divided the inspection: we give part to the housekeeper and part to the superintendent. We have made the superintendent the inspectress of every thing generally; but we have made the housekeeper more particularly the inspectress of every thing that falls under house cleaning and so forth, and the superintendent of all that belongs to the education of the children, and every thing relating to their personal welfare.

Under whose care are the children in the infirmary?—Of the matron; and when convalescent, under a school-mistress, one of those foundling girls who is, I should suppose, incapable for reasons already assigned. Mr. Murray speaks very highly of her; I can say nothing of my own knowledge. We found this young woman (apparently about two or three and twenty) teaching all the convalescents without exception; some boys of seventeen, and girls all in one room, acting, as I conclude, under her or not, as they might think proper. We ordered, then, that the boys should not come to school with the girls, and that Mr. Flenley should, until the board thought proper to make some decided arrangement upon the subject, appoint some monitor to give them lessons, or that they should go without lessons, for we could not suffer such a plan to continue. Of this young woman I can say nothing from personal inspection, I have never staid in the infirmary school-room more than two or three minutes at once, but she is represented as a good young woman. One thing I can state with certainty, from frequent reports, that our children never go to the infirmary, infirmary, either from the general or preparatory school, that they do not come back injured; but that may be from sickness having given an interruption to their discipline.

Examination of
Mrs. Magee,
29 December 1824.

Is it proposed to divide the infirmary into male and female wards; or would it be better to build two separate infirmaries?—It would not be necessary to have two distinct infirmaries; but to have the parts of the building so separated, that there could be no communication between the males and females throughout.

Is that comprehended in the plan about to be submitted to the governors?—Yes; one plan we were wishing them to consider is, whether the infirmary would not be better converted into the boys school, by which the whole would be separated, and a very handsome building appropriated, and to remove the infirmary to where it was formerly in the outer court. This would make the most complete separation; one end could be made for the females, and one end for the males. They can do so likewise, but not so completely, in the present infirmary, by building some walls outside and partitions within. At present the convalescent children have one common play-ground, both male and female.

Have you known any instances of children being bound out apprentice without coming into the hospital?—I have heard, I think, of some, but I am not certain; and I am ignorant under what circumstances.

—In those instances do you know how the children have turned out?—I do not.

Appendix, No. 7.

Examination of the Hon. and Rev. John Pomeroy; Friday, 26th November 1824.

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy.
26 Nov. 1824.

ARE you one of the governors of the Foundling Hospital?—I am.

How many governors are there?—I think twelve.

In what way are they constituted?—Under an Act of Parliament; and they have the power of filling vacancies by election. Seven governors must be present at an election, and there must be a certain number of days notice given in the summonses of the election.

How many years have you been a governor?—I was elected in November 1801; I have therefore been twenty-three years a governor.

Does any one of the governors hold the situation of president or chairman?—No, the third member coming into the room takes the chair.

How often do you meet?—Once a week.

How many constitute a board?—Three, for ordinary purposes; five for others; and seven for others. Three are competent to do ordinary business and draw for money.

Is your board attended by a secretary?—Yes; the registrar attends, but one of the members generally writes the minutes.

In what way is business brought before you?—By the registrar; there is a sheet of the business, to be transacted for the day, laid upon the table.

Does that contain merely a series of memoranda of the heads of the business, or does it contain a statement of the business, with suggestions as to the mode of disposing of it?—There are no suggestions whatever; merely heads of the business to be done, as granting apprentices, reading memorials, letters, &c. and payments of money.

Is there a board every week?—It very seldom fails; it does sometimes.

Do the governors transact business in the hospital, excepting at the board; do they personally inspect the different departments of the hospital?—Except going round occasionally to see that such and such things are right, or what alterations and improvements are necessary, the state of the buildings and state of the schools, they may occasionally go either one or two or as a board, as the case may require; but the business is transacted, for the most part, in the board-room.

Do the money arrangements of the hospital come under the cognizance of the board, or is there a separate committee for the examination of the accounts?—Under the cognizance of the board; there is no separate committee.

To what account is the Parliamentary grant, in the first instance, paid?—It is transferred, by the order of the Lord Lieutenant, to the Bank of Ireland, to the credit of the governors of the hospital; they are their bankers, by warrant, I believe.

By whom, and under what authority, is the money drawn from that account?—By the governors only; by the signatures of three of them.

Is it drawn in sums appropriated to specific payments, or is it drawn from time to time in large sums and placed in any body's hands?—There is always an account, a printed form with the account annexed, and certified to be right and correct, and examined by the officers of the house; it is then produced to the board, and an order is then written by the chairman at the bottom, and corresponding drafts upon the bank. The drafts, in general, are for every particular sum. Sometimes a certain number of small sums are put together, and the registrar receives the amount of the draft and pays those small ones.

Is the check in each case given at once to the person to whom the money is due, or does a balance ever remain in the hands of the registrar?—Very small balances; there must be some, because he receives some monies.

In what way do any monies become due to the Foundling Hospital that are received by the registrar?—We have very little to receive in that way, except 5*l.* with every infant now admitted; but our income from any other source, but the Parliamentary grant, is very trifling indeed.

Does he pay the money that is received with the infants to the account of the governors at the Bank of Ireland?—No; he acts under the accountant. He gives an account, a regular statement statement of account ; taking credit for such sums as he pays, and giving credit for such as he receives.

In point of fact, does he act as banker, as to that portion of the income ?—Rather as paymaster ; he holds the office of paymaster, as well as registrar ; we are obliged, when the nurses are to be paid, to put into his hands 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.*, but we have got considerable security from him, and he pays it in very large sums at a time. The country nurses are paid many hundreds in the course of a day. The business could not be conducted in any other way, but he gets a receipt for every three pounds, and they are passed by the commissioner of accounts.

Does the money received for the children ever pass into the Bank of Ireland ?—I do not think it does. I think there are very seldom any lodgements made by our registrar in the Bank of Ireland, because we do not draw for money, if he states he has a sufficient sum in his hands to pay the current expenses.

Is the current cash account of the registrar placed before the board of governors at every meeting ?—No, but his book is checked by the accountant every month, and the vouchers left with the latter.

How often is it produced ?—I cannot recollect having seen it ; I cannot state that : I have asked what balance he had in his hands, and he has told me. I have asked the accountant “how are those bills to be paid,” and he has said there is sufficient in the house to pay them.

Is it taken upon his own statement ?—Certainly ; his account has not been laid before the board.

Are the accounts made up half yearly or yearly ?—Yearly.

Are they inspected in detail by the governors before they are ultimately certified and passed to the auditors ?—Always by three governors, who are appointed to inspect them, and who certify them and examine them. It takes them a very long time to examine them, item by item, in the account that goes to the commissioners of imprest account, and they examine every voucher except the receipts for country nurses wages, and certify that they have done so, and that it is a true and just account, and the governors have a charter seal which is put to them.

You would say that every voucher itself is examined, together with the particular item of which it is made up ?—Every item, even the smallest sum, except as before stated. I have been on the committee ever since I have been a governor, and generally attended at the imprest office. A governor is brought forward at the time, and I think there never was a disallowance or scarcely any. I passed one, about six weeks ago, before the commissioners, and there was not a sixpence disallowed. I was not kept five minutes by the commissioners.

What length of time does it occupy the governors in inspecting and verifying the account preparatory to the ultimate passing of it ?—I think the governors get through it in three hours, each taking a part ; one looking at the vouchers, and another at the book, and another totting.

Do you, from time to time, inspect the infirmary ?—I often pay it a visit, and go through it into the wards, and see the state of the children ; but I declare the board business occupies so much time, that it is very seldom a governor, unless he goes an extra day by himself, can minutely examine into these matters. Frequently complaints come before the governors, or statements, and then we think it necessary to go and see how the matter really is.

In what way do those complaints arise, and by whom are they made ?—Sometimes by the officers, and sometimes by the governesses ; they are very obliging and kind in giving us their assistance ; they are no part of the constitution of the establishment.

Are you always aware of what is the prevalent complaint in the infirmary ?—I am aware the ophthalmia has been extremely prevalent ; but upon bringing in the children in the months of July and August, we have typhus fever and measles to a great extent ; but I think the ophthalmia has been the principal one, and it is a very teasing complaint.

Do you know whether the ophthalmia prevails constantly, more or less, in the Foundling Hospital ?—I believe not constantly ; there may be a few children with sore eyes in the infirmary at all times of the year, but to say it prevails as a disease to any great extent, certainly is not the case.

Are the returns of the children in the infirmary, and the complaints they labour under, laid before the governors weekly ?—Every week.

Are they regularly inspected by them ?—I will not say the board, as a board, accurately inspect them, but I think I was never there that I did not take up the return and look at it, and then one member and then another ; we always have a return of the number in it.

Is it the practice of the board to call before them the medical officers of the institution ?—Frequently, to confer with them, particularly when the infirmary is crowded with a particular disease, we call them up and make inquiries.

Was there any inspection of the children by the governors before the number of five hundred were lately drafted into the charter schools ?—No, there was not ; because the governors meet but once a week ; and a great number of those was drafted from the country nurses, and transferred immediately to the charter schools. The nurses were paid, and the children brought in for a night or two, examined by the surgeon, and certified by him to be in good health, and the number was made up. We made them up by thirty-two a week.

Are the governors aware that almost all of those children, on their being received into the charter schools, were found to be labouring under the ophthalmia ?—We have had it before

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy,
26 Nov. 1824.

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy,
26 Nov. 1824.

us in various shapes, and have examined the surgeon particularly upon the subject; and he has made it out to us, that at the time he sent them out they were free from it, and that they must have taken it afterwards from the change of air, or various circumstances; but I went there one day when there was a draft making up, and I put two children aside that had been selected to go by my own authority, because I saw their eyes were at least very weak; and having heard that ophthalmia prevailed very much, and that the infection had been communicated to the children in the charter schools, I was very particular in not letting any that had the smallest appearance of it go.

Did some of the children, who were drafted to the charter schools, remain so short a time as a week or ten days in the hospital?—I believe different lengths of time; there were some taken that had been in the house six, eight or ten months to make up the batch, if there did not come in as many from the country as we had ordered; for it is very difficult to get the nurses to bring the children to town, and we were obliged to make up the number by taking some children out of the schools.

Were any of them in the hospital so short a time as a week?—Much shorter, I believe. I believe some were sent off in two or three days after they arrived.

Has the prevalence of the disease in the eyes, that the children have lately laboured under, much attracted the attention of the governors, so as to induce them to think of any means of eradicating it?—Very much indeed.

Is it found to interfere with the instruction of the children?—Of course it delays the instruction of those labouring under it; but the number is now very much reduced; there are only one hundred and seventy now in the infirmary under all diseases; there were three hundred a little time ago.

Are you aware that many of the children that were drafted to the charter schools are stated to have continued with their nurses until they were as much as fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen years old?—The eldest were selected for that purpose; but I think they were not more than twelve years old. The order was, that the elder children out at nurse should be brought to town and sent to the charter schools.

Were the governors aware there were many children of that age continuing with their nurses?—I do not think it appears upon our returns; there are a great many kept back of that age; when the first order was issued, directing five hundred children to be sent to the charter schools, it was the children of such and such a year, the seniors of those that were out at nurse.

Are the books so kept as to enable the governors accurately to ascertain the ages of the children that are at nurse?—I am certain they are—I have very little doubt of it—in-accuracies may have crept into the books; now, for instance, for my own satisfaction—not for this purpose, for I have had this paper in my pocket for three months—I had this statement made out; it states the number of children at nurse, their different ages and different years: the object of the governors is, to have no child out at nurse more than eight or nine years old, if they can accomplish it; but it is a desideratum we find very difficult to obtain—that five hundred was to lighten the institution of that number.

According to the present arrangement of the Foundling Hospital, what number would the governors desire to have under education in the hospital, and what number at nurse?—We must provide for them all in one way or another; we wish to keep up the number one thousand four hundred in the hospital, all the rest must be at nurse.

What number of years would you wish to educate them?—Four or five.

At what age would you wish to apprentice them?—At about fourteen, because seven years then brings them to man's estate.

If the children were apprenticed at fourteen, and were educated for four years, and the house contained one thousand two hundred, what number ought there to be at nurse?—It is not easy to state that; it depends upon the number of infants admitted, and the number of lives saved, and the number that die.

Can you not ascertain with tolerable accuracy the proportion of deaths that take place among the children in the hands of nurses?—They are very different in different years; there were more infants died in this year 1824, than had died for many years before. We have received, I think, this year four hundred and forty children, and I am told there are eighty or a hundred of them known to have died, and that is a much greater proportion than usual.

Did many of them die in the hospital?—No, not a great number; the surgeon told me that there were three died in one week, two in another, and so on; those are matters the officers can speak to. We have received four hundred and eighty-six children since the 5th of January.

Can you estimate at all the probable number that will be received in the month of December?—Very few; we closed the hospital against admissions from the country, from the 20th of November last till the 1st of May 1825; there were only five received in the course of last week.

Do you think it probable that if the annual receipt of the children does not exceed five hundred in the year, you shall be able to effect what is the object of the governors, namely, to give every child four years instruction, and to apprentice the whole at fourteen?—Yes, to apprentice more than the number received, and if we do that we shall gradually reduce the establishment.

Have you made any calculations with a view to clear up that point, comparing the average number of deaths with the number received?—No; except this, I should say, that the establishment is very much reduced in the last four or five years. I think we paid, about five years ago, 28,800*l.* or 28,900*l.* to country nurses, and in this year we shall not

COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH EDUCATION INQUIRY.

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy,
26 Nov. 1824.

pay above 20,000*l.*; there has been a reduction of 8,000*l.* a year upon the country nurses, besides which, we have had above seven thousand at nurse, and we have now but five thousand two hundred and seventy, so that our establishment now altogether does not amount to much more than six thousand six hundred children. I think we have had above eight thousand upon our establishment.

Have you any means of knowing how the children turn out after they are dismissed from the hospital?—We very frequently do hear; but we are very often kept in the dark, certainly; we have established a correspondence with all the clergy now, who have promised to visit them and make us returns; to visit those apprenticed and those at nurse; but there have been a great many failures, a great many have left their places, and we have heard no more of them; but we have had most favourable accounts from a very great number.

Can you say what proportion leave their apprenticeships before they serve their time?—Until their term of apprenticeship expires, it will be very difficult to ascertain that fact; we should be able to form an estimate of how many have continued three years with their masters, because the third year we pay a second fee, and they must produce a certificate from the clergyman that they are going on well.

Has the system of paying fees not lasted long enough to enable you to ascertain that fact?—No; it has been established only five years and a half.

What bounty are you forced to give with each child to provide it with a sufficiently good situation?—We give 2*l.* upon signing their indentures, and at the third year if they bring up a certificate of good conduct towards the apprentice, we pay 2*l.* more; and at the end of the seven years we have agreed by the indenture to pay 3*l.* and lay it out for the benefit of the apprentice.

That is, each child that turns out well?—Yes, exactly so.

Do you require a certificate before the money is paid, that the child shall have continued in the Protestant religion?—Yes; there is the form of the certificate which will entitle the master or mistress to obtain the fee.

[The same was delivered in.]

Are the children usually apprenticed to services, or trades?—The great majority to farmers.

Both boys and girls?—Yes, as farming servants.

Is it still the practice to send them to the factory at Buncrana?—We have sent none lately, and shall send no more.

Did it turn out ill?—Yes; I should mention that this was before the apprentice fee was established, and the hospital was crowded; it was suggested to the board whether we could not send a good cargo of them to America; here was the evil of the Foundling Hospital increasing to such a degree, that they remained at the hospital till they were seventeen or eighteen, or nineteen, and nobody came to look after them; in the five years and a half that have elapsed since the apprentice fees were established, we have apprenticed 2,230 children; in the five years antecedent to that, we apprenticed but 766; we have apprenticed three times the number, and in much better situations; the managers of the factory at Buncrana were at that time very respectably recommended to the governors.

Have any of the children been sent over to England to be bound apprentices?—We never sent any, but to one respectable manufactory, and they are going on very well.

Where was that?—At Nantwich; we have had most excellent accounts of them.

Were they boys or girls?—Girls.

What number?—Either twenty or twenty-four, I believe.

Are many of the boys apprenticed on board ships?—None that I recollect; they may have deserted from their masters and taken themselves on board ship; we never apprentice them there. I will not say one or two might not be apprenticed to the captain of a ship, but we have never made a practice of it.

Have you reason to believe that many of the children that are brought into the hospital, after they have arrived at the age of twelve or fourteen, and have been with Catholic nurses, relapse quickly to the Roman-catholic religion?—I think it is very probable.

Have you any means of knowing the number of instances?—No; I have heard of particular instances, that is all I can say. I am certain of this, that they elope from their masters and mistresses, and go to their nurses, and they harbour them and provide for them. The attachment of the nurses to the children that have been reared by them is prodigious.

Do you find that generally to take place, or have you many instances in which the nurses show no great fondness?—I think it is universal, whether with Protestants or Roman-catholics, I do not make the least difference as to that; so much so that a great number of them come soliciting us to apprentice them immediately to them, without the fee, and declaring they would take the same care of them and provide for them as if they were their own children.

Have you ever complied with that request?—Often to Protestants only; thinking it very much for the advantage of the child.

Are many of the children discovered and claimed by their parents?—Not latterly; we have given up a great many heretofore from time to time; but very few now. Since they have been sent up by the respective parishes with 5*l.* the claims of parents have been very few, because it is very natural that they must condemn themselves of having imposed upon the parish; because we can by the last Act of Parliament admit no child that is not brought with a certificate from the minister and churchwardens that it is a deserted child; that they have made diligent inquiry after the parents, and cannot discover them, or either of them; they send them with 5*l.* and with what face can a parent afterwards claim that child?

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy,
26 Nov. 1824.

Do many of the children elope either from the nurses or the hospital?—Yes, a number of elopements have taken place, but not from the nurses.

Is it from the hospital they elope?—Yes; and to correct the former answer I should say, they do elope from the nurses in this way; if they have been reared till six or seven years old with one nurse, and are transferred from that nurse to another, they very frequently elope to the first nurse, because their attachments are there, and in the hospital they would do any thing to escape. We have been obliged to raise the walls, and fortify it in every possible way, and put guards upon the doors; and I think that would happen at every large school for gentlemen's children or others. They dislike the discipline; they like the lax system at home with their nurses, where they have been reared in indolence; but I suppose in the returns that will be furnished from the office the number will appear.

Do the children ever learn to read before they are returned from their nurses?—Yes.

Is there any provision made for that by the governors?—No; they insist upon the nurses sending them to a Sunday school, or a daily charity school in their neighbourhood, and giving information to the clergyman of the parish that they have such children, and putting them in the way of instruction; and at seven or eight years old they come in now, having learnt their Catechism, and very much improved.

Is it found that they take as good care of those children as of their own children?—I believe fully. The nurse must bring them up when they come to receive their wages, and if they appear to have been neglected, or not well treated in any respect, they are taken from them, and that makes a wonderful outcry; they are extremely anxious therefore to bring them up in the best state possible.

Is it found that the sons and daughters of the nurses dislike those children, or have you heard the contrary?—I do not think I ever heard one way or another.

Do you find a woman who has no children of her own a better nurse to the child than if she had a family of her own?—I cannot answer that; I think surgeon Creighton would be better able to answer that.

Has there been any considerable number of children received into the hospital within these last fourteen years, and sent out to nurses, of whom no account whatever can be given?—I believe there has.

Does your recollection, or any document you can refer to, enable you to say about what number?—No, and I cannot charge my recollection; but such returns may be had from the registrar. When the nurses have not brought the children to receive pay for three years we consider that they have disposed of them in some way or another; when they die we are sure to hear of it, because they bring what is called a dead certificate, and receive a portion of the sum.

What is done when the nurse dies?—Generally a friend or relation takes the child, and claims from the governors the sum she would have been entitled to from the time she took it. If the child is not a sucking infant, others of the family take it; but it is required to be certified to the governors by the clergyman or a magistrate, and they have the option whether they will bring it to town and give it to another, or leave it in their hands; and they have often hesitated to pay for want of information.

Have you known instances where a child has died, and another has been placed in its stead?—I do not know any thing of the kind, but such things have been suspected.

Have you not a particular mode of marking the arm of a child with a numerical letter?—Yes; but that mark may not be intelligible: there have been modes adopted to make it more lasting; but if it becomes faint or obliterated the child is marked again.

Do you conceive that it is a mark that could be easily imitated by any persons in the country?—No, I do not; but they may bring the child up with the mark so obliterated, it would be difficult to tell it; they bring up a badge also, that has been given with the child. Impositions have been practised, but I doubt whether they have been to any great extent; such things have happened.

If the nurse does not produce the child, does she get the pay for the year?—Never.

If she appears in the following year with the child in good health, does she get the pay for the two years?—No, not without very particularly accounting for her not coming the first year; and that very seldom indeed. It is not in the power of the officer to pay them for two years.

Have you reason to believe that the children suffer much injury in the transport from distant parts of Ireland to Dublin?—I am sure they do; they come into the hospital in a very wretched weak state. There has been more care latterly. That is one reason why we closed the house during the winter months; we also wished to reduce the numbers.

Is the mortality in the infant department so much reduced as to make it cease to be a subject of much anxiety to the governors?—Yes; it was until this year, when it increased.

To what do you attribute the increase in this year?—I can only account for it by their having been in a worse state when brought into the hospital; though they die after they come in, the same care is taken of them in the hospital, I am sure.

Must there not exist some fixed proportion between the number to be apprenticed, and the number to be admitted in each year, in order to prevent the accumulation of children in the country at nurse?—We have stretched the point as far as possible this year, and apprenticed a great number that were old enough, but not sufficiently educated, in order to get them out, and to reduce the number in the country, by drafting in others.

The question is, whether there must not necessarily exist in the nature of things some fixed proportion, determined by reference to the duration of human life, at the different periods periods of life, between the number to be admitted in successive years, and the number to be apprenticed in those years, in order to prevent accumulation ensuing?—If the hospital was reduced to the state we could wish it to be, that we could bring in all the children from nine to ten years, and that then they could apprentice as many as were admitted, we should keep it balanced.

Have the governors ever endeavoured to ascertain what that proportion is?—No, I do not think they have.

Are the governors aware that in the Eighth Report of the late Commissioners of Inquiry, it is admitted that that proportion is as one to five, and that it is there stated that the matter has been satisfactorily ascertained?—I was not aware of that.

Assuming, then, that the proportion is as one to five, would it not necessarily follow, that unless one fifth of the average admissions are apprenticed in each year, that accumulation in the country must ensue?—That is quite clear; but my calculation is, that the apprentices will far exceed the admissions.

Is it not a fact that the average annual admissions into the Foundling Hospital, prior to the late regulations, were about two thousand per annum?—Yes, some years back, for a long course of years, and that accounts for the number in the country; for during those years the number apprenticed was very few.

If by any means the institution could have apprenticed as many as four hundred in each year that accumulation would not have taken place?—No.

Is it not equally clear, that in order to draft any given number into the hospital in any year, you must apprentice an equal number?—Exactly; and that is the great object now in view.

We may then conclude, supposing the facts to be as above assumed, that in order to keep the hospital from being overloaded by an excess of accumulation, that the number, both of children to be drafted from the country, and the number of children to be apprenticed from the hospital, should in each year equal one fifth of the admissions?—I should hope they would exceed the number of admissions, and prevent the accumulation, because the number apprenticed and the number drafted is the same.

The proportion of the number apprenticed to the number admitted, appears to have varied extremely; for instance, in the year ending the 10th of October 1817, the number admitted was no fewer than 2,260, and the number apprenticed was only 103; must not the operations of that year necessarily have led in part to the present accumulation?—Yes, that and other circumstances.

The proposition which we were endeavouring to suggest to you was, that there is necessarily some fixed ratio between the number to be apprenticed and the number to be admitted, which on the one hand would not allow accumulation to ensue, and on the other would not reduce the amount of children at nurse?—To be sure.

It was further meant to suggest, that the Report of the former Commission of Education did assume, that that proportion was one fifth; in short, that the number of children who are sent out to nurse in any given year will be reduced to one fifth of that number, when, at the period of ten years, they come to return to the hospital?—Yes, by death and other circumstances.

Have you any reason to doubt that that is a true statement?—Indeed I have not.

We are also agreed that the number to be drafted into the hospital from the country must be equal to the number apprenticed?—Surely.

Then surely it follows as necessarily as any arithmetical consequence can, that the number to be apprenticed in a year ought to be one fifth of the total number admitted?—I dare say it is the case, but I cannot state it is; but of late years we have apprenticed more than one fifth of the number, and shall for some time to come; for instance, just take the last year, there have been already in this year 411 apprenticed, and 480 admitted, and I dare say the difference have died.

In point of fact, have the governors ever endeavoured to ascertain what the ratio is between the number of children to be apprenticed in each year, and the number to be admitted in each year, which, if adhered to and observed, would keep matters precisely in statu quo, that is, would neither permit the number of the children in the country to increase, nor cause it to diminish?—No, they have not.

Is it not quite evident that it is necessary to ascertain that ratio in order to adopt any fixed principle for the regulation of the Foundling Hospital?—It does not strike me that it is; it may be.

What, hitherto, has determined the discretion of the governors as to the number they would apprentice in any given year, seeing that that number has in fact fluctuated so much, as that in the year 1817 they apprenticed only 103, and in the succeeding year only 82, and in the succeeding year 584?—I cannot say in any given year; but what influenced them to grant apprentice fees was to get rid of the accumulation of such as were fit to be apprenticed, and that lay upon their hands; in consequence of which, the accumulation in the country was so great, that the payment to the nurses in the country amounted to 29,000*l.* in the year.

Has the rule then always been to apprentice as many as possible?—Yes, hitherto it has; at all times to apprentice as many as possible, and we have even stretched the point in that respect latterly.

Then the reason why, in the year 1818, only eighty-two were apprenticed was, that nobody would take more?—Yes, nobody would take them; we frequently put advertisements in the papers.

Are we to understand, that in the succeeding year, 1819, when you established a fee, there

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy,
26 Nov. 1824.

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy,
26 Nov. 1824.

there was not actually a demand for more than five hundred and eighty-four?—No; I am surprised it was so much, because the giving the fee was not so much known. We sit one day in the month for apprenticing children, and above a hundred people come and look for them. I will venture to say, I could apprentice five hundred in five months.

Subsequently to 1818, have any well-recommended persons applied for apprentices who have not obtained them?—A vast number. I have put my signature to sixty-five or seventy in one day. I ordered that number to be apprenticed, and I dare say thirty persons went away unprovided.

Then you do not in point of fact apprentice all you might?—They are not fit for it; they are not educated nor old enough.

What do you consider determines the fitness or unfitness of the child to be apprenticed?—Much inferior qualifications than we could wish determine us now; from the anxiety to get in those children that exceed ten years old, we apprentice them, if they can read tolerably well—if they are instructed in their Catechism and can write a little; but the governors are in hopes when the numbers are reduced within a proper scale, they will keep them three or four years, and not send out any that are not thoroughly educated, after reducing this number of grown children.

The technical form for bringing a child in from the country and placing it in the hospital to be educated is called “drafting”?—Yes, it is.

What has hitherto regulated the discretion of the governors with respect to the number of children to be so drafted in successive years?—According to the accommodation in the house, and the capacity of the hospital to receive them.

Is it not evident, that it must have been exactly commensurate with the number you apprenticed?—Certainly, or that were sent to the country for health, or died. We will say one thousand two hundred was the estimate; whatever the number fell below that at the time of the drafting, we received that number in, so as to complete the one thousand two hundred; but we have gone upon a different principle lately, from the desire to bring them in: we used to draft but once a year, that was the time of pay; we now draft in at all seasons of the year, at least when it is fit for them to be brought in to fill the vacancies that occur.

The new regulations under which the admissions to the Foundling Hospital have been reduced from 2,000 to 500 have been in force for about three years; that is, since the year 1821?—I think this is the second entire year.

If those regulations had not been adopted, would it not necessarily have resulted in the course of a few years more, that many children at nurse in the country would have become adults in the nurse's custody?—Certainly.

Might not that consequence have been averted, even without the adoption of the new regulations restricting the admissions, if the governors of the Foundling Hospital had made regulations for apprenticing a much greater number in each year?—I think so; if they had given those fees fourteen years ago, this accumulation would not have existed.

In other words, are there not two principles of cure, and the one not less efficacious than the other, namely, the limitation of admissions on the one hand, and facilitating the exit of the children on the other?—Yes, and those have been the two that the governors have wished to carry into effect.

To what cause do you attribute the inconvenient accumulation of children in the country, which in point of fact did take place, and which in the year 1820 induced the governors to change their principle?—The difficulty of getting masters to take them as apprentices, and the indiscriminate admission of children.

The governors have sought to remove both causes; on the one hand by restricting the number to be admitted, and on the other, by inducing masters to take a greater number of apprentices by granting fees?—Yes.

The Commissioners have understood that another new principle has been adopted by the governors of the hospital, about which they are desirous of further explanation; namely, transferring children at the age of five years from their Roman-catholic nurses to Protestant dry nurses in the country?—Yes.

At what period was that regulation adopted?—It has not been made mandatory until the course of the last twelve months.

What induced the governors to take that course?—From the experience they had of the difficulty of bringing them up Protestants, if they remained with their Roman-catholic nurses after that age.

At what age is it now the wish of the governors that children should be transferred from the Roman-catholic nurses to the Protestant nurses?—There is an order upon that; it is either five or six years of age.

[The witness was requested to furnish copies of all orders or regulations upon the subject.]

Can you state what number of children have been so transferred up to the present time?—No; the registrar can.

How many children do you trust to the custody of one of those Protestant dry nurses?—Seldom more than three I think; I believe there are but few instances of their having so many.

Where do those Protestant nurses chiefly reside; in what districts or parishes?—In the counties of Dublin, Wicklow, Wexford; some in Kildare and Carlow.

By whom are they recommended?—By the clergymen of the parishes.

Do you find it difficult to procure a sufficient supply of nurses?—I must observe, that the governors have not been able to turn their time and attention to that, and it is left with the officers, with the chaplain, and registrar, and surgeon, to make the transfer; they have business

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy,
26 Nov. 1824.

ness that occupies them from six o'clock in the morning to six in the afternoon, during the time they are paying the nurses.

Can you state to the Commissioners in what manner the Protestant women fit for such a trust are brought first into communication with the Foundling Hospital?—By notes of recommendation in writing sent up by respectable persons.

In what manner is it suggested to the Protestant clergyman to make those recommendations?—It has been a practice so long—I do not know that letters have been written—but it has been signified to them in some way. I do not think there was ever any circular letter sent.

Can you inform the Commissioners whether you have generally had reason to be satisfied with the conduct of those dry nurses in taking care of the children?—I think so.

Do you conceive that they take equally good care of them as the nurses by whom they have generally been suckled?—It is difficult to answer that.

Can you suggest any line of inquiry by which that most important fact can be ascertained?—I think not at present; but it would be very ascertainable a year or two hence. I do not think the practice has existed long enough to come at such a result.

Could the names of those Protestant dry nurses be furnished from the Foundling Hospital?—There is no doubt of it, they are every one registered.

Are there any regulations for the clergymen of the parishes in which those dry nurses reside inspecting the children from time to time, and communicating with the governors?—They have been requested to do it. The wish of the governors has been mentioned to them in a letter, with the sanction of the bishops of the respective dioceses.

Have any printed forms been supplied to them for that purpose?—No, not yet, for returns; but printed circular letters.

Have they acted upon that circular letter?—Yes, they have, I believe, in some cases; it was only last spring such letter was sent.

Then probably you are not able at present to offer any decided opinion as to how that plan has been found to answer, or otherwise?—No.

Can you inform the Commissioners whether the children are apt to be discontented at the transfer?—Yes, at the moment; but they become reconciled afterwards. It is the greatest agony that can possibly be. There is one thing, it would be quite useless to transfer them unless to a different part of the country, as they would immediately go back to the former nurse.

Can you form any opinion as to whether the children are more or less dissatisfied at being transferred from a Roman-catholic nurse to the Foundling Hospital, or from Roman-catholic nurses to Protestant nurses in a different part of Ireland?—I have no doubt they would rather be transferred to a Protestant nurse than come within the walls of the hospital.

Was there any particular correspondence between the governors of the Foundling Hospital and the Irish Government upon the subject of the accumulation of children at nurse in the country during the last ten or fifteen years?—I do not recollect it; a statement might have been sent in, in the annual petition to Parliament, and the estimates; there might have been some remarks made in the letter that goes to the chief secretary, but no regular correspondence.

The hospital is now closed during the six winter months against admissions from the country parts of Ireland, from the 20th of November to the 1st of May?—It is.

What is your opinion of what becomes of the infants who are exposed during those winter months in the country?—I believe they are taken care of by the parishes till the hospital opens, because there is a great influx when the hospital opens in May, and of children older than they generally are; the parishes have probably paid for their maintenance.

Can you give any information as to who defrays the expense, or takes the care of providing for those children for the winter months in the country?—No.

It appearing from the returns to be a fact, that subsequent to the adoption of the new regulations, the annual admission is about five hundred; and that prior to their adoption it amounted to two thousand; the Commissioners would wish for your opinion as to what becomes of the other fifteen hundred at present?—I believe many people take care of the children themselves; when they thought the children would be very well taken care of, and that they could claim them at a future time, a great many sent them to the hospital to be nursed.

Is it your opinion that infanticide has not increased in the country parts of Ireland in consequence of your regulation?—I have been told by country gentlemen, that they are afraid it has to a certain degree.

Do you think the number of five hundred would be increased, if the regulation as to the necessity of depositing 5*l.* was omitted?—I am sure it would.

Do you think it would be increased, if the sum to be deposited was reduced from 5*l.* to 3*l.*?—Yes, I do.

Do you think the number of five hundred would be diminished, if it was necessary to deposit 10*l.*?—Yes, very much indeed; I think it would be very difficult to raise that sum from the country parishes.

Have you any reason to suppose that the adoption of the precise amount of 5*l.* is that which, on the one hand, will permit all real foundlings to be brought into the hospital, and on the other, exclude all children who, from the circumstances of their parents, would not be proper objects for the charity?—I think it is a very judicious rate.

Was it adopted upon any other principle than guess?—It was adopted upon the principle that there were former Acts of Parliament by which parishes were bound to provide for foundlings, and authorized to levy that sum upon the parish for the provision of it; and therefore it was adopted. From those Acts of Parliament the city of Dublin was exempt.

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy,
26 Nov. 1824.

Will you state the extreme distance from which the nurses bring the children in the country to the Foundling Hospital to receive their payments?—I doubt whether they exceed thirty-five miles.

Enumerate the counties in which those nurses reside?—The counties of Dublin, Kildare, Carlow, Wicklow, and Wexford; there may be a few in other counties, but the principal counties are those I have enumerated.

Is there any material proportion of those wet nurses Protestants?—I have latterly been told there would be a sufficient number of Protestant wet nurses procurable.

In those same counties?—Yes.

Is the fact inquired into whether the nurse who proposed herself is a Protestant or Roman-catholic?—Latterly it has been.

Is any preference given in respect to the religion?—There is.

Is the number of persons proposing to become wet nurses greater than the supply of children?—I understand considerably so.

Have you never any practical difficulty in obtaining a sufficient number of wet nurses?—None.

What is the period of the year at which the children are brought up by the nurses, and exhibited at the hospital to obtain payment?—It has latterly commenced at the latter part of July, and continued through August for about six weeks.

The Commissioners understood the other day from a witness, it was proceeding to the latter end of October?—I believe that was for broken periods, and for the payment for dead children, which takes place a fortnight after the other is concluded.

Have the governors experienced considerable practical advantage from the assistance given by ladies who are so good as to devote a portion of their time to the hospital?—The greatest advantage possible.

Do the ladies confine their visits to infants and the girls side?—Very much.

Do they go into the boys school, or interfere in any way?—I believe not.

Or to the boys dormitories?—They may go through them and see whether they are clean.

Is it considered a part of the duty they undertake?—Certainly not.

Has there been any material decrease in the regularity of the ladies attendance in the last year or two?—No, I think it has been very much increased by some ladies; there are three or four with whom it is increased.

Will you state those who, in the present year, have been in the habit of visiting the hospital?—Mrs. Magee, Mrs. Cleghorn, Mrs. Ruxton, and Lady Ann Gregory, chiefly.

Is it not understood, that each of those ladies takes one month as her period of attendance?—That has been the case, but it does not prevent other ladies from attending, if they think proper, and they visit and hold meetings whenever they please.

The ladies you have mentioned have no doubt most carefully attended during their own three months, but who have given attendance during the remaining nine?—I cannot exactly say, for I think the other ladies have fallen off, from one cause or another; they have resigned, or been absent from Dublin, and their place has not been supplied by others.

About ten or twelve years ago was not it found, that each month actually found a lady to discharge the duty?—Certainly; and to this day it is a regulation.

Is it your impression that the ladies are equally regular in their attendance as at the period referred to?—There has not been so regular an attendance of twelve, but there has been a better attendance of three or four.

Can you suggest any cause that has led to the non-attendance of other ladies?—Absence from town has been one cause.

Is there any particular book kept by those ladies for registering their observations upon the state of the hospital, and the conduct of the officers?—Yes; they have a private book, and one to lay before the governors.

Is the book they lay before the governors the property of the hospital?—Yes.

Is the one they keep for their own use considered a private document?—Yes; they transfer it from one to the other.

When that last-mentioned book is filled, what becomes of it?—I cannot say.

Has one been filled?—I cannot say.

Have the children in the Foundling Hospital ever complained to the governors, or any body else, of harsh treatment or any thing else?—Yes; there was a complaint made two or three years ago, that the head master (Mr. Flenley) had punished the boys too severely, and that he had used an improper instrument of correction. The governors investigated the complaint, and made him produce the instrument, which was a cat-o'-nine-tails: they were much displeased with him, reprimanded him severely, and strictly prohibited him from using in future any other instrument than a birch rod. I never heard since of a complaint.

In what manner did you provide for the carriage of the children from the Foundling Hospital to the charter schools?—They were walked off, in batches of thirty and thirty-two, to the society's house in Aungier-street; they were taken care of in one of their schools, and a number were sent to the schools on the same day, to Kevin-street, and Clontarf, and, I believe, to Santry.

When a child dies in the country, whose business is it to communicate its death to the Foundling Hospital?—It is the person's business to go to the magistrate and make oath of the circumstance, and transmit it to the governors; or, I believe, in some cases, the certificate of the clergyman, but I think there is an oath required.

What is there to induce the nurse to go and take that oath?—To entitle her to receive the portion of her pay that accrued from the last payment to the day of the death of the child.

When

When the children are transferred from the Roman-catholic nurses in the country to Protestant dry nurses, do they pass through the hospital as a mode of transfer?—Always; they are kept generally for some time, a week or ten days, in order that the other nurse may attend from the country, and not know where the child has been.

Can you state what ordinarily becomes of the children of the women who become wet nurses to the children of the Foundling Hospital?—They have either reared them first, I believe, or they may have died; it is no objection if they have suckled their child for six or eight months.

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy,
26 Nov. 1824.

Appendix, No. 8.

EXTRACTS from the further Examination of the Hon. and Rev. John Pomeroy; Monday, 19th December 1825.

SINCE we last had an opportunity of examining into the state of the Foundling Hospital, it has sustained a very serious loss in the death of Mrs. Magee, who took so much interest in its prosperity. We should beg of you to state your own impression, whether any material deterioration in any of its departments has ensued in consequence, or whether the zeal and attention of any of the ladies has, to a certain extent, been found to fill her place?—I am quite of opinion, that latterly as little injury has been sustained as could be supposed under the circumstances, and that other ladies have attended with great zeal and determination to follow up Mrs. Magee's system.

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy,
19 Dec. 1825.

In reference to the preparatory school, which was very much her own plan, is it your general opinion that that is flourishing nearly as much as when she attended to it?—Yes; it apparently is improving every day.

Are we to collect that the result of that experiment has answered your expectations?—Very much; it is quite delightful to see it.

Do you think the state of the infirmary is satisfactory at present?—Very much so.

Is it your impression that the number now in the infirmary, and which has been in it during the last summer and autumn, is more or less than the average in former years?—I think it is less than in former years; it averages about ninety in one thousand three hundred.

Are there one thousand three hundred children in the institution?—The number was one thousand three hundred and six on Thursday last.

Can you give us any particular information as to the state of the school for the instruction of candidate teachers, which was establishing in the Foundling Hospital last year?—No, I cannot. I understand it is going on prosperously; but I have not had time to apply myself to it, nor do I think it part of my duty, as a governor of the hospital; they have sixteen in it, I believe.

We wished to learn whether it was to you we were to look?—No; there was an application to the governors lately to afford the committee an assistant master, they engaging to take out permanently one hundred boys to work upon; we thought the proposal very much to our advantage, and we gave them an assistant master to aid them.

They have hitherto had a very inferior number?—Not more than twenty, I believe; they have had twenty or twenty-two of our boys for some time past; they have entered into a sort of agreement with us, that they should permanently keep one hundred.

About how long have the twenty children been in attendance?—During the greater part of last year.

Was there any particular reason why they have not had a greater number hitherto; the Commissioners ask the question, seeing the number is scarcely greater than the number of teachers?—Their number of teachers has varied; they have got situations for a great many; sometimes they have not had more than eight or nine; they have sixteen I believe now, and they expect to increase it to thirty.

Will you name the person you would refer us to, to obtain more particular information?—The Reverend Mr. Magee and Sir Francis Lynch Blosse.

What is the name of the master?—Mr. Aickin; Mr. Murray is pretty conversant with what passes in it, but without interference.

Have you ever happened to visit the Military School for soldiers children in the Park?—Never; the Foundling Hospital and other institutions occupy so much of my time, I have not had leisure to visit it.

The Commissioners have been struck, to a certain degree, with the superior strength and activity evinced by the children in that institution, compared with those in the Foundling Hospital; and they are disposed to attribute it in a considerable degree, amongst other causes, to the children in the former having the advantage of a course of gymnastic exercises, under the teaching of an individual of the name of Beaujeu; we understand that it is under the consideration of the governors of the Foundling Hospital, whether he should attend their institution; will you state how the fact is?—He offered his services for a time gratuitously; we approved of them, and I believe, as far as the boys were concerned, it would be desirable to continue it.

Was any adequate machinery established in the Foundling Hospital?—No, it was merely an experiment.

Are you aware whether any of the governors of the Foundling Hospital have ever visited the analogous institution of the Military School we have referred to?—No, unless the Archdeacon of Dublin has, who is a governor of it.

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy,
19 Dec. 1825.

Was it ever formally under the consideration of the board of governors whether Monsieu Beaujeu's services should be accepted as to the boys?—No.

There was no proposition ever made?—There was a proposition made by him, but not in such a formal way as to bring it to a point.

If it should turn out upon examination that the health, strength, activity, and happiness of the children in the Military School, are in fact materially promoted by the adoption of that system, should you think it proper to be taken into the consideration of the governors of the Foundling Hospital, whether they should adopt it also, so far as boys were concerned?—Yes.

You recollect a minute of the 10th of June 1824, to this effect: "That at the ensuing pay all the children above the age of four years, who are now with Roman-catholic nurses, be transferred to Protestant nurses;" has it been the endeavour of the governors to act upon that minute?—They have acted very successfully upon it.

Is it your impression there is any material number of children above the age of five years in the hands of Roman-catholic nurses?—My impression is that the number is comparatively small, and that another year would take them altogether out of their hands.

Under five years old?—Yes, and even at a younger age.

From the experience you have had, and adverting to the reduced number of admissions into the Foundling Hospital, is it your opinion that you will henceforward be able to procure Protestant wet nurses as well as dry nurses?—Yes; the clergymen of the country give us every reason to expect that they can send a sufficient supply.

Upon the present pecuniary terms?—Yes.

In point of fact, are there any children now put into the hands of Roman-catholic wet nurses?—I cannot say positively that there are or not.

Is there any direction given to the proper officer to prefer the Protestant wet nurses?—Yes, whenever they are to be had, they are to be preferred: and instructions have been given to keep the children back for that purpose; it is very desirable that they should go, in the first instance, to Protestant nurses, because we avoid the expense and other disadvantages of the transfer.

Then we are to understand you have adopted the principle of transfer from a feeling of necessity, but that in future you intend to obviate it altogether by giving them to Protestant nurses in the first instance?—Yes.

It forms a part of this prospective arrangement, that the clergy in the parishes in which those nurses reside, should give their personal superintendence to the instruction of those children?—Yes, and they are doing it; there is a great deal of attention and zeal in many instances.

In what manner are you made acquainted with the instances in which clergymen perform it with attention, and the few instances which we presume some times occur where they are negligent?—There are some clergymen who have undertaken to pay the nurses, that the money shall pass through their hands upon certain terms—nurses are only entitled to a certain premium if they do their duty generally to the children; and an additional premium if they bring them to school and catechism, if the clergyman certifies it; the premium goes through the clergyman.

At what age do you conceive it desirable that the children should be taken out of the custody of such nurses, and from under the superintendence of those clergymen, and brought into the hospital?—About eight or nine years old, as far as the accommodation of the house will afford.

You will observe that there are many people who might consider it an advantage to bring children back into the hospital out of the custody of Roman-catholic nurses, and in a state of things where the Protestant clergy did not feel it to be their duty to superintend the education of the children; such we presume to have been the case in time past, but at the same time the same people might entertain very serious doubts whether there would be any advantage in bringing a child from the superintendence of an affectionate Protestant nurse, and from under the superintendence of a zealous clergyman, to place him in the hospital; we should be obliged to you for your view upon that subject?—I think for the sake of order and regularity, when we draft in children at a particular season of the year, it is right to take them from the eldest children that are out at country nurse, because, how are they to be provided for otherwise?

You provide for them at fourteen?—Thirteen or fourteen would be the proper age to apprentice them.

The arrangement you have suggested will secure your keeping them six years in the hospital?—I think eight is too young—nine or ten, so as to keep them four years.

The question then is, whether you conceive they would pass their time more profitably from ten to twelve in the Foundling Hospital, than they would if left in the hands of Protestant nurses, and under the Protestant clergyman in the country?—In some cases they might: but there are two reasons; one is, that they would not be so disciplined in the country; they get into more vague habits, and mix with other people in spite of the clergyman or the nurse; it is better they should come into the hospital at a certain age to be disciplined, and prepared for being apprenticed.

Do you consider that the discipline of the Foundling Hospital is a favourable circumstance to prepare them for apprenticeship?—I do.

And that the instruction and habits of life they acquire in the Foundling Hospital will eventually be superior, with regard to their future destiny, to that which they could hope to obtain in the hands of their Protestant nurses, and under the superintendence of Protestant

testant clergymen, and attending good daily and Sunday schools in the country?—This may be matter of opinion.

Is it not a most important matter of consideration, as it is likely to affect the whole character and fate of the children in question?—There are so many it is not likely they could all get into the hands of good nurses; where we had a particularly favourable report from a clergyman that they were doing well, we might extend the time.

We wish merely for your own opinion as to the superior advantages or disadvantages of the two systems?—I think if they could be provided for from those country nurses, without coming into the hospital at all, perhaps it would be a very good plan; but if they are to be weaned from those nurses at some period, and are to be brought in for the general purposes, I think it better for them to be brought in at ten than twelve years old.

Do you think it would be impracticable to apprentice them from their nurses, without ever coming into the hospital?—Not impracticable, but it would interfere with the regular routine of the proceedings of the hospital, and be difficult in the detail.

Is it not your impression, that there is a considerable number of children who have been retained by the nurses in the country, and who are now become adults, and have taken their places in society?—A certain number undoubtedly, but it is hard to say how many; I do not believe it is a very great number.

Have you any doubt there are many hundreds of such individuals now in existence, in the county of Wicklow for instance?—I think not; but I think they would be more likely to be retained by Roman-catholic nurses than by Protestant; because the Protestant nurses know, if they fulfil their engagements correctly, and have a good recommendation, we should be very willing, if they desired it, to apprentice them to them, therefore I think the Protestant nurses do not hold back the children. I think it is only Roman-catholic nurses who have a desire to keep them back.

We have not yet received precise returns, but we understand the number of admissions during the last year has been materially smaller than the year preceding?—Yes, seventy less.

Can you account for that in any particular manner?—I believe that the parish officers in the country, who are obliged to send the money up with them, are more watchful and attentive than they were formerly.

Have you any cause to apprehend that the diminution in the number of admissions has been attended with any increase in the disposition to infanticide?—We have had nothing before us from which we could infer any such thing.

Appendix, No. 9.

Examination of the Reverend Henry Murray; Monday, 22d Nov. 1824.

WHAT situation do you hold in the Foundling Hospital?—I am Chaplain to the Foundling Hospital.

Do you hold any other situation in the hospital?—No, not in the hospital.

Have you any superintendence of the children?—Yes; I have the general superintendence of the whole institution.

You are resident there?—Yes, I am.

Do you superintend the instruction of the children?—Yes, I do.

How long have you held that situation?—I have been twenty-three years, if I live to the first of February next, in the hospital.

What salary have you?—£.231. 7s. 6d. a year in money, besides my apartments, coals and candles, not so much coals as I want, but a certain allowance of coals and candles, and two of the children of the house for servants, a boy and a girl. 200 l. a year was the salary I was allowed, and £.31 7s. 6d. in lieu of dressing the dinner in the public kitchen, and the clothes washed in the laundry; but that was found inconvenient, and that sum was allowed instead of it.

What number of children are there in the house altogether?—There are 879 grown children this day in the house, and about 200 children of seven years of age which were brought in from the country; they form an independent school, it was done last year; making a total of 1,079.

Is that the whole number in the hospital?—Yes, except a few infants; from July to July the numbers are always diminishing by apprenticing, and when they are sick, they are sent into the country sometimes.

Is the building capable of admitting many more boys than are now in it?—A few more; they are forming a new school there, called the Training School, for the Association for discountenancing Vice, and we have given up some apartments for the benefit of that institution; it is not yet commenced, but it is in a train for commencing, and will commence in a fortnight, as I conjecture.

What are they to train there?—Schoolmasters and parish clerks, a class of individuals more wanted in Ireland than any thing else. It was always intended we should have 1,200 grown children in the house, and we have had 1,300 at times.

How do you define the word "grown"?—I define the word "grown" thus,—children, say from eight to twelve years of age, or thereabouts.

Have you no children in the hospital older than twelve?—Yes, we have; some of them we do not bring in till they are twelve, and some that were kept back by their nurses, and not brought in in time; the number of grown children in the country was so great that we

Examination of
the Hon. and Rev.
John Pomeroy,
19 Dec. 1825.

Examination of
Rev. Henry Murray,
22 Nov. 1824.

Examination of
Rev. Henry Murray,
22 Nov. 1824.

were not able to bring them in, and that brought upon us an accumulation which did us great injury; we have got it under now in some measure.

Are there many children now with their nurses older than those in the hospital?—No, I believe not any, except a few that the nurses have kept back, or that have been left out for various reasons.

Are there any children in the grown department that are sixteen years of age?—I think probably there are some.

Are there any that are seventeen or eighteen?—No; not eighteen as I think; there are some that we call superannuated, which are at large, employed about the house; there may be a few individuals sixteen or seventeen. I do not keep the register, and therefore merely speak from conjecture.

Can you state what length of time those grown children have been in the hospital?—Some of them, very few, have been four years, very few of them three, the majority of them have been two years; the great majority have been admitted this last year, drafts as we call them. This year there are very few of 1821; there are very few of 1822; I think there are a good many of 1823.

What number of 1823?—I cannot tell; the registrar has it in his books.

Is it not the wish of the governors that the children should be four years in the hospital under instruction?—Yes it is, if it could be effected; but owing to the immense number of children we had on the books, we were obliged to force them out before they were properly qualified to be apprenticed. It was originally intended that the children should have been four years in the hospital, two years of which they were under instruction, and two years at trades, every alternate day, which is not the case now: the weaving and shoemaking have been given up entirely.

For how long have they been given up?—About two months.

What induced the governors to give them up?—It was to make room for the training school; they thought they could get things as cheap by purchase.

In consequence of that regulation, are the children now at school every day?—A great number of children that were formerly employed in weaving and shoemaking are at school every day. We have a number of boys with the tailors, and in the gardens, and carrying coals, and some with the carpenters; but there are a great number of boys, on account of the weaving being given up, at school.

Deducting those, what number attend the schools every day?—I could not tell that.

Of 879 grown children, what is the proportion of boys and girls?—The proportion of girls 536, and 343 boys; I exclude from the girls the 200 that are preparatories, that is a distinct establishment entirely,

Have not the greater number of those that have been admitted in the last two years in the hospital exceeded fourteen years of age?—I cannot say; I should imagine there are a number that did not exceed fourteen; but there were a great many that were twelve, and which in my opinion was four or six years too much, for we shall never be able to make a proper provision for the religious education of those children.

Do you find that the children who have been with Roman-catholic nurses have been instructed in the Roman-catholic religion, or taught the catechism?—I cannot say they have been taught the catechism, but they have been imbued deeply with Popish principles; we see that every day.

In what way does it show itself?—In the bias of the children's minds, and inattention to the instruction we give them, and a seeming dislike to what we say to them, and disregard at least for a time; when they are left with us any time, that impression wears away; I have known a number of children who came in with a strong bias to the Roman-catholic religion, and have become very steady Protestants.

Have you ever seen it show itself in the children's habits?—Yes, particularly in the girls, not in the boys; the girls would not take broth on Friday.

That is one of your regulations; they have broth on Friday?—Yes, the broth of the beef boiled on Thursday is given on Friday.

What do they get on that day if they do not eat the broth?—They get nothing; that would be the very way to indulge them.

Does it prevail to any great extent?—No; I have seen thirty or forty refuse to take the broth, and endeavour to elude the taking of it.

Are those children suffered to go without food on those days?—They have the bread.

The bread is not crumbled into the broth?—No, it is not; it was formerly put into it to make them take it.

Have you any means of knowing whether those children become Catholics after they leave the hospital?—No, we have no particular way of knowing, but we casually find out that a few do go back to the Roman-catholic religion; it is a great desideratum with us to know that, but I think the great majority remain Protestants. Since we gave a fee to the masters, when they come at the end of three years, if they do not show that the children have regularly attended church they will not get the 2*l*.

How is that shown?—By the master bringing the child to the hospital, and sometimes the clergyman writing.

Is it possible that the clergyman can know the facts he states?—Yes, I think they do; the children are principally apprenticed in the dioceses of Dublin and of Ferns, and the Archbishop of Dublin and the Bishop of Ferns have impressed upon the clergy the necessity of attending to those children.

To what persons are the children generally apprenticed?—Generally to farmers of late.

Has there been an increase of late?—Yes; we found it very difficult formerly to get the children children out; their Romish nurses very often endeavoured to make the children run away from their places, and people did not like taking them, but of late the governors have given 40 s. with a child when it goes out, and three years afterwards, if the master behaves well to the child, and the clergyman certifies it, they get 40 s. more, and the child gets 3 l. at the end of the time.

Examination of
Rev. Henry Murray,
22 Nov. 1824.

Do many children elope from their masters?—Not of those we have seen lately; not nearly so many as formerly.

Have you sent any to Buncrana Factory lately?—Formerly we did, and we are very sorry for it; we were glad to get rid of them in any way then.

You do not send any there now?—No, nor to any factory; we sent some to Nantwich to a factory there.

Did they stay there?—Yes, they did; only one came back to us as I believe.

How many did you export?—Thirty, perhaps, at two different times.

At Buncrana they had no means of getting their own living after they left?—No; and I imagine they were not well used. We had some reason to suppose they were badly used; indeed factories were places we did not wish to send them to. We sent some children also to Lucan; they generally turned out well; and the master treated them with great kindness.

Are many of them apprenticed to trades?—Not many; the tradespeople want fees, which we cannot give them: of late they have gone to farmers in the country generally.

And if they continue three years in a place the master gets 40 s.?—Yes, they get another 40 s.: they have 40 s. at first, and the apprentices get 3 l. at the end of their time, if the clergyman certifies that they have behaved well; and I do not think that any money was ever better expended than that. Since that resolution was made by the governors, we have a different class of people who apply; you would think it was the money that induced them to come, but did you see the number of decent farmers that come you would be surprised.

Were they dressed for the occasion?—No; the clergyman of the parish writes a letter with every one of them: he writes a private letter, as they imagine he would not wish to disoblige his parishioners. The governors take uncommon pains; I have known them sit there till five o'clock in the evening canvassing the different claims of the persons applying. I think they take every pains.

The governors personally?—Yes.

Have you ever had any means of knowing whether persons in want of apprentices prefer the Foundling Hospital children to the charter school children, or vice versa?—I think they prefer the Foundling Hospital children on this principle, that they have no retainer; no father or mother to run after them and take them from their places, though the Foundling Hospital children are smaller than the charter school children; I think their stature is not so large.

How do you account for that?—I do not know how to account for it, except that when they were with the nurses they were not so well fed: the charter school children are bigger; they remain a great deal longer in the charter schools than with us; we for some time past do not keep the children more than two years at the longest: we have not had time to give them the education we wished to give them.

In what state of health are the children in the hospital?—Of late it has been very bad.

What diseases have they laboured under lately?—The chin-cough and small-pox, and amongst some of them, the ophthalmia was very prevalent; but there are much fewer than there were. Medical people know the causes of those things better than I do. I think there have been more medical patients this year than I ever remember.

Has the ophthalmia been the prevailing disorder?—Yes.

Is the form of the ophthalmia, under which the children labour, so severe as to make it impossible for them to attend in school?—In some cases they might attend the school, but those who were over them thought it better not to let them attend the school; but it ran through almost the whole of them notwithstanding that.

Did very few children escape?—Very few indeed of the girls.

How long has it existed in the hospital?—Every year it has been in the hospital; there is less or more of it when the children come in; whether it arises from change of diet or change of air, or the cutting of their hair, I do not know.

Do you think the seeds of the disease exist in the hospital, and that when the children come they are very likely to catch it?—No, I do not think it does. I think in the course of a short time the ophthalmia, at present existing, will be got under. I generally visit the infirmary once or twice a day; when children are very ill I visit them, to talk with them and pray with them, not to judge of their eyes.

When do you recollect this ophthalmia to have prevailed before?—Almost every year that I have been in the house, when the children are drafted in; a short time after the drafting commences the children get the ophthalmia.

The children that come in, or those that are there before?—It goes over the whole of them, for I understand it is infectious.

Is there any period of the year in which the hospital is decidedly free from the ophthalmia?—Yes; I do not recollect the ophthalmia prevailing in the spring or in the summer; it is always after the drafting. I got the ophthalmia myself from the children, and I have had it this present year; I caught it from the children; the reason I suppose I got it from the children was, that it was at the time the children were very bad.

How often have you had ophthalmia in your life?—I had sore eyes when I was a boy, and I have had the ophthalmia twice since I have been in the hospital.

Do you happen to have observed whether the same children had it twice?—No, the

Examination of
Rev. Henry Murray,
22 Nov. 1824.

observation I made is general; that after the drafting the children get the ophthalmia, but this year worse than others.

At what time were the children selected to be sent to the charter schools?—Immediately after the drafting; they were sent every week in rotation.

Had the ophthalmia broken out in the school before they were sent away?—No, I do not recollect that it had; I think the ophthalmia did not break out till the drafting was pretty well over.

Do you recollect whether any children had the ophthalmia before they were drafted?—I do not know indeed; I examined all the grown children that came in to see what progress they had made in their learning; I keep an account of it in order to know the relative progress they make in the school afterwards, and I do not recollect noticing any who had it then.

Whose duty was it to select the children to send them to the charter schools?—The governess and head mistress selected the girls, and the head master and I selected the boys; there is a list of the boys; there were two boys only of all those of the year 1821; twenty of the year 1822; eighty-three of the year 1823, and 115 of the year 1824; they only passed through the school; some of them knew something on coming in, because we make it mandatory on the nurses that have them to send them to school.

Were many children that were sent to charter schools above fourteen years of age?—I imagine not, certainly; if you take the account the children give of themselves, you would be misled very much, or indeed even the masters of the charter schools.

Was any account sent with the children to the charter schools of their age?—I believe there was; we know their age by a letter on their arms; there is a letter for each year; you cannot mistake the age.

Do you prick it in?—Yes; it is marked upon their arm when they are infants, and we know from that the age of the child; there may be nearly the difference of a year; it may come in at the end of the year, and we put it down as a year old.

Is that mark to ascertain the year?—Yes; the year and identity of the child too; there is a mark and number, and before the nurse is paid the badge is examined, and the children's arms, to see if it corresponds, otherwise we should be imposed upon at all points.

What principle were you guided by in selecting the boys to send them to the charter schools?—The head master was the person principally employed in selecting the children; I imagine he did not send the very best, that is not probable.

Did he send the very worst?—I do not know that I can say that; if there was any boy of promise I dare say he did not send him; but as to their health, they were all sent to the surgeon.

Was the principle of selection that he picked those he preferred to stay, and sent away the refuse to the charter schools?—I cannot say he sent away just the refuse, but he did not send away the very best; it is human nature; I do not think any body would have sent the very best; but I do not think there was any great difference in those that went and those that were left behind.

Were not a very large number of them so lately admitted into the hospital, that he could have had no opportunity of instructing them?—Yes; and in that respect he was guided by a little conversation with the children; of those boys there were 155; of the drafts there were 260 altogether.

Was he allowed to exercise his own discretion as to the selection?—Yes, he was, pretty much; he brought them to me after he had selected, and I did not reject any of those he brought; I considered he knew the children better than I did, particularly those drafts; I could not know them, he had some of them a week, and some a month under his care.

Was there any rule applied to choose either the eldest or the youngest, or to make a collection of their ages?—I do not think there was; I did not hear that the board had given any direction of the kind.

Do you think he governed his selection in any degree by reference to their ages?—I imagine not, because there are 155 of those drafts of this present year; he was obliged to make up the number, and I believe they are of different years; if you will just consider the nature of the house, you will see that the master of the school would be obliged to keep some grown children; he has eighteen monitors, and there are a number of boys employed in carrying coals and various other things of that kind that little boys would not do for.

How many masters are there?—There are four masters under the head master; it was first intended to have no master, but it was found that would not do.

How long is it since you have been affected with the ophthalmia?—This very year.

About what time?—About six weeks ago; I got a relapse of it afterwards, after getting pretty well.

Had the ophthalmia prevailed in the hospital long before you caught it?—It had. The way in which I caught it this year, I believe, was this: there were directions given, that if the surgeon sent out any children that had the smallest remains of infection, that I should inspect them with the head mistress; and, from the crowded state of the hospital, the surgeon was anxious to send the children to school, to prevent their getting worse in the infirmary. I looked narrowly into their eyes, and very likely I got it in that way.

Were those children you inspected children that had been passed by the surgeon as free from it?—He did not say they were free from it, but he supposed they would get well by going out into good air; but we sent back every child that had the smallest remains of it.

The directions to him were, that he should not pass any child that had any remains of it?—I suppose so; but I do not know that; the directions given to me were, that I was to examine examine them; the head mistress was to examine and see if she found any remains of it, and if they differed, she was to bring them to me, and I narrowly looked into them. Some that she rejected, I did not.

This inspection took place upon the occasion of the children being drafted to the charter schools?—No; it was from the hospital.

They were to be drafted to the charter schools after you saw them?—No; the children that were drafted into the charter schools were not sent into the hospital at all.

What was their inspection connected with?—The immense number that had the ophthalmia induced the surgeon to send them out of the place into school, to get rid of them; but I was directed to look narrowly to all those children that were sent out, and if I did not think them perfectly free from it, to send them to the infirmary.

Where would they have been if you had considered them safe?—In the schools; the idea of the surgeon was as I tell you, and the surgeon remonstrated with me for sending them back.

If the surgeon passed children for the purpose of their coming into your own schools, which children had some of the remains of this infection about them, might he not have passed some that went to the charter schools, with some remains of infection about them?—He might.

Were there many returned by you on the ground that the disease still continued upon them?—I dare say there were. I dare say I returned back thirty altogether. Suppose he sent home twelve children that he thought would be better in the schools than in the hospital; the head mistress, out of those, would select four or five she considered not perfectly cured, and she was to bring them to me, and if I concurred with her, they were sent back to the infirmary.

Does it ever happen that a child is apprenticed who has not been a year in the hospital?—It does.

What is the shortest time you have ever known a child to remain in the hospital?—I have known them to remain not more than a week or a fortnight, for we have been for some time past in the habit of transferring the children from one nurse to another, to break the connection; and, in some instances, the nurses have been so attached to them, that they have offered to take them without any fee at all, and they have undertaken to give them an education, and that the governors have consented to: consider how the governors were forced to lighten the load upon the house.

Were the children, who remained so short a time in the hospital, apprenticed, without being able to read or write?—Without being able to write, and perhaps to read.

Have they been apprenticed without being able to say the church catechism?—Yes; in some instances I dare say they have; but the masters undertake to teach them those things themselves.

Could not that have been ascertained by examination when they came into the schools?—All the children that are brought into the schools I examine at the time they are drafted.

Do you find that many come in that do not know how to read or write?—It is not more than three years since we began that system of making them know something in the country, for formerly they knew nothing; but the governors finding they were so long in the country, have made it a point that the nurses should send the children to school.

Have you any means of carrying into effect that resolution?—Yes; if I find that a nurse has not made the child make any progress, I take the child from that nurse and give it to another.

Do you find where the clergymen pledge themselves to see that the children are instructed in the church catechism that they always do so?—As far as it comes under my cognizance they do; the clergymen deserve a great deal of credit for the pains they have taken with our children, but it is within these two years a change has taken place.

What do you attribute that to?—To a growing zeal for religion, and the charges given by the Archbishop of Dublin and the Bishop of Ferns to their clergy: they have both taken a great deal of pains, and charged their clergy to take notice of them.

Do many children elope from the hospital?—Not of late; there have been a good many elopements; the nurse often does all she can to make them elope; when she sends them in, she gives them their lesson.

Have not seven eloped in the last quarter?—I dare say there might.

Are you not made acquainted with the fact when the children elope?—Yes, but I do not take any particular account of it.

In what way are they able to get out?—It is surprising the cunning and artifice of the children, and the means they take to deceive you. Sometime ago the gardener had left the key in the garden door, one of the children took it out and hid it; we imagined some of the children had taken it, but it was near a month afterwards before he availed himself of that opportunity.

If there was a gap in one of the walls round the premises, what number do you think would elope?—When they come in first I think the greater part would elope, but after they have been there some time they would not; there is an immense number of children we send into the field and into the garden, they could elope if they like, but when they have been some time in the hospital they generally forget the nurse, and feel the comforts of the hospital, and they do not feel any disposition to it—they look upon us as strangers at first.

What books are the children taught in the school?—They are taught the Bible, such as can read it, and the Testament, and they are taught Mrs. Trimmer's Abridgment of the

Examination of
Rev. Henry Murray,
22 Nov. 1824.

Old Testament, and those books that are made use of in the central schools, and Osterwald's Abridgment of the Bible.

What catechisms are they taught?—They first read the common catechism, then the catechism broken into short questions.

By whom was that catechism written?—By the late Primate Newcome.

Is Stopford's catechism used?—Yes, occasionally. The catechisms used are the common church catechism, the catechism broken into short questions, and Crossman's catechism, the object of that is to explain the words found in the Prayer Book, the next catechism is Mann's and Lewis's; but what I lay the greatest stress on is this—I examine all the grown up boys three times a week in the Bible, and connect it with the catechism of the Church of England, the litany and the liturgy of the Church of England, and I find that the most effectual of all modes; getting catechisms by heart is of very little use. I am the catechist of the charter school at Kevin-street, and I think you would there see a specimen of the kind of education that would tell in this country.

You have enumerated a series of catechisms: are we to understand that the same child goes through each of them successively?—A child that was to stay four years would go through all those catechisms, but as they remain a short time in the house, if we teach them the common catechism that is all we can do.

Suppose the case of a child who goes regularly through that series of catechisms you have described, will you mention the order?—First, the common catechism, the same catechism broken into short questions, Crossman's catechism, the next would be Mann's catechism, Stopford's and Lewis's.

There are six catechisms in succession?—Yes there are; there is another catechism which is sometimes used at present, the Bishop of Down's catechism, I have it for such children as go to the association's examination; but I found teaching the Bible, and connecting it with the liturgy of the Church of England, more efficacious than all the catechisms of Europe, but at the same time I by no means neglect the catechisms.

Be so good as to state which of those catechisms you conceive the best for the instruction of children?—I think Lewis's is an excellent catechism—every church has a catechism of its own, and if you take the text detached from its context, you may prove every thing; but I think Lewis's gives the text fairer than any other I know.

Do you think Stopford's the second best?—I do; I think Mann's the worst.

What do you think of Thistlethwaite's catechism?—A very good one.

When the children are examined for catechetical premiums under the direction of the Association for Discountenancing Vice, are they examined in the several catechisms you have mentioned?—It is left discretionary with the examiner; but I observe that in general the examiner confines himself to the Bible, at the examination. Secker's Lectures on the Church Catechism, which is one of the best books possible, that our boys read—it is plain, and contains a great deal more information than books that have harder words in them.

Have you "Porteus's Confutation of the Errors of Popery," bound up with it?—That is the edition we have, it has the six sermons against popery.

Do you not think that Stopford's catechism enters a little more into the controversy between the Protestants and Roman-catholics than would be considered desirable?—There are two editions of the catechism, we use the one that retains that part, but I am not for temporizing at all—I should speak out.

Does Thistlethwaite's catechism enter into that controversy at all?—No, not at all; it is rather adapted for the meridian of England, and that is not calculated for this country. Any man who knows this country would make an important distinction between the two.

Did you ever see a book called the Leeds Catechism?—No.

Or the Bristol catechism?—No, I never heard of them.

Did you ever see Archbishop Usher's catechism?—No.

Did you ever hear of it?—No.

What do you mean by a Scripture catechism?—A catechism that would be called a catechism upon the gospel of St. Matthew, for an instance, would be one that would relate to all the particular parts of St. Matthew. I have several catechisms that have been written by myself for the use of the children at the Foundling Hospital, and several copies have been taken by different masters and ushers of the different schools and societies: I dare say forty copies have been taken of them at different times. My testament is interleaved, and I put down from time to time any thing that occurs to me. I have made several scriptural catechisms; one on St. Matthew, another on the Acts, and another on John; but they are very much torn by lending them to different people. I do not want them now from long experience; it is the result of twenty-three years experience. I was catechist for a great while to the school at Baggot-street, and I was transferred from that to Kevin-street. I am sorry I cannot give up more time to it. I am there once a week, and sometimes oftener.

Does your own manuscript catechism go much into the questions in controversy between the churches of England and Rome?—Yes, whenever it occurs; I do not go out of my way to it. When a text occurs in the New Testament, I show the children that the explanation put upon it by the Roman Catholics is not the true one.

Does your catechism attribute idolatry to the church of Rome?—No, I do not say that any where expressly. As the result of my opinions upon this subject, I would state, that at Kevin-street last Saturday I was examining the children in St. John; and I showed them, from the circumstance of the woman of Samaria, how we should deal with those who differed from us; that with regard to their errors, when an opportunity occurs, you ought to endeavour to show them they are wrong, but you ought to treat their persons at the

the same time with kindness, as our Lord did when he told the woman of Samaria her religion was nonsense. If Jesus has left us an example that we should follow, why not follow him in that respect.

What punishments do you find it necessary to have recourse to in the schools?—For the girls there is solitary confinement; and when a girl is remarkably refractory, there is a punishing room which she is put into, and the boys are whipped occasionally, not often; very often they come in from the country with habits of roguery, and habits of dirt and filthiness, and there is a great deal of difficulty in training them into good habits, which difficulty you would not find among those that were more civilized.

Are the punishments always conducted in a regular formal manner, or are the ushers in the habit of beating the boys when they meet them?—No, not often; such a thing may happen occasionally, but it is not the system: the system is, if a child does any thing wrong, the child is reported to the head master, and he inflicts such punishment as he thinks necessary, four or six strokes, sometimes on the hand, and sometimes on the back.

If, during play, such a boy was to offend the usher, would the usher be allowed to beat him angrily?—No, he would not; he is not allowed to do it, but people will break the laws.

Would it be passed over without notice?—No, it would not; some of them have been fined for it, and if a child elopes by negligence, they are fined 5s. for it.

Is there any punishing room for the boys?—No.

What is the punishing room for the girls?—It is a common room; the room for solitary confinement is a dark room.

How are the girls punished?—At the discretion of the head mistress; sometimes they are whipped. If a girl does a wrong thing, she is confined for a few hours, or a day; if she becomes refractory she is punished certainly, but always under the superintendence of the head mistress.

What instrument is used for punishing?—The rod is the instrument; sometimes the head master uses a rattan over the shoulders; that is used for the boys.

In the open school?—Yes.

About how many strokes constitute a moderate flogging with the rod?—I imagine about half a dozen; sometimes not more than two.

Have there been any instances of punishment that have come under your observation that you would consider cruel?—I have heard the surgeon complain sometimes that the children were punished too severely; I have heard them say so.

How long since?—Not for some time past; but I have heard the surgeon complain that the head master had punished some children severely.

The boys complained to the surgeon?—Yes; but any body who knows these boys so well as I do, would not place implicit reliance upon what they say, for they would hurt themselves to vent their spite, particularly if any body encourages them, and though I have known it was carried to a little excess, I have been loth to say before the boys I disapproved of any thing of the kind; if I said it before the boys, it would encourage them to insubordination; it requires a good deal of delicacy to manage them.

Is there any person who derives any emolument from the labour of the children?—No none at all; I do not think there is any emolument, it is all for the benefit of the house.

In what way are they supplied with food?—By contract—the governors advertise, and people send in tenders; the meat, flour, and bread, are all supplied by contract; but there are some things that cannot be so well taken by contract, they are provided by the providore.

Do you recollect what the diet is?—The third of a pound of bread in the morning, and half a pint of gruel stirrabout was the regulated breakfast, but it was found so difficult to get it ready in the morning, they have it in the evening instead; the cook and the children must be up so early to get it ready; the boys and girls formerly had beef, cabbage, and potatoes for dinner on Sunday, but it kept so many of the children from church, and there was so much to be done afterwards in washing the vessels, it was thought a bad thing for the children to see it, and of late they have had given them two ounces of cheese and a third of a pound of bread, and half a pint of good beer; they have potatoes and milk on Monday, two pounds of potatoes and half a pint of milk; they formerly had meat three times a week, they have it now twice. One of the governesses thinks bread and cheese and beer is a bad thing for them, as leading to a love of drink, so that the diet is not fixed at present.

Is it any part of your duty to inspect the dormitories?—No further than the general superintendence of the whole house, but I frequently go through them.

Are they in a fit state?—I think they are.

How often are the beds supplied with clean sheets?—Once in three weeks.

Are they supplied according to the rule?—I think they are in general; at some odd times they find a difficulty in drying them, and it may not be done to a day, but it is every three weeks on an average.

What clothing are they supplied with?—The boys have one complete suit in a year, and an additional pair of trowsers in May, three pair of stockings and four shirts.

How many shoes?—Three pair of shoes in the year, but very often they wear out more, and they then get mended shoes, they are not allowed to go without shoes.

Are the clothes supplied by contract?—No, we have tailors in the house; the children make all the clothes, formerly they made all their shoes, but they do not now, and the weaving is given up now; there are a good many fluctuations, it is hard to speak with precision upon these points, they vary from year to year.

Examination of
Rev. Henry Murray,
22 Nov. 1824.

Upon the whole are the children sufficiently well clothed?—I think they are, for children of their condition in life.

At what age, upon the drafting in of the children, have you observed that the religious impressions they derive from their nurses have become so strong, as to create any difficulty in counteracting them?—We have seldom brought them in of late years under twelve years of age, and I consider their staying with their nurses any period after seven detrimental to them and ruinous.

Are we to understand that in children ten years old, you have found any serious difficulty in removing their impressions in favour of the Roman-catholic religion?—Yes, indeed I have, and some may be hypocritical enough to say they are convinced of the truth of the religion of the Bible, which is the Protestant religion, and when they go out they may prove to have been acting the hypocrite.

Should you say, as the result of your experience, that when children have attained twelve years of age, the difficulty of removing their religious impressions is considerably increased?—Indeed I should.

Are we to understand that you have experienced any considerable difficulty in the instance of a child drafted at eight years of age?—The difficulty diminishes every year, but I think children coming in at eight years have had those principles instilled into them, and it has been difficult to remove them.

In a case where a child has reached thirteen or fourteen, have you found the difficulty of changing the religion of that child almost insuperable?—There is so much hypocrisy among them it is almost impossible to be certain; they pretend to be convinced when they are not, it is only God that can read the heart, we can never be sure of them.

Do you feel it necessary to give more of your own trouble to a child thirteen or fourteen, than to a child of eight or nine?—Indeed I do.

What do you conceive, according to the standing rules of the institution, is the regular age for a child being drafted into the house?—It is hard to say; on account of the immense accumulation, the governors were unable to adhere to any particular standard; when I first came to the hospital the rule was to draft them in when they were seven or eight years of age, but during the war the increase was so great, there were 2,600 admitted in one year, and there was no outlet for them; it grew so much, the institution would have burst if they had not taken some of those precautions they have taken now.

We are quite aware there it is an inconvenient accumulation of children at nurse, and also that they are drafted at very various ages into the hospital; but the question is, what you conceive to be the rule of the house, supposing there was an option and the rule could be complied with?—I apprehend the rule to be to bring them in at six or seven, and the governors would be glad to do it if they could.

Is there any rule upon the subject at present?—I do not know that there is any rule upon the books, it is a question of expediency, but if they had their option they would bring them in at that age.

Have you ever read the Eighth Report of the late Commissioners of Inquiry upon this Hospital?—No, I have not.

That report assumes there is a rule, and that ten is the regular age for drafting children into the hospital, and it states further, that it is found by experience, that in a given number of children admitted as infants, about one-fifth will be found at the age of ten years to remain for the operation of drafting into the hospital; has it ever occurred to you to consider whether that proportion was well or ill founded?—I have heard it so stated by medical people, and I have no reason to suppose it is not well founded, but the governors would be glad to admit them sooner.

Supposing that calculation well founded, does it not necessarily follow, that in order to keep down the inconvenient accumulation of children in the hands of the nurses in the country, that an amount equal to one-fifth of the average annual admissions should be drafted from the country into the hospital each year?—No doubt of it.

Does not it also follow, in order to admit of the possibility of that number being drafted, that an equal number must be apprenticed in each year?—Surely you cannot bring them in without there is an outlet, but lately we have apprenticed as many as we could get out; this year we have apprenticed 500 children already, and we have now no more ready to apprentice. The number of respectable farmers that come from Wexford and Wicklow, and other places, would surprise any body.

We observe that the numbers drafted in each year vary in an extraordinary degree; will you describe the manner in which the number is regulated in each year that is to be drafted—what determines the discretion of the governors in that respect?—I cannot well answer that, but as far as the house will allow them, I believe they wish them to be drafted in. We have taken in these two years past a great many children, and got out a great number.

Would it not be a necessary consequence, from the principles we have just agreed upon, that if permanently upon an average of years the number drafted into the hospital should be less than one-fifth of the number admitted, that children must ultimately become adults in the country in the hands of the nurses?—I should think so certainly.

Was not the institution in fact fast approaching to that state in 1821?—Indeed it was.

Have not very extraordinary exertions been made, in the last three years, in order to avert those consequences?—Very great exertions, and they have succeeded. In the first place the difficulty of admission is very great compared to what it was, and the facility with which we get the children apprenticed is much greater.

Do

Do you call it success if they have drafted children into the hospital fourteen years of age?—I call it success, because I do not think it will occur again.

What do you conceive to be the greatest age of the children now at nurse in the country?—I imagine eleven, and some few twelve.

Do you call it success, if at this moment the institution is obliged to leave children eleven years of age at nurse in the country?—I should think if we had not gone on as we have done in these last two years, we should have had children sixteen years old in the country, but we have transferred such children as we were obliged to leave in the country to other nurses, and put them under the care of the clergy, and I do not apprehend that the same consequences will follow now.

Was that done to weaken their attachment to the Roman-catholic religion?—Yes, and their attachment to the nurses.

Were not the nurses to whom the children were transferred Roman-catholics?—No, certainly not. I suppose we have transferred 700 children in the last year.

What have been the ages of those children?—Really I do not know; they were generally from six years and upwards, there were some cases in which the Roman-catholic nurse had done her duty by the child, so as to instruct it very well, and I did not take it from her.

Are we to understand that in the 700 instances you have spoken of, you found 700 Protestant nurses?—Yes, certainly; some of them had three or four children. We have got very few children of that age with Roman-catholic nurses.

Do you conceive that those children will, through the instrumentality of those nurses, be brought over to the Protestant religion?—I think great good will be done; I am very sanguine; my thoughts at present are, that great good will be done.

It is intended that those 700 should be drafted into the hospital?—Yes, a great many will be brought in next year; there are very few of those children with Roman-catholic nurses now. In many cases where I saw the nurse had done her duty, I left the child with her.

A child that remains with its nurse till eight years old, how much does it cost the institution?—Not more than 3*l.* per annum.

Then 24*l.* is paid to the nurse?—For the first year the nurse gets 5*l.*: she gets a bounty of 40*s.* in addition to the 3*l.*

Every child that has continued with the nurse that number of years has cost the institution 26*l.*?—Yes.

And if it continues till fourteen, it costs the society 44*l.*?—Yes, and perhaps more; for some years the governors gave the nurses 4*l.*

Is there not then a great ultimate loss in leaving the children a great deal too long in the hands of the nurses in the country?—Yes, there is; but the loss I mind is the loss of morals and every thing we wish to instil into their minds.

Would it not be better economy to bring the child into the hospital at an early age rather than leave it out longer?—Yes, it would; because you could apprentice them.

How early could you apprentice them?—About twelve.

Is that the earliest age?—Yes; not sooner than eleven or twelve; they would not be worth any thing before that.

What should prevent the governors from calling in at present all the children twelve years old and upwards and apprenticing them at once?—Nothing; but perhaps they imagine they may get a little more education by keeping them longer in the house. The governors do call them in from time to time; this last year or two they have not waited till the month of July. When there has been a vacancy, the registrar has written to the nurses to send in the children to make up the number; sometimes, when the children are well grown, the nurses have not sent them, but have kept them back entirely.

The Eighth Report which has been already alluded to, mentions a mode of instruction peculiar to yourself, of which it speaks in terms of high commendation; is that the same that is still pursued?—No, my mode of instruction was very much altered; they introduced another mode which they have varied since; my mode of instruction was in a great measure altered.

Do you consider your present mode of instruction equally effective as that which received the commendations of the Commissioners of Education in 1810?—It is unpleasant to me to speak of that, but on my oath I think it is not. We had Darling's plan of writing, and his mode of teaching arithmetic; now the new mode paid much less attention to the Scriptures and to exercise the understandings of the children, and it was to be carried on entirely through the medium of monitors under one master; but it was found that the children went back greatly, and we were obliged to get masters.

Who do you believe to be the author of the new mode of instruction?—It was said to be Dr. Bell's; our children, before that new mode of instruction was introduced, used to exceed all the other children at the association's examination; and from that time forward, although I gave as much pains to it as before, they have not met with the same success.

Are we to understand that the institution is now reverting in some degree to the mode of instruction of which you approve?—I think it is in some degree, among the boys particularly.

You have spoken of a growing zeal for religion as distinguishing the present time, do you consider the present masters and mistresses of the hospital to be peculiarly religious persons?—I cannot say so of them all; they are all moral people, and I think the head master and mistress are religious; I cannot say any of them are irreligious, I believe they are all very moral people; whether they are impressed with the importance of Christianity, or whether they understand it as I should wish them to understand it, I cannot say with certainty, but I think they are as good as any people you will get in general.

Examination of
Rev. Henry Murray,
22 Nov. 1824.

Do you mean that the head master and mistress are deserving of commendation, in that respect?—Yes, indeed I do; they do as well as they can; the head mistress is an English-woman, and the head master resided many years in England.

How many lady governesses are there at present?—It is hard to answer that; we should have one for every month, but we have only Mrs. Magee and Mrs. Cleghorn; Lady Anne Gregory did attend this year three or four times.

Is there not a particular month in the year appropriated to Mrs. Magee and another to Mrs. Cleghorn?—I cannot say, they have altered it so much this year; I do not think they have come to any understanding. Mrs. Magee has certainly done a great deal of service; she introduced that preparatory school, which I think is one of the best things that has been done for the hospital for a great while. The origin of that school was this: it appeared the drafting before the last, that some children belonging to us had, at the age of six or seven, been given the sacrament by a Roman-catholic priest in the country; this shocked every body who heard it; every body knows that it is said "Let every man examine himself before he eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup;" it was this made Mrs. Magee think of this preparatory school. It came out in this way, on the examination of the clergyman of the parish where they went (Mr. Corrie); they told him they had received the sacrament when they were between six and seven years of age. This was the system the nurses were acting upon.

In what manner was the preparatory school calculated to prevent the recurrence of that practice?—It took 200 of those children, who were between six and seven years of age, from the Roman-catholic nurses.

Do you suppose that the children who still remain in the hands of the nurses from six years of age to fourteen have, any great proportion of them, received the sacrament?—I cannot answer that. We have not a great number of grown children with Roman-catholic nurses; you will find the bulk of those above six are with Protestant nurses. The preparatory school is held where the Foundling was formerly; the Foundling is nothing now.

Explain the distinction between the preparatory school and the other?—It is a female school entirely for children from six to seven years of age; in the other schools we cannot take them in till they are between ten and twelve.

Is there any school provided for a child who is more than seven years of age, but less than ten?—No, there is not; those are the children that are transferred from the Roman-catholic nurses to the Protestant. The clergyman of the parish always sends in a letter with the nurse, to say whether such children have attended church, or not; and if the nurses do not get the clergyman's letter, I take the child away directly.

Has there been any month this year in which no lady has attended as visitor?—I think there has been; there is a lady I ought to have mentioned before, Mrs. Ruxton, she has paid a good deal of attention, as far as her health would allow, and she has been of great service to us in Kevin-street.

You have spoken of the attendance of the ladies during the present year, was there a greater attendance of ladies during 1823, than at present?—I do not immediately recollect the time particularly that Mrs. Magee became a governess; I imagine it was in this very year.

Is it your impression that if Mrs. Magee, Mrs. Cleghorn, and Mrs. Ruxton, were necessarily absent from Dublin, or should cease to be governesses, there would be no acting governesses in the Foundling Hospital at present?—I do not know of any; our registrar, who keeps the accounts of the governesses could tell that.

Was not there a very full attendance of governesses eight or ten years ago?—There was.

Can you in any manner account for the difference in the attendance?—No, I cannot.

Have you ever heard any cause suggested for it?—No, I never heard any body speak of it at all. I think Mrs. Magee is by far the most efficient and active, she seems to be the person that does the whole of the business. Lady Anne Gregory was there a month, and I believe only a month.

Is there any book kept by the ladies governesses, in which they enter their observations?—There is.

In whose custody is that?—It is given from one lady to another.

When a book is filled with observations, what becomes of it?—I do not know that; it has been left with me by two or three of the governesses, sealed.

Is it understood that it becomes ultimately the property of the institution, is it destroyed, or does it become the property of the governesses?—I do not know what becomes of it, they may show it to the governors.

When a volume is filled what becomes of it?—For many years after I came to the house there was no such book, and I do not imagine that any book is filled yet, they have not occasion to make many remarks.

Has there not been lately introduced into the Foundling Hospital a school of some description for the training of masters?—Yes there has, it is introducing; the rooms are set apart, and this very day the beds came in, but there is no candidate come yet, there is a master appointed for teaching.

Will you explain what is the plan of that institution?—The plan is, to employ young men to act as parish clerks and parish schoolmasters, to combine the two characters in one man, if possible.

At what age are they to be received into the institution?—From sixteen to twenty.

How long is a boy of sixteen to be kept in this school?—I believe that is a matter that can only be determined by experience.

Is it understood that the boys to be admitted into this school are all to be foundlings?—

No

Examination of
Rev. Henry Murray,
22 Nov. 1824.

No, it is rather proposed that the parish clergymen throughout Ireland, where they find young men of promise, and with good voices, shall write to the association, mentioning that there are persons of that kind, to know if they will take them.

This school is to be connected with the Association for discountenancing vice?—Yes, entirely; I will render what assistance I can. It was talked of that the candidates should be exclusively foundlings, or boys from charter schools, but that is a thing that would not meet with my approbation; we have none now large enough or fit for it. I think the parish clerk ought to be a sensible man, and the minister's right hand, and I do not think our little boys would be respectable enough for it; I would rather have the son of a respectable farmer—one who knows the world.

Your observation would apply, and in a still stronger degree, to a boy trained in a charter school?—I think the same objection would apply, but I would not apply any general rule of rejection to them.

Did you ever hear it was to be the rule, to select the young men to be trained in this institution from the charter schools; in short to graft the charter school boys upon the Foundling?—It was said it would be right to select those masters from the Foundling Hospital and the charter schools, and I gave it my decided negative, from what I knew of them, not that I would exclude them altogether.

Are you a member of the Incorporated Society?—I am not.

Have you ever visited their training school at Santry?—No, never.

Have you ever heard of the plan there pursued?—We have two of the charter school-boys from Santry as masters, at our house now, who are going on well.

Do you think it would add to the estimation and character, and respect that belong to parish clerks, that they should be selected from the charter schools and the Foundling Hospital?—No, I do not think it would add to the respectability of the clerks and schoolmasters over Ireland, but it would add to the respectability of the children if they were selected; I would not exclude them, but I would be much more inclined to take the bulk of candidates from the class I have spoken of.

What is the intention of the association?—I believe they have not come to any particular decision upon the subject as yet; it is a matter in embryo.

Why was the Foundling Hospital selected?—Because they could give them room; and if they make the young men teach, they could give them something to practise on.

Do you not think it will be considered by the public as an establishment for preparing foundling children for the situation of parish clerks?—No, I think not.

Is the school considered at all as a part of the Foundling Hospital Institution?—No, only in affording accommodation.

What is the inducement for holding it there?—Because it could give that accommodation upon better terms than any other institution. If they choose to train these young men to the teaching of children, they can come to our schools.

In the Kevin-street school, have you seen the training of girls going on?—Yes.

Do you think it is going on successfully?—Yes, we have sent out a great many that have turned out very well.

Are you acquainted with the Charlemont-street institution?—No, I do not know it.

For what situations are those candidate usheresses intended?—For usheresses to schools, and nursery governesses.

Any thing else?—Yes, schoolmistresses, if they are taken, and some have been taken in that character.

Do you find many families apply to you for nursery governesses?—I think a tolerable number, not as many as I should wish; but as soon as we get them qualified they generally go.

Will you describe the attainments and education of a girl whom you consider qualified to act as a nursery governess?—I am informed that they work very well, and write a very good hand, and are very tolerable arithmeticians, and know the Bible, and read well for children in their situation; and I teach them English grammar every third week, and geography and English history.

How many of those candidate usheresses are there at present?—Twenty; I believe there are two supernumeraries.

They have been all charter school children?—Yes, every one.

In what way are they selected?—The different charter schools send them.

Do you think that they send the most clever of them?—In some instances we have thought that they have not; the committee of fifteen have written to them upon it, telling them not to send us dunces.

Have you ever made it your business to inquire from the children that were drafted into the hospital whether they had been confirmed by a Roman-catholic bishop in the country?—No; if they were, they would not tell me; I am afraid to put questions to bring out lies; if I do not examine and find it out indirectly, I cannot find it out at all.

Do you know whether according to the regulations of the Roman-catholic church the sacrament is ever administered to a person not confirmed?—I do not know that; it was administered to children of seven years of age, and they were not confirmed I should think.

What do you think was the object in administering the sacrament to them?—To clinch them to the Roman-catholic religion.

In what way was it to effect that?—The clergyman told the children if they ever went to church after that, they would be damned; that was impressed upon the mind of the children.

Examination of
Rev. Henry Murray,
22 Nov. 1824.

How did you ultimately settle the point of going to church with them?—They are still in the country, and are transferred to Protestant nurses; it was by a Protestant nurse the clergyman found it out.

Do you conceive that those children have gone to church since or not?—I have no doubt they have gone to church regularly since, because Mr. Corrie takes considerable pains with them, and we should soon hear of it if they were not; if his certificate does not come with the nurse at the pay day, they would not be paid; the nurses are aware of that, and are warned if they do not bring a certificate, that they have regularly attended the church, they would not be paid.

Do the clergymen ever sign those certificates as a matter of course?—I really imagine not.

Do they examine into the truth of the matter?—Yes, I know several clergymen keep a list very regularly of those children, and make them sit in a place by themselves in the church; if the same pains had been taken years ago, it would have told very differently.

In one of your answers you said, that the "foundling was as nothing;" what did you mean by that?—The reason of that is, that we now admit no children, except such as are certified to be foundlings, and the parish must send 5 l. with them, so that the number in the foundling is next to nothing compared to what it was.

We refer to the Eighth Report of the Commissioners, which has been alluded to; they say, that "the mass of admissions into the hospital is made up of three principal descriptions of infants; the first class is the offspring of the poor and necessitous, a great part never claimed by their parents, who by extreme distress, often accompanied by disease, are incapable to maintain them. The next class is described as being the offspring of the vicious and profligate, which may be divided into the offspring of unmarried females, who send their infants to the hospital to conceal their shame: secondly, the offspring of dissolute parents, who though capable of maintaining their infants, are not inclined to do so; the third class of infants belonging to mothers who could easily rear them, but knowing they will be taken care of at the expense of the public, choose to send them into the hospital." Of the children now sent into the hospital, what proportion should you think belongs to each class?—There are no children to be sent in now, but the children of one class; the clergyman and churchwardens must certify that they are foundlings and have no father nor mother; if the father or mother be known, they will not take it; it must be a deserted child.

You do not care whether legitimate or illegitimate?—No, the child must be a deserted child.

Do you not believe that the persons certifying are often deceived upon that point?—You have a sort of tie over them, the parish are obliged to send 5 l. and I think they would inquire whether it was a deserted child or not—I think the governors have gone as far as men could do.

Do you think the boys or the girls turn out best?—I could not pretend to say, I think pretty much the same; I never saw any reason to draw a line of distinction.

Have you had any reason to believe, that the girls have more difficulty in providing for themselves?—Yes, they may have.

Has it ever occurred to you to know whether the girls that have been trained in the Foundling Hospital, have subsequently fallen into vice?—Some few of them, but not so many as you would expect, when you consider the circumstances under which they are placed on leaving the hospital at that time of life.

Can you give us any sort of idea what you should suppose to be the proportionate number, that fall into vice under such circumstances?—No; I could not form any idea, not even a rough guess; but I do think and believe very few of them fall into vice, when I consider their situation.

Have you ever heard it has been a subject matter of imputation upon the institution, no doubt by those who were its enemies, that such is too frequently the result?—I have heard it said so, but I thought it was from want of proper information; I have known some fall into vice, but I consider very few.

Do you conceive such imputation, when it has been made, to be generally speaking, unfounded?—Yes, I think so; I have no reason to think otherwise; I have no means of following them into the world.

Have you had the means of observing whether, on the whole, those children are inclined to be ashamed of the circumstances of their birth, or whether the possibility of their having derived their being from persons in high rank in society, has rather operated to make them proud?—I think they are ashamed of it, very few like to come back to the hospital, they are harassed by their fellow-servants.

In what manner harassed?—Called nicknames; and they give various names to these poor children, that make them ashamed of it.

Could you enumerate any of those nicknames?—Yes; "whores gets," they call them, and "parisheens;" and though a sensible person would only laugh at them, the poor children are affected by them. I think, as far as my experience has reached, I am surprised at the small number of those I have known to turn out badly. I know a great number of boys and girls married, that are very respectable, and getting on respectably in the world.

You are aware that the average number of the annual admissions is about 500?—Yes.

And that prior to the adoption of the existing regulations, there were about 2,000?—Yes; and upwards.

We should be very glad of the expression of your opinion of what becomes of the remaining 1,500?—I have been credibly informed, that a great number of children have perished, exposed in the country in various ways—and I believe it.

You

You believe infanticide has been increased?—Yes, I do; and I have heard several say so; the parishes rather suppress the circumstance than send the 5*l.* I do think infanticide has been increased by it.

Examination of
Rev. Henry Murray,
22 Nov. 1824.

From what channel have you heard the information you have alluded to?—From people from the country.

What sort of people?—Very respectable people; some of them have told me of children found dead, but there has been no talk of it.

Is the new regulation a subject of complaint amongst the parochial clergy and resident gentry?—I did not hear of it. I believe most firmly that it has been the occasion of the loss of infant life; and I was told some few months ago, that at Ardraccan, in the county of Meath, there had been found near the bishop's demesne, four or five children exposed and perished. The general impression on my mind is, that infanticide has been increased by it, but it has not made the same noise, and the reason is, because the parishioners, having an interest in not paying the 5*l.*, do not say any thing about it.

Under the old system, who defrayed the expense of sending up the child?—The parish; I believe in some cases the father sent it up.

What do you conceive was the average expense of sending a child 100 miles to Dublin?—I imagine a guinea; if they got a guinea it was a great deal.

Do you know in what manner the old women, who are usually employed as the carriers of these children, support them on the road?—The surgeon took very great pains about that. He would in many cases not certify for any woman, except one who gave suck. He would not give a certificate that he had received the child in proper health, unless it was sent by a woman who did give suck.

[The witness was directed to furnish a copy of all regulations tending to secure the proper care of the children while on the journey; the form of the certificate from the clergyman in the country, and the form of the certificate from the surgeon at the hospital].

Appendix, No. 10.

Examination of John Creighton, Esquire; Monday 22d Nov. 1824.

DO you hold the situations of physician and surgeon to the Foundling Hospital?—I do.

How long have you held them?—Twenty-seven years, last July.

Were you appointed upon the dismissal of Dr. Harvey?—Yes, Dr. Harvey and Mr. Woodroffe.

Examination of
John Creighton, Esq.
22 Nov. 1824.

Was he the apothecary?—No, he was the surgeon.

Do you practice publicly; have you general practice?—I have the honour of holding the situation of president of the Royal College of Surgeons at this moment.

In what way are you remunerated for your attendance at the Foundling Hospital?—At first, my salary was only 100*l.* a year. I must tell you my appointment was unknown to me entirely; it was from the circumstance of my being known to several of the governors with Lord Oriel; they had me appointed to it. My salary is greater now; and the first meeting of Parliament afterwards I had the honour of receiving the thanks of the Committee of the House of Commons for the exertions I had made, and they then enlarged my salary to 200*l.* a year. I had very good apartments assigned me for my family; but it was necessary to take them from me, and appropriate them to the house, and they allowed me 40*l.* in lieu of it; so that my salary is 240*l.* a year.

In what year was the addition made?—I think in 1798; since that I have never received any thing in addition.

Is your attendance constant and regular?—Every day, except in case of sickness or absence from town, and that by leave of the governors, which very seldom occurs.

In case of absence, do you provide a person to attend for you?—My son, who has been fifteen years practising with me, undertakes the business, as well as one or two experienced surgeons of Dublin, who have the kindness to attend for me.

If any person in the house be taken ill suddenly, are you sent for?—Yes, and I go immediately.

Is there an apothecary resident in the house?—Yes.

Is he a person capable of taking care of the children in cases of sickness?—He merely acts as apothecary, and does not presume to take any thing upon himself where there is an opportunity of getting assistance immediately, when so required; but he is a very attentive man, and constantly in his situation.

What are the rules according to which infants are now admitted into the hospital?—Previous to the last three or four years, the house was open for the indiscriminate admission of infants from all parts of the kingdom, and indeed even from other countries there have been instances—from the city of Dublin at large they were admitted without any inquiry whatever.

From what countries could they come?—We cannot exactly form a judgment of it, but there have been instances of children being sent over from England and Wales.

In what way were those facts ascertained?—By inquiry at the time from carriers and from letters, and a variety of circumstances of that kind; but as far as it came to my knowledge, there were very few that occurred.

At what time did the indiscriminate admission of all the infants that were brought to the hospital cease?—I think three years ago; my books will tell it; I forget exactly.

Examination of
John Creighton, Esq.
22 Nov. 1824.

Have the goodness to describe the mode in which they were admitted when the admission was indiscriminate; did it take place at all hours?—They knocked at the door—the porter's lodge at the entrance; he received the child without any questions being asked; they were brought up immediately to the foundling department, and washed and dressed and cleaned, and left in that situation till I saw them the next day uncovered, to decide upon their state of health.

Describe the present practice?—At present the house is closed for either four, or five, or six months, according to circumstances, in a year; the 20th of this month it was closed until the 20th of May against the indiscriminate admission of infants from the country; but the children of the city of Dublin are allowed admission on paying 5*l.*, it being certified positively that such are deserted children; in the same way, in the summer time, they are admitted from the country; but there must be the signatures of the minister of the parish and churchwardens, certifying that they are deserted children, and that they have made every inquiry to ascertain their parents, but without effect.

Is that a certificate delivered as to all the children?—Yes, as to all of them.

And that during the whole year?—Yes, we could not receive them else, even although the brought the 5*l.*: and again, if a child appears to be a short time above a year old, we have no right to take it in; such child is kept for me till I have seen it, and decided upon its age, of which, from my experience, it is supposed I can judge pretty well.

Do we understand you to say, that the hospital is closed for several months against general admission, but is always open for the admission of children from the city?—Yes, if 5*l.* is brought, and a proper certificate; but in case I should discover that the clergyman was in error, I should have the right of rejecting them.

Has that regulation been made with a view to get rid of the inconvenience of carriage in the cold months?—Yes, principally.

Is there any other reason?—Yes; they conceived that the hospital being open to the indiscriminate admission of children, was an encouragement to vice. It was principally as to the carriage, and the sufferings that the children might undergo, during a journey of 100 miles, in the arms of an inhuman creature.

Have any facts come to the knowledge of the governors which have led them to the opinion that this institution leads to the encouragement of vice?—It is only conjecture; I do not know any proofs of it that I can bring to my recollection; it is a conjecture, and a very natural one.

During the six months that the hospital is open for children from the country, as well as Dublin, does the larger proportion come from the country or Dublin?—From the country I think; but our books will state that.

Does the number of admissions diminish very considerably during the six months it is closed from the country?—Very much.

Does that have any tendency to produce an increase of infants, apparently born in Dublin, but which may have been brought in from the country?—We cannot ascertain that with certainty: it might be the case that the carrier employed to bring the child to town might drop it in the streets; then it becomes the child of the city.

If a child was deserted by its parents, and found in a state of absolute destitution, by whom could the 5*l.* be provided?—By the parish in which it is found; immediate application is made to the churchwardens or clergyman of the parish.

Is there any power in the law existing in Ireland, that enables the churchwardens to indemnify themselves, by raising that sum upon the property of the parish?—I believe it is included in the Foundling Hospital Acts.

Down to the year 1821, what might be the average number of admissions, reckoning from the date of your first connection with the hospital?—From 1,800 to 2,000; but there was one year in which, in consequence of altering the time of payment, it ran to 2,550; but then that took in an extra half-year, in order to change the time of payment from July to January.

Are there any means by which an opinion could be formed as to the mode in which the children were disposed of, which, but for the regulation which took place in 1821, would, in the ordinary course of the business of the hospital, have been admitted into it?—I apprehend not.

What has been the average of the admissions since the alteration of the rule?—Something about from four to five hundred.

Do you apprehend that any increase has taken place in the number of children that have perished?—I have made every inquiry myself from friends in the country and in town, and I have not heard that infanticide has been at all greater than it was before the house closed. I have known repeatedly, when the gate was open to the indiscriminate admission of children, we have had instances of several thrown into the canal, and found dead in the entries. I cannot say that those things have occurred in a greater degree since the house was closed; it may have been so; it was a subject of curiosity to me to know it. It was the constant practice, before the hospital was shut, for unprincipled men to debauch poor innocent creatures, and send them out of the way for a short time, until they were brought to bed, and then send the infants up to Dublin.

Are the infants that are admitted into the hospital usually brought there in their very earliest days of existence, or do they go nearly to the limit of a year old?—That depends upon the time the child has been found; for instance, if a child was found in February or March, or any time after the house is closed, the parish in general sends that child to nurse till the house opens;—if they are within the time, we get them then in a better state of health.

Have

Examination of
John Creighton, Esq.
22 Nov. 1824.

Have you reason to think that the practice you describe is frequently resorted to, namely, keeping the child in the country till the hospital opens?—We frequently get an account of it; the carriers tell us how long the child has been kept at nurse.

Describe the regulations for the transport of children from country places to Dublin?—As I mentioned, there is a carrier employed by the parish, who brings the child to town, with the usual certificate, signed by the clergyman and churchwardens, setting forth, that they have carefully inquired respecting the birth and parentage of the child, and that they could not discover either parent; that the child was deserted, and found in such a place; and so on. It is generally a woman who is employed; we do not countenance any male person bringing a child to the house; we throw difficulties often in the way of their carriage by men; it is an unnatural way; we could not expect the same care to be taken, and therefore a female is constantly employed. The child always receives, or ought to receive, from the parish a proper degree of clothing; sometimes it is neglected, and they come up to me filthy and naked, with scarcely any clothing at all on them. I give a return to the country of all the children that come to the house, and are examined by me, according to the appearance of those children, and their carriage. There is a return paper sent by post, signed by me, setting forth the state of the child's health, and how it has been treated, whether with respect to its clothing, or otherwise.

Does that regulate the rate of payment to the person bringing the child?—Yes, we suppose so; we cannot regulate that.

Do you know the rates of payment for sending a child 100 miles, for instance?—No; it is according to the bargain they make.

Is that deducted out of the 5*l.*?—No; we have nothing to do with that; that must come to the hospital.

Does it frequently happen that the children are injured upon their journey?—Not now; they formerly used to come in a very wretched state. If the child is in a weakly state, it is an act of cruelty for the parish to send it.

What length of time would they be in transporting a child from Cork to Dublin?—Eight or nine days; but we get very few children from that place; they have an institution there.

Do you know in what mode they are supported during the journey?—No, I do not.

Are they brought by women who suckle them?—No; they are never brought upon the breast, unless in very few instances, where the carriers happened to have suck.

Are they generally old persons who bring them?—Yes; generally an old woman.

Is the proportion of mortality greater in the hospital among those brought from the country than among those from Dublin?—No; I cannot say it is.

Are they subject to such injuries in the carriage as to produce external marks upon the body?—Not marks.

Are the children admitted from Dublin of a much earlier age than from the country?—Yes; generally almost immediately after birth.

In your opinion is it the new regulation of closing the hospital during a certain period, or the necessary condition of sending 5*l.* with them, that has had a tendency to reduce the amount of admissions?—I should suppose the 5*l.*

What proportion of infants have died in the last two years, in the first year after their admission?—I cannot immediately answer that, if I had my books here I could tell, but I can come prepared to answer it another time.

What disorder is the most prevalent and fatal among the children?—Affections of the bowels.

In looking back to the returns about thirty years ago, it appears that a very large number of children were stated to die of venereal complaints. Does it appear that a large proportion of the children admitted into the hospital are affected with that disorder?—A year before my appointment, nine out of ten were put down as venereal, and you will see from the tables the progress of it the whole time.

In what state is it now?—There is scarcely ever a venereal child admitted, may be not above three or four these two years.

How do you account for that apparent difference?—The cases were not venereal at that time. The gentlemen who were my predecessors did not take any pains in examining the children, they never saw them at all, they left them to the head nurse to decide upon the children as she thought proper, and then to relieve herself from the unpleasantness of having the care of those children, there was a building at the other side of the house called the infirmary, or dying ward, and every child that came in with a scalded bottom (for want of care in the carriage they came up scalded and filthy), as soon as she saw them in that kind of way, she said, "that child is venereal, send it off to the dying ward." The day I was appointed Lady Carhampton and Mrs. Balfour and Lady Altamont brought me through the house, and when they brought me into this dying ward there were thirteen children lying in cradles. I looked about to see where the nurse tender slept; there was no nurse tender slept in it—it was under the care of an old woman of eighty—"Where does she sleep?"—"She sleeps over there," in another building, and they were left there all night, and the place swarming with rats, and every thing that was abominable.

Are you aware that of 5,216 children sent into that hospital immediately previous to your appointment, it appears, by a resolution of a Committee of the Irish House of Commons, that only three came out alive?—Yes, I am.

What was the medical treatment of the children prior to your appointment?—There was no medical treatment I could perceive; those gentlemen did not attend, the apothecary was resident in the house, and according to his own report, he visited merely once in three weeks or a month. When I was first appointed, I was shown what was called "composing bottle," simple water with tincture of opium, at the mercy of the head nurse tender herself to pour in what she pleased.

Examination of
John Creighton, Esq.
22 Nov. 1824.

What was the consequence of that?—The child was thrown into a state of stupor, or into convulsions.

This composing draught was in fact a killing draught?—It could not be called any thing else.

In what way were those children disposed of after their death?—There is a burying-ground at the back of the Foundling Hospital, and the day I was appointed it was just like a fallow field, all turned up—the burials were so rapid that there was not a blade of grass allowed to grow upon it, and in the course of a couple of years it was covered with nettles nearly six feet high.

In what way are the infant children disposed of after death now?—They are sewed up in flannel, and well washed and cleaned, and every kind of care and respect used; they are brought down to the burying-ground, which is consecrated ground, and the clergyman attends and reads a form of prayer, not to the extent of the prayers over a grown person, but a short form that is in use in the hospital; he inters every child regularly, and reads part of the funeral service.

Is there ever more than one interment at a time?—Yes, if there happens to be more than one die in a day, he buries the two together.

Are there any particular burying days?—No such thing; it is any day, according as the circumstances may occur.

What was the practice as to the burying days, and the mode of interment of the children before your appointment?—It is only from hearsay I can speak to that—ten or twelve of those infants would be taken and rolled up in flannel perhaps, and Mr. Crofton used to attend and read the service I believe.

He was the chaplain?—Yes.

In what way are the children buried who are more advanced in years?—They are buried in coffins; they are brought to the house called the dead house or dissecting room, which was built for my own purpose, and they are left there for my inspection; we only examine the parts we conceive to be diseased, and then they are taken with every kind of care and placed in the coffin, with the same humanity that would occur in a private family.

Has the ophthalmia prevailed of late years to any considerable extent in the Foundling Hospital?—It has this year, and once in two or three years it will visit us as a kind of epidemic complaint; it was supposed to be contagious, but I am much inclined to think it is not, that it is owing to the particular state of the atmosphere that produces it, or it could not occur so often as it does.

What proportion of children in the hospital have been afflicted with the ophthalmia lately?—I dare say three-fourths.

Does it affect the older ones more than the younger ones?—Yes, the grown children entirely; I have not had an infant affected with it; it is a particular kind of ophthalmia, it is not of that dangerous kind; it is confined to the tunica conjunctiva of the eye, and by washing the eye with a little cold water, and ventilating the rooms in which they sleep, it will go away in the course of two or three days; and such has been our success, that I do not know of a single instance in twenty-seven years of a child having lost its sight by inflammation.

Do the children bring it with them from the country?—I do not know that that is the case altogether; after they have been a fortnight in the house, it will attack them sometimes, and in fact, all the disorders they have not been subject to before will attack them as epidemic diseases, measles, hooping-cough, and also the small-pox, before inoculation was introduced.

Have you ever known the Foundling Hospital entirely free from this disease of the eye?—Yes, entirely; we are almost free now in a great measure.

Are you aware that the foundlings that have been removed to the different charter schools in the country have infected the children in those schools with ophthalmia?—I do not think it is possible, and I will state a reason for it. The governors were so kind, about six weeks or two months ago, as to allow me to take a little excursion for a month; I was not away three weeks; I went to London and Windsor, Oxford, Bath and Cheltenham, and the intermediate towns; my object was to look at every thing in the way of my profession, and I found, that in general at that very time there raged in the hospitals, particularly for children, the ophthalmia, in the same way that it did here with us.

What makes you think it is impossible for the children that were sent to the charter schools to communicate it?—Because they had no disorder when I sent them away; they were all examined by me, and you will see my initials to the name of every one of them; you will see there was not one of them that had inflammation in their eyes, when they went to those places.

The statement that was made to us at the house at Charlemont-street, into which the children were drafted from the Foundling Hospital, was, that they almost, without exception, laboured under disease of the eyes when they were received there?—It could not be; you will find from the examination of Mr. Murray he had also, as well as the superintendent and mistress of the house, to inspect them, to see whether they had inflammation of the eyes, before they would suffer them to go; they were first examined by me, and afterwards by them, and if they had any inflammation they were not allowed to go.

Do you apply your observations to the children lately sent out?—Yes; every child was examined examined by me, and I can assure you, on the oath I have taken, that none of them had it at that period.

Would it shake your belief, if it were ascertained to your satisfaction, that in every charter school where those children were drafted, the ophthalmia broke out after their arrival?—No; because it might have occurred if they had not been there.

What would you say, if all your children were infected, and others were not, until affected by them?—There is another point I will suppose. I conceive that this ophthalmia is a unique disease, and only attacks them once in life. There was no child to my knowledge sent from the Foundling Hospital labouring under ophthalmia.

If then this ophthalmia be a unique disease, and if the fact should be ascertained to your satisfaction, that the children, who have been lately sent from the Foundling Hospital to the charter schools have laboured under that disease, and that for a considerable time, does not it follow, that they were labouring under that disease at the time they were sent from the hospital?—I cannot say that; none of them had the disease when they left the hospital, and many of them never had it at all.

There were sixteen boys in the school at Killoteran, who had been received from the Foundling Hospital, who sat in a corner of the school, apart, not attending to their writing and reading, labouring under ophthalmia to such a degree that they could not employ themselves; and they were stated by the master to have laboured under that disease when they came into the school from Dublin—how does this agree with your opinion?—I can only speak from my own examination of them. I visited the Marine School, at the time the ophthalmia raged with us;—we had no communication with that institution, and yet all the children there had inflammation of the eyes.

Do you know whether there has been any communication from the Incorporated Society to the directing board of the Foundling Hospital with respect to the ophthalmia prevailing among the children sent from the Foundling Hospital to the charter schools?—I did not hear any thing of the kind—there might have been.

At the time when the ophthalmia prevailed in the Foundling Hospital, so far as your professional experience goes, do you know whether it prevailed in other schools in Dublin?—I have mentioned the Marine School.

Do you know of any other?—No; but I can inquire.

You have stated that you thought it was not communicated in the way of infection?—I believe it is not; that it is something in the air, in the same way as the Egyptian ophthalmia.

Do you mean the air of the hospital, or the general air of the country?—The general atmospheric air.

If it were produced by the general state of the atmosphere in the country, it would not affect the children merely in the hospital; have you, at times when you found it prevailed in the Foundling Hospital, found it prevalent through society?—Not generally; but I found more of it than I ever found before.

Have you found the disorder prevailing to as great a degree in society in general as in the Foundling Hospital?—I cannot take upon me to say that; but from my own experience (the poor coming frequently to me with their children), I have seen more of it this season than for a length of time before.

Have you found it prevail among the children of persons in the higher ranks?—I cannot say that I have, more than what I have been generally accustomed to meet with in cases of this kind among the better orders.

If it were produced by the general state of the atmosphere, rather than by the particular situation in which particular children may be placed, can you account for its prevalence among the children of the lower orders, and not amongst the children of the higher orders?—I think it is a question too extensive to give a decided opinion upon.

If you found it prevail among the children of the lower orders, and in the hospital, does not that afford an inference, that it prevailed through the want of proper attention and cleanliness?—No, I cannot say that, because the same attention has been paid in the Foundling Hospital as usual. As to the other hospitals, I cannot answer; there may be some exciting causes among the lower orders that the better orders are free from.

What would you conceive to be the exciting causes?—With respect to the atmosphere being itself an exciting cause, where there are a number of children confined in the same ward, the atmosphere of that particular ward must be rendered less salubrious than where children are among the better orders, where they have every attention and care taken of them. I should not be at all surprised if the volatile alkali, arising from the perspiration and breathing of the children, would be an exciting cause to produce this effect more than in any other case. I should suppose again, that the general atmosphere must have some effect; otherwise, why should it occur at this hospital, and at another distant from it.

What is the correct medical description of the present ophthalmia?—Simple ophthalmia it is called; it affects merely the vessels of the conjunctiva, the membrane which unites the lids, and passes over the anterior globe of the eye.

Will you exert your recollection, and specify the periods at which the same disorder has prevailed of late years in the hospital?—Very much about the same, a month or so after the period of drafting.

Every year?—Not every year; there have been years in which we have escaped in a great degree.

Did it make its appearance last year?—There were some affected with it last year.

The year preceding that?—My books will tell that.

Examination of
John Creighton, Esq.
22 Nov. 1824.

[The witness was directed to ascertain the several periods at which this peculiar disorder had prevailed in the hospital since his appointment.]

Do you consider this peculiar ophthalmia as identical with that which our troops were understood to have brought from Egypt, or in any manner derived from it or connected with it?—No, as far as I have read; for I have never had an opportunity of seeing the disease itself. I think the Egyptian ophthalmia was deeper seated than ours; ours is superficial.

You do not think this is derived from that?—No.

Could you ascertain whether this peculiar ophthalmia existed in the hospital at any period of time antecedent to the return of our troops from Egypt?—Certainly.

Is there any species of ophthalmia known by the name of the purulent ophthalmia?—Yes; it is the aggravated form of the disease.

Is this, or not, the purulent ophthalmia?—It did not go to that extent, except in some few cases.

There have been instances of it?—Yes, there have.

The simple ophthalmia may pass into the purulent?—Yes; they differ only in degree.

Are adults liable to be affected with the disorder?—Yes, and several of them are affected; even the matron of the infirmary has had it.

Has she had it in successive years, or only once?—Only this year.

Did you ever know an adult connected with the hospital to have the ophthalmia more than once?—No, I do not know that I have, unless proceeding from accident.

What is the general treatment you prescribe?—That depends upon the state of the inflammation: if it is great, we have recourse to local and general blood-letting; afterwards we apply blisters to withdraw as much inflammation as we can, at the same time making use of cold and sedative applications to the eyes.

About how many children are affected with ophthalmia in the hospital now?—None; there are very few in comparison to what there were; what remains is merely the sequel of the disorder.

How long do you generally conceive a child, not in the worst state, may take in being cured?—Sometimes they get well in two or three days; at other times, about five or six weeks; we have nearly got rid of it now.

What number are now ill of it in the infirmary?—Not more than six or eight labouring under active inflammation.

What is the number labouring under any complaint of the eyes?—There are no other disorders of the eyes at present.

Are there not more than eight in the infirmary labouring under disorders of the eyes?—Yes, they are labouring under the sequel of it, weakness of the eyes; but I do not wish to send them home, as a prejudice has prevailed in the house, that it is infectious; and on that account, they are cautious of having them returned from the infirmary; if it were not for that prejudice, three-fourths of them might have been returned into the school.

The mode of cure, and the time necessary for performing it, being so short as you have stated, how can you account for the disorder remaining so long in the hospital?—There are some constitutions that the disease will dwell upon longer than others, contrary to every thing that can be done to relieve them.

Does it frequently happen in the hospital that you cannot cure it in three or four days?—Yes, certainly; it frequently happens that we cannot cure it in that time.

Speaking generally, what is the length of time it takes?—In general, I should think, from eight to twelve days.

What is the longest time you have ever known any child labouring under it?—There are some children with scrofulous constitutions it has dwelt upon three months; but I cannot conceive that to be the same species of disease, it is a combined disease, the immediate disease connected with a constitutional one.

State the longest period you have known it to continue, where it has not combined itself with any other disease the constitution laboured under?—As far as I can judge, I do not think any child has been labouring under it more than five or six weeks at the very utmost, and of those very few indeed.

Are the children liable frequently to relapse?—I think very seldom.

It being an undoubted fact, which the Commissioners themselves can all bear testimony to, that the children sent from the Foundling Hospital to the charter schools have laboured ever since they were so sent, and are now labouring, under ophthalmia, how can you account for those children having the disorder if they are not liable to relapse?—I will not take upon me to give an opinion respecting the practice of any other person; I speak of my own practice, and what I see myself.

Have you any doubt that those children had the ophthalmia before they left?—I dare say some of them might, but they were perfectly free when I examined them.

Do you think it advisable to keep those children separate from the others?—No, we never did; and that leads me to a circumstance relating to my former practice: these children are brought to me every day when I come; a bell rings for every child, sick, or labouring under any disease, to be brought to me directly for examination at the infirmary. In the former year it was the case, that in the same way children were brought to me labouring under trifling ophthalmia, I thought it ridiculous to take them into the infirmary, and I thought it worse to crowd the infirmary and augment the disease; I gave those children medicine to free their bowels, when they were brought to me each day, and advised cold applications to be made use of—that they undertook themselves under the charge of the master master or mistress; there were tubs of cold water kept in the centre of the school, and with cloths they went and washed their eyes and kept them constantly cold in that way, and I never heard any thing more about them, they all got well directly; but as it was, this last time, the infirmary got crowded, they were lying three in a bed; and the air of the hospital must be rendered more impure in consequence of the crowded state of it.

Examination of
John Creighton, Esq.
22 Nov. 1824.

Was any reference made to you as to the selection of the children sent to the charter schools?—They were all selected, first by Mr. Murray, the superintendent of the house, as being proper children to be sent to the schools, then they were sent to me for medical examination, and if I found a child labouring under scrofula, or this complaint or any other, I immediately withdrew it, to prevent it going further. None but healthy children can go to those institutions.

Did you know a case of one of the children falling ill of the measles almost immediately after it left the hospital, and being returned again?—I think I have some indistinct recollection of it.

Can you recollect what was the age of the children sent to the charter schools?—From twelve to thirteen; I cannot tell exactly; that is not in my province.

Were you a party in the selection?—Yes, just as to their health; but as to their education, I had nothing to do with that.

How long they had been from their country nurses you could not tell?—No; I had only to give my opinion as to the state of their health.

Appendix, No. 11.

Further Examination of John Creighton, Esq.; Wednesday, 24th November 1824.

24 Nov. 1824.

IN what way are you able to prevent impositions on the part of the nurses, if they are disposed to substitute a child of their own in the place of any child sent from the Foundling Hospital that may die?—By the assistance of a book.

Have the goodness to state the nature of that book?—It is a book in which we enter an account of the nurses, and the number of the children of their own families.

Do you put any mark upon the foundling?—Yes, they are always marked upon the right arm with the letter of the year, and the number of the child.

With what instrument is it made?—With a spring instrument, something like to such as you use in cupping and scarifying; it strikes in suddenly.

Is it easy to imitate the mark?—Not possible hardly, because the letters are of a particular size, and done so minutely, it would not be possible to imitate it; we have a set of figures, and they must know both the letters and figures to be able to understand it; the letter is for the particular year, and the figure for the number of the child; it is struck in, and rubbed in with a little gunpowder, &c. &c.

Have you known many attempts to impose upon the governors of the hospital?—A great number.

How have they been detected?—By examination; perhaps doubting the persons themselves, I have required some neighbour to come forward, and by examining that neighbour, I have found out the trick of the other.

In those cases had they imitated the mark upon the child's arm?—I do not think they had ever attempted it.

Would it in those cases be possible to impose upon you?—I do not think they could.

Is the mark ever obliterated by time?—Yes, frequently, and then we are obliged to do it over again; the mark is not a perfect security by any means.

Does it always wear out in time?—No, I have known it continue to a late period of life; to fifty or upwards.

Would it not be possible to make a mark that would in the same way frequently be seen, as on the arms of sailors, that could never be obliterated?—It is pretty much in the same way; just as you would cut upon the bark of a tree, the incision will expand, and in growing, one part will become farther removed from the other; the indentation of the points with which the arm is marked will appear farther distant, so that it will be more difficult to distinguish it.

Could you know from the arms of the child after some period, how long it was since it had been marked?—No, it is not possible.

Are not names always given in with the children when they are first brought into the hospital?—Not always—sometimes, and sometimes not.

When names are given in with the children, are they always recorded?—They are; we have a particular way in our books; we always give them a different name, but the old name is still preserved.

Why is it an object with the governors to give a different name to a child to that which is given in with it?—To prevent the parent having an opportunity of discovering it.

Why is it wished to prevent that?—Because it would be an inducement to people to send in children to be nursed for them, as they could at any time lay hold of them, and there have been instances of children who have been in the Foundling, who have become entitled to property; the circumstances have been brought forward, and so satisfactorily, as they appeared from our books, that they have had it restored to them, and some of them are possessing very good property at present.

Do the nurses show the children, during the time that they are at nurse, or do the children remain without being personally inspected from the time of their being sent out

Examination of
John Creighton, Esq.
24 Nov. 1824.

till the time of their being ultimately brought to the hospital?—We have only an opportunity of seeing them once a year, when they are brought up for pay, then every child must be brought up, because we pay none except the child is brought, unless in cases where they are put out when sickly, or poor idiots, that it would be improper to bring through the country; then we take it upon the certificate of the clergyman, that the child or aged poor person is alive.

To what age are the girls continued in the hospital?—They are now sent out at an earlier age than formerly; formerly they were kept, in some instances, till seventeen years of age, but there has been so great a demand for them, and the governors have been so desirous to keep the hospital clear, that they have apprenticed them out earlier than they otherwise would.

Have you any means of tracing the proportion of the children that survive the age of nurture, that become idiots?—I have a book in which all that is put into; I can tell you every idiot and every person in the house, or upon the establishment in the country, that is incapable of earning their bread.

Could you also show the number of children that became deformed either from a defect in nursing or from constitutional defects?—Yes, I have them all marked in this book.

Have you had many insane children?—Not any; we have had some afflicted with epilepsy; this excited my attention very much to see what we could do for them, and some of them I took into the house on the last pay, and we have succeeded in restoring them to health, and some of them are now apprenticed.

Since the house was shut for the winter, can you say whether the number of foundlings received from the country, during the whole year, is diminished or otherwise?—The house is shut for six months, and we do not receive any during that time.

Has that regulation reduced the number admitted during the whole year?—Yes, certainly, to the amount of one-half; generally before the notice is given, there is a great rush; every parish that can send a child up does so, and immediately upon the opening of the house they have a vast number prepared for that particular time; the books will show what a rush there is.

Is it your opinion that the number is equal upon the whole?—No, because the Act of Parliament says, we are not to take a child that is a day above twelve months old. Now, if the parish get a child nine months old and keep it six months, it would be ridiculous to send it, because they could not get it in.

Appendix, No. 12.

Examination of Mrs. Winifred Innes; Friday, 10th December 1824.

Examination of Mrs.
Winifred Innes,
10 Dec. 1824.

WHAT situation do you hold in the Foundling Hospital?—The head mistress.

How long have you held that office?—Nine years, the beginning of last September.

Have you any superintendence of the preparatory school?—Not any.

Do you recollect what number of girls were in the Foundling Hospital when you were first appointed to it?—I believe 700 girls.

Have you as many now?—No, not at present.

What was the largest number you ever had?—We have had upwards of 700.

What salary have you?—The fixed salary is 30*l.*, and 20*l.* gratuity

Have you lodgings?—Yes.

Coals and candles, and food?—Yes; the same food as the servants of the house.

Did you ever superintend a school before you went there?—Never.

What assistance have you in instructing the children?—At present five mistresses.

Is the improved system of education introduced?—Yes, Bell's system.

Do the girls instruct each other?—Yes.

Have you monitresses in each?—Yes, five classes, and the classes divided into small divisions.

Are the children long enough under your care to enable you to give them sufficient instruction?—Yes, when they remain the full time, they are.

What do you call the full time?—Four years.

How far advanced are they if they remain the whole four years in the hospital?—Generally to understand the Bible; that is the highest book they read in.

How far in arithmetic?—At present it is not taught at all in the female school.

Do you not teach them the multiplication table?—No, not at present.

Do the girls all learn to write?—Not now, except on slates; they used all to write on paper, now it is confined to slate-writing.

What has been the reason for the change?—The governesses found they held communication with their nurses.

Is it found indispensably necessary to prevent all communication between the nurses and the children?—It is very desirable to do so as much as possible.

Is it on any other account than the liability it would produce of their relapsing to the Roman-catholic religion?—I believe none other; the children all wrote for several years, till the ladies about May last put a stop to the writing.

If a girl wanted to write to a nurse who was a Protestant, would it be prevented?—Not if she had the permission of the governesses.

Have you ever known permission asked?—I do not recollect.

Are such communications frequent?—They were frequent; I detected many letters with them, both of their own to the nurses, and from the nurses to them.

Is

Is it punishable as an offence?—No.

Do the nurses often prevail upon the girls to elope?—They would if they could; that is the reason the letters are prohibited; the object has generally been to persuade them to elope.

Who paid the postage of those letters?—They get them conveyed by persons coming to town, and they are left at the gate.

Do you think many of the girls would elope if they could?—Not as much now as formerly.

To what is that owing?—To our receiving them younger from the country.

Does the wish to elope diminish?—It has very much diminished this last two years.

Do you think a girl feels less disposed to elope after she has been in the hospital two years, than one who has been there only one year?—Yes; it is generally the drafts.

Do the children often go beyond the walls of the hospital?—No, except to the association in Mary's church.

Do they ever take a walk out of the walls?—No, never; they have a very large field to play in.

Is that field surrounded with walls?—No.

At what hour in the day do they play in that field?—The girls from ten to eleven, and the boys from one to two.

Under what superintendence are they permitted to play?—The class mistresses.

Do they ever make attempts to escape from the play-ground?—It is from there they generally escape.

How large is the field?—I believe two acres; I am not certain as to the extent.

Does the play-ground belong to the institution, or is it rented?—It is rented.

How many hours in the day are the children at school?—We commence at half-past eight in the morning, and remain in school till ten; from ten to eleven they play; from eleven to two, and from half-past two to four, and from five to seven, the children exercise in the schoolroom or court, and then they go to supper; and then, under the superintendence of the orderly mistresses, to bed at half-past eight.

Are they instructed in needle-work?—They are.

Are they instructed in any other branches of industry?—Yes; they can make and mend their own clothes.

Are they instructed in spinning?—Yes, flax and wool.

Are they employed in all the work of the house as servants?—Yes; every department, under the superintendence of one person in each department.

What books are used in the school?—At present, the Testament is the highest book they use.

Do they use any other book but the Testament?—Yes; a small tract, the history of the creation, and our Saviour's parables and sermons on the mount, a small national school-book, N° 2. and N° 1. spelling-book, and Carpenter's spelling-book.

Is the school well supplied with books?—Yes, very well; they always get them when they require them.

Have the children access to books when not in the school, that they can read for their amusement?—No, their time is fully occupied when not in the school.

What time do they go to bed?—They go to their dormitories at half-past eight; then they say prayers, and they are generally in bed by nine.

At what time do they rise?—At present at seven, and in the summer at six.

Is there work taken in for the children?—No, the institution keeps them fully employed.

Is there any allowance made to the children for the work done, or to any body?—No, not to any body.

Have you known many girls leave the hospital without being able to read?—Not many, there have been some.

Have you known many leave it without being able to write?—Not very many, it is very lately they have left off writing, only since May last.

How long a time does it take to teach a girl of ordinary powers of understanding to read?—Although they are four years in the house, they are only two in the school, one half their time they are from the school; if a child resides four years in the hospital she only receives two years in the school, and from that is to be subtracted the time she may be in the infirmary; but we have had them able to read any book that may be put into their hands in that time.

Does not it often happen that a girl only stays in the hospital a year, or a year and a half?—Yes, that depends upon her being applied for by any particular person.

If a girl is brought in at fourteen years of age, is she not disposed of before she has been two years in the hospital?—No, not on account of her age.

Do you not wish to get rid of a girl ten years old?—Yes, the governesses have allowed them this last eight or nine months to be put on the list, in order to reduce the age of the children in the institution.

Does the degree to which illness prevails among the girls in the hospital vary much from time to time?—It varies, but the most sickly time is immediately after the drafting.

How do you account for that?—The travelling I think, and the drafting being from their nurses, and being exposed to the night air, as some of them must be, from the long journey, they catch cold.

Are they subject to any diseases but colds upon their admission into the hospital?—Colds produce other disorders.

Examination of Mrs.
Winifred Innes,
10 Dec. 1824.

Do colds produce measles?—Measles is generally one that follows the drafting, measles and sore eyes are the two general complaints, and then the hooping cough.

How long have you known sore eyes to prevail in the hospital?—Ever since I have been there—every drafting.

And always to a similar extent?—Always.

Have you never known it prevail in some years more than in others?—Not unless the drafting has been heavier than others; some years we have drafted in between 300 and 400 girls, and other years not more than 200.

Did diseases in the eyes prevail in the school during the first year you came there?—Yes, and it has come almost immediately after the drafting, and there was scarcely a child throughout the school whose eyes were not sore, both the house girls and the drafts.

Did you ever hear the word ophthalmia used to describe that disorder till this year?—I have heard the word certainly.

Did it appear to yourself to be exactly the same disorder nine years ago, that it does at present?—It certainly did appear the same, I did not observe any difference in the symptoms.

Did the children appear to be so much distressed with sore eyes nine years ago as at present?—Yes.

The same appearances of inflammation and pain?—Yes, exactly so.

Did it appear to be equally infectious at the same time?—Yes, the children were always infected in the same way.

With respect to this year and the last, do you think you have more this year affected with sore eyes?—Yes, we have had a greater number brought into the institution this year.

Has it been more severe in its form this year than the last?—I do not recollect that it has been more severe this year than usual.

Do you consider that a child drafted from the country is almost sure to take the ophthalmia?—They are; I have known very few that have escaped it.

To what have you heard it attributed?—We are obliged to cut their hair, from the very dirty state in which we receive them, and the children have to sleep in large dormitories; their cabins are generally very small and warm, and the large dormitories being exposed to the air more than they were in the country, and having their hair cut, is generally the reason to which it is attributed: we are compelled to cut their hair.

Do you not believe that the disease always exists in a greater or less degree in the hospital throughout the year?—No; at this present time we have nearly got rid of it, there are very few affected with it.

When a child has had the disease severely, do not the eyelids remain thickened?—Yes; but many of them have scrofulous eyes, which we never consider infectious, and those are most likely those you observed.

Do you not believe the disease to be catching?—I really think it is.

Is it not within your knowledge that there are a number of children in the infirmary at present who have the disease?—I cannot say the number at present.

Do you not know there are some?—There are some.

Then does not it prevail to some degree in the hospital?—Yes, in the infirmary, but not in the school; several children have been in the infirmary several months.

Do you not think it much more likely that a child would catch it by the common process of contagion, than a child would by having the hair cut and being exposed to the light?—I think it is first produced by cold, but after that it is from infection.

Are the children liable to catch the disease a second time?—Yes.

They have the disease as bad the second time as the first?—Yes; some I can recollect.

Have you ever caught it yourself?—No, never.

Have you ever known it to prevail to any considerable extent in the winter season?—No, I cannot say I have.

Is that because there are no children drafted in, in the winter?—Yes; and they get inured to the house by the winter time.

Has the disease, although cured, a permanent effect upon the eyes—does it leave them permanently weak?—Not permanently, but it will for some weeks leave them weak. Till this year they were never sent from the school, except in very bad cases; but in this year the governors and governesses ordered them immediately to be sent to the infirmary as soon as it was discovered.

Do you think that has prevented its spreading?—Yes, in some degree, but not as much as was expected.

How many girls are there who have not had it at all?—I think 300 have not had it this year.

Out of those 300, how many have had it in former years?—I cannot say that; I believe they seldom escape it on coming in.

Do their eyes remain weak for such a length of time as materially to interfere with their instruction?—Sometimes it does. Some of the children we received in July have remained in the infirmary till this time; I am now getting back some of them, and some of them are still there.

Does the clothing of the children fall at all under your direction?—Yes, it does.

By whom is it provided?—By the governors. It is part of my duty to see that they have their proper complement of clothing.

What is that?—The allowance for each child is four changes of linen, two pair of stockings, a petticoat, and a gown, in a year.

Does

Examination of
Mrs.
Winifred Innes,
10 Dec. 1824.

Does every girl have the quantity that is allowed?—Yes.

Is it found to be sufficient?—Yes.

Do they take their clothes with them when they leave the hospital?—Two changes of linen and a petticoat, a gown, two pair of stockings, two bibs, and a new pair of shoes.

Do they take clothes with them that are not so particular in their appearance as what they wear in the hospital?—They all have clothes when they leave the hospital.

Are they clothed like other servants?—No, they go in the house dress.

Have you any means of knowing how the girls turn out when they leave the hospital?—Sometimes; some turn out exceedingly well, and others different.

Which is the majority?—I think the most part turn out well.

Have you ever known them come back to the hospital to ask relief?—Yes, I have.

Frequently?—Not frequently.

What is done in those cases?—They are provided for till the next apprenticing day.

How are they provided for?—The governors pay for their board and lodging.

How many have you ever known provided for in that way at one time?—Seldom more than one.

Are the girls generally tolerably correct in their conduct during the time they are in the hospital?—I never knew an instance of misconduct in the hospital since I have been there.

Has not some unfortunate occurrence taken place in the hospital in the instance of Ann Straghan?—Yes, there is a report of misconduct; but I think it must have occurred after her leaving the hospital.

Was she dismissed from the hospital?—She was sent on the aged poor list into the country.

Why was she put upon that list?—She was not fit to be apprenticed.

How old was she?—I think about nineteen years.

Was she deformed?—Yes, she was born without fingers; she had a small thumb, which she used as a finger; she could sew and knit, and read and write very well.

Before she left the hospital, was she under instruction like other girls, or employed in any other situation?—She was, during the drafting, employed to take care of the transfer children.

What children are those known by the name of transfer children?—Those that come in to be sent out again to other nurses; transferred from one nurse to others.

Was she capable of that duty?—Yes, she was very healthy.

Was not there another sent out with her?—Yes, Margaret Pitt.

Do you know why she was sent?—It was on account of her having a burnt arm; she was not fit to be apprenticed.

Was she put upon that list?—Yes.

Do you know how the persons are maintained that are upon the list of infirm poor?—The nurses receive the same for them I understand as they do for the children; they come up once a year to receive clothing, and to be paid for them.

Do they get no more than 3 l. a year?—I believe no more.

What is there peculiar in the case of Margaret Slow?—She married, that was the reason she left.

Who was she?—A girl of the house.

Was she a servant?—No, a mistress.

Whom did she marry?—A young man who was master in the male school.

In what way are the masters, or other persons connected with the male school, able to communicate with the female schools, so as to be likely to lead to a marriage?—When they are appointed mistresses, there is no longer any restraint upon their going about the institution; but while monitresses or girls in the school, they are not allowed to pass from one yard to the other.

Do we understand you to say there is no subsequent superintendence that can prevent the monitresses and mistresses from communicating with the persons in the boys school?—The monitresses cannot communicate with them; but formerly, when the monitresses were appointed mistresses, that restraint was taken off.

At what age were they appointed mistresses?—Eighteen, nineteen and twenty.

Are you aware of the preparation that is made for admitting into the Foundling Hospital a certain number of young men who are to be trained as masters in the hospital?—Yes.

Will those young persons and the girls who may be appointed mistresses be at their own discretion as to communication?—There will never be any more appointed as mistresses; that the ladies have decided against.

Was it known to you when Margaret Slow's marriage took place?—No.

To whom was it known?—To some of the mistresses; at that time they were all foundling girls that were mistresses in the school, with the exception of one; one orderly mistress, not a school mistress.

Do you know where the marriage took place?—I do not.

Had the marriage taken place long before you were acquainted with it?—Fifteen months, I understood.

In what way was it discovered?—On her being noticed by Mrs. Magee that she would not be allowed to remain any longer as a mistress, her health was declining, and Mrs. Magee noticed that she wished her to see for some other situation.

Did she then declare she had been married some time?—Yes, she did, and the young man was also on the point of being dismissed, or had been dismissed, I am not certain which.

Examination of Mrs.
Winifred Innes,
10 Dec. 1824.

Had you any reason to suppose it would have been discovered if she had not chosen to avow it?—No, I do not think it would.

According to the present regulations of the hospital, would it be possible for a private marriage to exist between one of the boys and a girl in the hospital without it being known?—No, not from the late change; there is no communication whatever allowed with the female side now.

Have any other precautions been exerted to prevent it?—At present I think it not possible for it to take place; the mistresses had more general liberty formerly than now.

You know the apartments destined for those masters to be trained in the institution?—Yes.

Will not they be in the midst of the females?—It is in the female court.

Do you mean to say there is any sufficient precaution hitherto taken to prevent a considerable degree of communication taking place between those masters and the females?—So far as the windows, there might be communication.

Can any person get in at the windows?—No, they are barred.

In passing and repassing to their apartments, will not they be in communication?—No, their entrance is on the male side entirely.

According to the present arrangement of the building in which the youths are to be admitted as candidate teachers, will it be possible for them to talk with the females who are in the Foundling Hospital school?—I would not say that it was not possible that they might do it.

Did you select the girls that were drafted to the charter schools?—I did, most of them.

According to what rule were they selected?—From the lower classes; to lighten the lower classes before the drafts came in.

Were they principally girls who had been for some time in the hospital?—No, very few; they were principally those who had been in the country for health, and had been returned again; the drafts of 1823 were the principal of them, before the drafting of 1824 commenced.

Were they generally more healthy or less healthy, than those retained in the hospital?—Not on that account; they were generally more backward in their education, and we expected a very heavy draft in this year, and it took place.

Were many of them afflicted with the ophthalmia?—Very few of them; they were all examined by the surgeon, and if any thing appeared the matter with their eyes, he rejected them.

Are you aware that in point of fact, it has been found, that wherever they have gone, whether boys or girls, they have carried the contagion with them and communicated it to other schools?—I have heard of it? I do not know it for certain.

Appendix, No. 13.

Examination of Mrs. Margaret Ross; Friday, 10th December 1824.

Examination of Mrs.
Margaret Ross,
10 Dec. 1824.

WHAT situation do you hold in the Foundling Hospital?—Matron in the infirmary.

How long have you held it?—But one year in the infirmary; but I held the situation of matron in the foundling department before it was moved; an alteration was made in the house, the infants were curtailed as to the numbers coming in.

How long were you matron in the foundling department?—Fifteen years in March next.

During the time you were matron of the foundling, did you observe much difference in the bodily state of the children received from the country and those received from Dublin?—I did.

Were they much injured by the journey?—I always observed the children from the city to be more healthy.

Can you account for that in any way?—Yes; the long carriage from the country and sometimes the neglect of the nurses on the way.

What description of women nurse the children, from the parts of the country where they are sent from, on the journey?—Very poor wretched women; very miserable looking.

Are there proper preparations made for feeding the children on the journey?—I do not know as to that; some get bottles of milk, and some one thing and some another, to support them on the journey.

Are the children from the country generally older than those brought in from Dublin?—I have not observed that; sometimes from the city we get them in not over twenty-four hours after their birth, perhaps three or four days, and so on, and that could not be from the country.

Since the rule of admission has been changed, and the children have been admitted from the country only during part of the year, do you think it has been the practice to send children from the country into Dublin, and to have them transmitted from Dublin into the hospital as if they had been born there?—I have heard that has been the case, but I do not know of it; they have dropped them in halls or places where they could conveniently.

How many days, upon the average, do the infants remain in the Foundling?—That is according to their health; some children may remain perhaps a fortnight, or three or four weeks, according as they are fit to send to the country, some are not; others come in, perhaps to-day and go to-morrow; it is according to circumstances.

Have you nurses always in attendance?—Yes, in general; we are seldom without nurses, offering to take the children—to take them out.

Have

Examination of
Mrs.
Margaret Ross,
10 Dec. 1824.

Have you wet nurses always in the house?—Yes.

How many do you require the use of now?—We have but three wet nurses at present, which will be, I think, sufficient during the time of the house being closed.

How many used you to be forced to have?—Before the nursery was changed to the infirmary, we have had twenty at a time, or twenty-six.

In the house?—Yes, in case of a crowd, or particular time.

Do you remember the greatest number of infants ever brought to you in a week?—I remember at the opening of the house, the first week we used to get them in great numbers; when the house would be open for the country children, before the regulation was altered, I recollect, as it might be from this morning till to-morrow, there would be sixty children to be examined by the doctor, by the time he would come. I recollect that one year.

On what occasion did that happen?—They were kept over in the country, waiting to have the house opened for them again; they then came in in such numbers.

Do you think that the number of children that are sent to the hospital under the present regulation, will be greater than it has been, when the people understand the rule, so as to be able to know how to take advantage of it?—I believe the number this year is increased to what it was last year. I think there were very few over 400, and now we have 495.

Before they altered the regulation, were the greater number of children brought by the parents, or brought by nurses?—From the country they were not carried by the parents, but by carriers.

Is the person who brings the child now always seen and spoken with?—There is nothing said to them but at the gate; whatsoever questions are asked is at the gate, by the porter; there is nothing to do when they come to the Foundling but to take the child; no question is asked; they may be asked, "Is this from the country?" When the house is open for the country that question may be asked, but that is the chief one.

Is not there a name given?—Yes, at the gate.

Of every hundred admitted, do as many die now as formerly?—No, I think not.

To what do you think that is owing?—I think, in the first place, that the few who come from the country are better carried.

Is a child ever sent to the country except it is healthy?—Sometimes, according to the appearance of them; the doctor may judge it better that they should have the country air, than remain with us.

When the children from the foundling are sent out to nurse in the country, have the matrons of that department any thing further to do with them?—Nothing.

Is the matron of the Foundling under any superintendence, except that which is given by the ladies, who are good enough to attend as governesses?—Yes, and the doctor and apothecary.

What persons has the matron of the Foundling under her; what servants?—Dry nurses for the infirmary department, and wet nurses for the foundling; and one dry nurse, an old woman, that has been there many years.

What salary have you for your present duty?—50 l.

And you are found in lodging, and coals, and candles?—Yes.

How many wards are there in the infirmary?—Eight wards.

Are they generally full?—They are.

Has there been much difference in the prevalence of disease at different times, since you have been at the head of the infirmary?—At the time I came into the infirmary there were very few children, and in general very few; but since July twelvemonth, the number of children increased very much; first, on account of the preparatory school; that is an addition to the number that had not been before.

Do you mean the total number of children in the hospital being greater, the number in the infirmary must also be greater?—Yes; I believe fifty they would think a good number in the infirmary, till that time I mention; then the preparatory children came in, and crowded the infirmary at the first; then other diseases from the country are taken in, when the children are taken in from the country.

Do the children from the country bring diseases with them, or find diseases in the hospital, and catch them there?—They generally bring them with them, and then it spreads; the children in the infirmary catch the disease.

Do they bring infectious fevers with them, or do you mean the diseases are measles and hooping-cough, and infantile diseases?—Yes, measles and hooping-cough, and such like. Sometimes they have the itch to a great extent, that brings them to the infirmary; then hooping-cough. They take that one from the other, so that the infirmary is increased very much on that account.

Have not complaints in the eyes been very frequent also?—Yes, this year.

Do they catch the complaint of the eyes one of another, do you think?—I think they do.

Has the disorder been brought from the country, or do the children catch it when they come to the hospital?—I think it was after they came to the hospital, to the best of my opinion.

When did the diseases in the eyes prevail to the greatest extent?—I believe it was in September.

Have you been able to receive into the infirmary all the children that laboured under the disease, or do many, having the disease in a greater or less degree, continue in the school?—They were still brought to the infirmary, according as their eyes were infected; there were none of them kept in the school.

Examination of Mrs.
Margaret Ross,
10 Dec. 1824.

Are there many children now in the infirmary that have that disorder?—They are all recovering, what we have in it; we have but few now.

Does it affect them severely?—Some of them very much.

Does it always affect both eyes?—Generally it does.

Does it continue any long time?—Sometimes very long.

How long do you mean?—Some of them may be well in a month; some of them continue two or three months before they are entirely well; sometimes they get a little better, and then worse again; so that it keeps them a long time. We have sent home a great number that have recovered from it.

Do those children who have the ophthalmia most severely, remain in the infirmary?—Yes, till they are perfectly well.

What proportion of children admitted have been afflicted with the ophthalmia, more or less?—I cannot tell the number.

Have the greater part?—Yes, the greater part.

Have they nearly all?—No, there was a number with hooping-cough this year.

Have three out of four?—Indeed I think there was.

If a child is brought into the infirmary with the hooping-cough among the children having the ophthalmia, does it necessarily catch the ophthalmia?—Yes; a number of them have caught the different disorders prevalent in the infirmary at the same time.

Are sufficient means provided for taking care of the children in the infirmary?—There are.

And sufficient nurses?—There are.

Is the medical attendance sufficient?—I think it is, to the best of my opinion.

Does the apothecary reside in the house?—He does.

Does the surgeon reside in the house?—No.

In the case of a child being taken suddenly ill, is Mr. Creighton always in attendance as soon as it is desirable?—Yes; if the apothecary sees it necessary he sends for Mr. Creighton.

Does Mr. Creighton always come?—He does; it has not happened very often in my time in the infirmary that it has been necessary.

Does Mr. Creighton attend there every day?—He does.

Does he examine all the foundlings that are admitted.—He does; sometimes he has been ill with the gout, and has been in England latterly, but otherwise he attends every day.

Who attends for him in his absence?—Doctor L'Estrange attended for him, and when he was ill, it was his son.

Are you ever under difficulties in providing sufficient accommodation for the children in the infirmary; is it ever too full?—It was a great deal too full; it was too full from the month of July to September—July, August, and September.

How many beds are there in the part of the infirmary over which you preside?—I think 170 beds we had at that time; but we were obliged to put them on beds on the floor.

How many children were there in the infirmary at any one time?—I think 429. We had a ward on the other side with 129 boys in it.

How many beds were there in that ward?—There were beds for all the boys.

Is the same description of beds used in the infirmary for the boys that are to be seen in the dormitories, such as are divided down the middle with a board?—Some of them; and there are some of them of a larger size than the smaller beds: each of them holds two.

Do you put two sick children in a bed with only a board between them?—We have beds with no board between them for the sick children; but in the other convalescent ward we have beds with boards.

Have you ever been forced to put two sick children in one bed?—Yes; two children sick with the same disease, during the time the infirmary was so crowded: one at the head and one at the foot, but not of different complaints.

Do you not consider that this is a practice that ought, if possible, to be avoided?—I know it is.

Does it not tend both to retard the recovery of the children and to communicate infection?—It cannot be so comfortable where there are two children in one bed as where there is but one.

Has not an alteration been lately made in the mode in which the children are drafted into the hospital; are they not taken in as vacancies occur, without waiting for any particular time?—Yes; there have been some last year drafted in in different months, which I believe has not been the case before.

Does that make it less likely that the infirmary can ever be over crowded at any particular time?—I think it would.

Were the infants in the foundling, when you were there, subject to the ophthalmia?—Yes; at all times we were liable to get in infants with bad eyes. I believe from colds.

Have you known it on former occasions to prevail in the same infectious manner that it has done lately, and go all through the hospital?—No, I never did; I never heard any thing like it.

Did you ever know it half as bad?—I did not.

Did you ever know it a tenth part as bad?—I never knew of it at all.

Was it worse this year or last year?—This year.

Worse than last year?—Yes, a great deal. I think, as well as I can recollect, the hooping-cough, the itch, and such as that, prevailed the chief part of last year.

Have

Examination of
Mrs.
Margaret Ross,
10 Dec. 1824.

Have you more business in the infirmary, particularly with sore eyes, this year than last?—Yes; it was in July the children came in from the country, and shortly after that, this ophthalmia commenced severely. It was in August and September of this year that the crowds were in the infirmary.

I understand you to say, that at all times you have been liable to have infants come into the hospital with sore eyes?—Yes.

Was the disorder they had catching?—No, not at all; nothing infectious at all; it was quite a different case.

Did it frequently last long?—An infant might have sore eyes for a month, and sometimes sore eyes originated from other complaints.

I understood you to say that you never knew one infant in the Foundling catch the disease in the eyes from another?—No, never.

State as well as you can recollect, when you first knew any infectious disorder of the eyes prevail among the children in the school in the Foundling?—I never took notice of any such thing till this year; it might be similar before I went to the infirmary, but never any thing I heard of.

Do you not know that the ophthalmia prevailed very much in the infirmary in 1823?—No; I do not recollect it.

Were there not a great many with bad eyes in the infirmary the first summer after you went in?—No, I do not say any such thing; I say the greatest number in the drafting in 1823, was the children that had the whooping-cough and such little complaints, the itch and such things as that, but not ophthalmia.

Try to recollect as well as you can, and say, whether you think that disorder in the children's eyes did not prevail before last Christmas?—Indeed I think not; of course I would recollect it, for I cannot forget this year, the number was so great.

At what period in this year did the children's eyes begin to be ill?—I cannot exactly say to a day; but in September I think it was, they were very bad; there were many cases that the children's eyes were not very bad, but then the number that came into the infirmary every day was great.

When you first saw the children with this violent disease in the eyes, was it a new complaint to you, or were you acquainted with the appearances of it?—It was quite new to me.

Can you describe the complaint, to show the difference between that and sore eyes merely?—The sore eyes formerly were found quite a different thing; in twenty children we might have one or two that had bad eyes, but not in the same state with the growing children; it might happen from cold.

Do you mean that those cases were among the infants, and not among the grown children?—At that time I had no call to the grown children.

If diseases in the eyes had prevailed to any great extent, when you were matron of the Foundling, in the infirmary and in the school, must you have known it?—I think I should.

Was there any child when you first came to the infirmary then confined with any disease in the eyes?—I do not recollect that there was.

Either boy or girl?—No, I do not recollect that; there must have been nothing particular; I do not recollect it.

Has any child lost its eyes in consequence of the disease?—I do not recollect a child losing its eyes; there has one girl died, her eyes were extremely bad, but I cannot say it was of that she died; I believe her limbs were swelled; I believe she was dropsical, but her eyes were very bad; that is the only one I ever recollect in that way so bad.

Did the same child ever have it twice?—Sometimes they grew pretty well, and I would think they would be fit for to go to school to-day, and to-morrow they would become worse again, that is often the case; it was so infectious that I took it myself very much; my eyes have never been so well since.

Has care been taken to prevent the towels or cloths, with which a child labouring under the disease wipes its eyes, being used by a child not having it?—The children with the ophthalmia were all kept above stairs, and there was one side they were kept in general.

Were you in the hospital when the children were received into it that were afterwards sent to the charter schools?—I do not recollect the children going to the charter schools; I have no cause to know any thing of it.

Are not both boys and girls in the same building in the infirmary?—They are.

Do the same servants attend on them both?—No; the boys are now separated; they are not mixed in school as they used to be; and the same persons do not attend on both; there are two nurses to the boys that have no call whatever to the other part of the house.

Do you mean two nurses to the boys in the infirmary?—Yes.

How long has that separation taken place?—I cannot exactly say how many months; it was by Mrs. Magee's desire that was the case.

Did the same persons wait upon the two sets previous to that regulation?—No; there were always nurses to the boys, and they were not together but in the school.

Are the wards in the infirmary that are allotted to the boys and girls entirely separate?—Yes, they are separate now; the boys do not go to the top part of the house, but in the lower ward on one side, and there is a door shuts them out from the others.

How long has that been so?—Not more than six months or eight months.

Is there one staircase, or are there two?—There are two.

Is one appropriated to the boys and the other to the girls?—The girls may go up both sides; but they do not generally, because the upper part is wholly taken up by the girls, the boys are down stairs.

Examination of Mrs.
Margaret Ross,
10 Dec. 1824.

Did it ever come to your knowledge that a girl in the Foundling Hospital had become in a way likely to be a mother?—I heard it lately.

Never before?—I heard it within this fortnight.

What did you hear?—I heard there was a girl in the country in the family way.

How long had she been removed from the Foundling Hospital before you heard that story?—I believe two months or thereabouts.

How came she to be removed from the hospital?—They sent her to the country, she and another girl were sent.

For what reason were they sent?—I cannot tell.

Was it because they discovered she was pregnant?—No, that was discovered by a letter from a woman in the country.

How near is her period of confinement at present?—I cannot tell; I have not heard.

Do you believe that the circumstance of her pregnancy originated in the Foundling Hospital?—I have reason to believe it did.

Do you know to whom it is to be imputed?—I cannot tell.

Did you ever hear?—I did hear it was a master that was there, but it was only a flying report.

Has the report ever been investigated?—No.

Who was the master?—He is out of the house now.

How came he to be out of the house?—He resigned.

Was it in consequence of this report?—I do not know; there was nothing of the kind heard.

How old was the girl?—She might be seventeen.

Did she hold any particular station in the Foundling Hospital?—She was made mistress for a few months.

Immediately previous to her departure?—No; then she was taken from it, and put into something quite away from it, or she was monitor; it was not with me she was.

Do you recollect the immediate cause of her being sent to the country?—All the cause I ever heard was, that Mrs. Magee did not wish to have them in the house; there were two girls went at that time.

What was the name of the other girl?—Margaret Pitt.

Do you know the reason she was objected to?—No; I did not know of either at the time.

Is that the only foundling girl you have ever known to be pregnant in your experience?—It is. I never heard of any thing in my time.

Did you ever hear of a girl of the name of Snow?—Not within the Foundling Hospital I did not.

Did you ever hear of a girl of the name of Snow being pregnant within this year or two?—Not at all.

You did not?—Not at all; it might have happened in the country when they leave the hospital.

Did you ever hear of a girl of that name, or Slow?—Yes, there was a girl of the name of Slow.

How old was she?—A married woman, living in the hospital.

Do you mean she was married immediately before leaving the hospital?—Yes, I believe she was dismissed on that account.

What account?—For marrying without the knowledge of the governors.

Whom did she marry?—I believe a master in the house.

Was the master a foundling?—No.

Was she a foundling?—Yes.

How old was she at the time?—She might be two or three and twenty, as well as I can think.

How did she come to be married?—I do not know.

How do you know she was married?—By hearsay, and that I know her husband and herself were dismissed.

Was she confined before she left the hospital?—No.

She was not?—No, not that I ever heard of.

What length of time elapsed between the supposed marriage and her actually leaving the hospital?—I cannot tell; the head mistress is the person likely to know that, she is under her charge.

Who is the head mistress?—Mrs. Innes.

Is she here?—Yes, she is.

When did Arnold leave the house?—Perhaps two months from this.

Have you any means of knowing whether Margaret Slow was pregnant or not?—No.

How did her marriage become discovered?—I cannot say.

Did her husband and she live together as husband and wife, openly in the house?—I think not; I am sure they did not.

EXAMINATIONS of 19 Girls at the FOUNDLING HOSPITAL.

Appendix, No. 14.

Examination of Mary Birch; Friday, 10th December 1824.

Examination of Mary Birch,
10 Dec. 1824.

HOW long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Going on two years.

Where were you at nurse in the country?—In Wicklow.

How far from the town of Wicklow?—A mile and a half.

What was the nurse's name?—Eleanor Clark.

Did you ever go to school while you were with her?—Yes.

Whose?—Miss Harvey's.

Was that in Wicklow?—No, two miles off.

How many years did you attend the school?—One year since it commenced.

Was she a Protestant?—Yes.

Who desired you to go to that school?—We got papers out of this house to go to school, and Miss Harvey began a school.

Were there other children there besides foundlings?—Yes.

How many attended?—Two hundred, boys and girls.

Did you find that they made little of you on account of being a foundling?—No, they never did.

Did they never call you unpleasant names?—No.

Did you ever quarrel with them?—No.

Did you like attending the school?—I did.

Did your nurse ever talk to you about religion?—No, she always brought me to church. She said she would never ask me to go any where but to church: she would never ask me to go to chapel if I was not willing to do it.

Was she a Roman-catholic?—Yes.

Did she never tell you the Roman-catholic religion was the best?—No, she did not; because she said it would be an unjust thing; she would not bring me up in that way, but to go to church.

Were you ever at mass?—No, I was never inside of a chapel door.

Did you never hear any thing in the house about the Roman-catholic religion?—No, when they were going to prayers I did not go to prayers with them.

Did you ever see a priest in the house?—Yes, when she was ill.

Did he talk to you about it?—No.

Have you any doubt which is the best religion?—I know from the Bible that the Protestant religion is the best.

Were you happy with your nurse?—Yes, very happy.

Are you happy now?—Yes.

Which would make you the most comfortable?—I am very comfortable in the Foundling, but I would rather be with my nurse.

Why?—Because I was longer with her than in the Foundling.

Were you better fed with your nurse?—No.

Were you better clothed?—No.

Had you a better bed?—No.

What would make you better pleased?—Because I liked her better than the girls.

Have you many friends among the girls?—Yes.

Do you like some of them better than others?—Yes.

Do you like any of them as well as you liked your nurse?—No, only a little girl I have at home.

Is she with you?—Yes, she is here now.

Do you like Eliza Stroaker better than other girls in the hospital?—Yes.

Why?—Because she was in the school with me in the country.

Are you not better fed in the Foundling Hospital than with your nurse?—I used to get very good diet with my nurse, but not the same diet.

Were you with the same nurse as Eliza Stroaker?—No, but she lived in the same town.

Did your nurse take better care of you than Eliza Stroaker's nurse of her?—They took very good care of us.

Did your nurse ever beat you?—Yes, when I deserved it.

Had she any other children?—Yes, five.

Did she use you as well as her own children?—Yes, better a good deal.

Can you guess any reason for that?—Because I had no parents of my own.

Were you fond of her children?—Yes.

Were you fonder of her children than any children in the Foundling Hospital?—Yes.

Why, were they better children?—No.

What made you like them better?—Because I was always with them.

Would you be very glad to be apprenticed?—Yes.

Would you rather be apprenticed than go back to your nurse?—Yes.

What is the reason for that—what would you like?—I would not like to be a burthen to her.

You would rather get your own bread?—Yes.

How soon do you think they will apprentice you out of the Foundling?—About the 1st of March, I expect, there is an apprentice list.

Examination of Mary Birch,
10 Dec. 1824.

Have you had sore eyes in the Foundling Hospital?—No.
Have not most of the children had them?—Yes.
How came you to escape?—I do not know; I was never in the infirmary since I was there.
Do you think there are any girls in the hospital that like it better than their nurses?—Yes.
Why?—I do not know.
Could you name any that like the hospital better than their nurse?—Mary Garrich, and Ann Davis, and Eliza Hood.
How old are they?—Going fourteen years of age.
Do you think their nurses used them kindly?—I did not know them.
Did you ever hear them say their nurses did not use them kindly?—No, they said they used them very well.
Did you ever hear any of the girls in the Foundling complain of their nurses in the country?—No.
You never did?—No.
How long were you at nurse?—'Till twelve.
Did you ever hear whether the Protestant nurses or the Roman-catholic nurses were the kindest to the children?—On account of the Roman-catholic nurses having other children, they would not have any thing to say to them, they would be the kindest.
Do you think the Roman-catholic nurses use them better than the Protestants?—They use them as well.
Did you ever hear of the Roman-catholic nurses interfering with the religion of the children?—Never.
Did you ever hear any of the children say that the nurses had interfered with their religion?—No.
Do you think all the children in the Foundling Hospital are sincere Protestants?—Yes, I believe they are; they never made their hearts known to me, except a little girl.
Do you never talk of religion together?—Yes, and we always say that the Protestant religion is the best.
Do you ever dispute about it at all?—No.
Is there any little girl there that stands up for the Roman-catholic religion?—No.
Did you ever hear any thing said against the Bible, where you were in the country?—No.
I always heard her say she liked the Protestant as well as any body else.
How many are there with your mother now?—Never a one out of this house.
Why?—I do not know.
Is not she willing to take one?—Yes, if she could get one.

Appendix, No. 15.

Examination of Sarah Roach; Friday, 10th December 1824.

Examination of Sarah Roach,
10 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—To the best of my opinion, I am twenty or twenty-one.
How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—I had not time to consider yesterday how long, but it is twelve years.
Do you think you were about nine years old when you came into it?—Yes, between eight and nine, as I was told.
Why have you continued so long in the Foundling Hospital?—On account of an impediment in my loins.
How did you get the hurt?—In the Foundling Hospital.
What are you looking forward to be in life?—Any thing the Almighty pleases to put me to.
Have you any particular prospect?—No.
Are you happy in the Foundling Hospital?—Yes, as happy as my heart can wish to be, and always was since I was admitted into it.
Do you remember well when you were at your nurse's?—I can scarcely recollect when I was at my first nurse, but I was out with her in the country for six years, on account of this hurt.
Were you happier in the Foundling Hospital, or with your second nurse?—Indeed I thought myself happier with my second nurse than in the Foundling.
What circumstance made you happier?—I was not so much confined, in the first place.
How long is it since you returned from your second nurse?—Two years the first of last July.
Did you attend any school when you were there?—Yes, the Sunday school, as long as I was able to go to it.
What Sunday school?—The Reverend Mr. Bailey's, he is minister of the parish of Arklow.
Did you attend any other Sunday school than that?—No.
Where did you learn most, there or in the Foundling Hospital?—I learnt most in the Foundling Hospital, because I was not able to attend the Sunday school all the time I was out.
Which school teaches the quickest?—The Foundling Hospital; because not attending to it only on Sunday.
What have you learnt in the Foundling Hospital?—I have not learnt much; I was only there two years.
Can you read and write?—Yes:

Examination of Sarah Roach,
10 Dec. 1824.

Do you know any thing of figures?—A little.
Can you sew?—Yes.
Can you make a shirt?—Yes.
Can you do any thing else?—I can spin flax.
Was your second nurse a Protestant?—Yes.
Did you go to church with her?—Yes, when I was able; but all the children she had would go there.
How many children had she?—She had some one after the other; as they would get bigger they would go away, and she would have another.
How many had she at one time?—Four.
Did she treat you kindly?—Yes.
As kindly as her own children?—Yes.
And you agreed very well?—Yes.
Had you ever any quarrels?—Yes, only once.
Did the children at the Sunday school call you any names?—No, never.
Do you think they made little of you on account of your coming from the Foundling Hospital?—No, not that I know of; no, not a halfp'worth.
Do you remember your first nurse?—I just recollect her.
Have you ever seen her since?—No.
Did she ever talk to you about the Roman-catholic religion?—No, because I had not been long enough.
Had you ever any inclination to turn Roman-catholic?—No, I was very young then, when I went to the second nurse, and then the inclination wore off my mind.
Would you be glad to see the second nurse?—Yes, I should be very happy.
What would you like best, to go back to your second nurse for three years, or stay in the hospital?—Whichever the gentlemen please; I am well contented.
Which would you choose?—I would rather be with her.
Where were you better fed?—I am very well in the Foundling Hospital, very well fed; I get as much as I need wish, and sometimes more.
Did your nurse give you as good food as you get in the Foundling Hospital?—She gave me food, but it was not the same.
Did you like it as well?—I did.
Had you as good a bed with your nurse as in the Foundling?—Yes.
How many beds had you in that house?—Four.
Were you as well dressed when you were in the country as you are now?—Yes; I always got my clothes out of the hospital, and if I wanted shoes or any thing of the necessaries of life, she would buy them for me and the rest of the children too.

Appendix, No. 16.

Examination of Anne Burgh; Friday, 10th December 1824.

Examination of Anne Burgh,
10 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—I think sixteen.
How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—I am going on four years; I came in 1820.
How old were you when you left your nurse?—Twelve.
What was her name?—Ellen Cameron.
Was she a Protestant?—Yes.
Was she the first nurse you ever had?—Yes; I was three years old when I was taken to her.
Were you with a nurse before you went to Ellen Cameron?—Yes.
Do you know her name?—No.
Had Ellen Cameron any other children?—Yes; Biddy Neil.
What is become of her?—She is in the infirmary.
What is the matter with her?—With sore eyes.
How old is she?—Eleven.
How long ago is that?—Going on a year.
Were you well used by Ellen Cameron?—Yes.
Did she give you as good food as you get in the hospital?—No.
What food did she give you?—Potatoes and butter-milk.
Had you a good bed with her?—Yes.
Where would you rather be, with her or in the Foundling Hospital?—In the Foundling Hospital.
Why?—Because I would get my learning.
Did you go to any school when you were at Ellen Cameron's?—No.
If there was a good school near Ellen Cameron's, and you went there, and slept at home at night, where would you rather be?—In the Foundling Hospital.
Why?—Because I would be among the girls.
Do you like them?—Yes.
Better than your nurse?—Yes.
Do you like some of them better than others?—Yes.
Had Ellen Cameron any daughter of her own?—Yes; one.
Did she use you as well as she used her own child?—No; she did not.
What difference did she make between you?—I used not to dine at her own table.

Examination of Anne Burgh,
10 Dec. 1824.

Where did she give you your dinner?—By myself at the fire.
Why did she not let you come to her table?—I do not know.
Was it a thatched cabin she lived in?—Yes.
Did she ever give you any hard names?—No.
Did she give you the same food she had herself?—Yes.
Was her own child better fed than you?—No; I do not think she was.
Did you and her own child ever dine together at the same table?—No.
Was the other little foundling girl allowed to dine with her?—No; she dined with me.
Did that woman keep any servant?—No; she got one out of this house very lately.
Did she ever give you any meat?—Yes; on Sunday.
Did she eat it only on Sunday?—That is all.
Would Biddy Neil like to go back to her nurse?—No; I think not.
Are you very fond of Biddy Neil?—Yes.
Do you like her better than any girl in the Foundling?—Yes.
What is the reason of that?—Because she lived with me.
Do you ever quarrel with her?—No.
Did you see many children about Ellen Cameron's?—Yes; about six or seven.
Did they ever call you any names?—No.
Do you think that they thought little of you for being a foundling?—No.
Do you think that Ellen herself thought little of you for being a foundling?—Yes; I think she did.
Did she ever reproach you for it?—No.
Do you think that was the reason why she did not let you dine at her table?—Yes; I think it was.
Had you ever any reason for thinking so?—No.
Could you spell when you came from your nurse to the Foundling?—Yes; a little.
Where did you learn it?—At home; my little sister used to teach me.
Was there any day-school near you?—Yes.
Why did you not go to it?—She would not let me.
Would you be glad to go if she would let you?—Yes.
Did you ever ask to go?—Yes.
Was it kept by a Protestant?—No; a Roman-catholic.
Did you ever attend the Sunday school?—Yes; for a while.
Who kept it?—Mr. Paisley.
How far was it from her house?—About a mile.
How long did you attend it?—About three months.
Why did you not go on attending it, was there any particular reason?—No.
Have you ever seen your nurse since you left her?—Yes.
Were you very glad to see her?—No.
Would you like to see her now?—No.
Would you be rather apprenticed or stay in the Foundling?—Apprenticed, if they would let me go to church and to school.
Have you not done with school now?—I would be teaching children now.
Are you a monitor?—Yes.
Can you write well?—I can write middling; we were taken off paper.
Why were you taken off paper?—The governesses would not let us use paper.
Did you ever hear any reason for it?—No.
Do you think it is to save paper?—Yes.
Can you do any figures?—Yes.
Do you ever read any books for your amusement?—Only some little books that Miss Magee gave us.
What were they about?—Some of them were about the All-seeing God.
Are any of them amusing books?—No; such books as those—
Did you ever read any amusing books?—No.
Are all the books you ever read about religion?—Yes; they are—
What catechism have you ever learnt?—The Church Catechism.
Any other?—Crossman's Catechism.
Any other?—No; that is all the catechisms.
How did your nurse employ you in the country?—Making me sew; making frocks.

Appendix, No. 17.

Examination of Jane Coghlan; Friday, 10th December 1824.

Examination of Jane Coghlan,
10 Dec. 1824.

HOW long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Going on a year; I was drafted in this year, on July the 19th.
You have been only five months there?—Yes; I am only just going on a year.
What was your nurse's name?—Bridget Roche.
Was she a Roman-catholic or a Protestant?—A Roman-catholic.
Had you ever a nurse but her?—No.
Were you well used by her?—Yes, very much so.
Are you very fond of her?—Yes.
Did you ever see her after you left her?—No.
Would you be very glad to see her again?—Yes, indeed I would.

Examination of Jane Coghlan,
10 Dec. 1824.

Were you very sorry to leave her?—Yes, I was.

Did you cry to leave her much?—Yes, I did very much.

Do you hope ever to see her again?—I do not know,

Would they let you see her if she was to call again?—No, because she is a Roman-catholic; I could not see her.

Do you think that very hard?—Yes.

Do you think there is any harm in being a Roman-catholic?—I do not know.

Are you a Roman-catholic?—No, a Protestant.

Were you a Protestant all the time you were with her?—Yes, indeed; I was used to go to church, and to Sunday school.

Whose Sunday school was it?—A Miss Webster's, and a very good lady she was.

How far was that from where you lived?—About a quarter of a mile.

Do you not think your nurse was very sorry you were brought up a Protestant?—I do not know.

Did she never say any thing to you about it?—No, never a word.

Do you not think she thought the Protestant religion a wrong one?—I do not know.

Do you not think the Roman-catholic religion a wrong one?—Yes.

Are you not sorry your nurse is a Roman-catholic?—Yes, if I could help it.

Would she not be glad if you were a Roman-catholic?—I do not know.

Did you ever see a Roman-catholic priest?—Yes, he did not live far from the house.

Did he ever talk to you?—No; if there was any business for him I would be put out, the nurse would not let him talk to me.

Did he ever try?—No.

Did the Roman-catholic curate ever talk to you?—No.

Were you ever in a chapel in your life?—No, never.

Did you learn much while you were with your nurse?—I learnt to sew, and to read and write, and I could do some sums; but I forget now.

You forgot them since you came to the Foundling?—Yes.

Where did you learn to do the sums?—In the every-day school.

How near was that to your house?—It was a very short way, only five or six perches off, or seven.

Did you pay any thing for it?—The minister used to pay so much every year.

Was that school kept by a Protestant?—Yes.

Do you know how much was paid for your schooling?—No.

What books did you learn at the school?—We always used to get our tasks in the Testament.

Any thing else?—The Spelling Book and the Old Testament.

Were you fond of learning?—Yes.

Where did you learn fastest, there or in the Foundling Hospital?—A great deal faster in the country.

How do you account for that?—I could do many things when I came in that I cannot do now.

Are you not at school constantly in the Foundling Hospital?—Yes.

Do you think you forget there what you have learnt?—I do not think I have improved since I came.

Would you be very glad to have a good school where you could learn more?—Yes.

Are there any girls in the Foundling you are fond of?—Yes; Sarah Lewis, Catherine Overring, and Mary Dean.

Why do you love them better than any other girls?—Because they used always to be with me, and they always used to play with me; Sarah Lewis is my sister.

Was she at nurse with you in the country?—Yes.

Had your nurse any children of her own?—Yes, four, that were at home when I was there.

Were they about your own age?—They were older except one.

Did she not use her own children better than you?—No, not one bit, there was no distinction made.

Did you all dine together?—Yes.

What did she use to give you for dinner?—Sometimes meat and cabbage, and at other times bread and milk.

On the whole, were you as well fed by her as in the Foundling?—Yes.

Had you as good a bed as in the Foundling?—Yes.

Would it make you very happy to go back to her?—It would.

How soon do you hope to be an apprentice?—I do not know; they are going out at fifteen or sixteen.

But would you rather be apprenticed or go back to your nurse?—I would go back to her.

What would become of you in five years time?—I could get apprenticed; my mother's people, some of them, are very rich; I dare say some of them would take me.

How many children attended the day school you talk of?—A great many; I cannot count how many.

Were there a hundred?—Yes.

How many attended the Sunday school?—About fifty; according as they came to it; there were sixty; they would be absent awhile.

Did the children of either of those schools make little of you?—No.

Do you think they thought you were not so good as themselves?—No; I never heard one say any thing against me.

Examination of Jane Coghlan,
10 Dec. 1824.

Did they say any thing against you?—They used to say that it was a very bad place; and when I came into it I would make my escape out of it; my nurse told me never to do that.

What did they mean by saying it was a bad place?—I do not know.

Were you much frightened when they came to take you to the Foundling?—Yes.

Were you very sorry?—Yes.

Did you never quarrel with the children at the school?—Yes.

Did they never call you names?—No; only that when I came here I would be taught much better than to call people names.

Did they ever call you a Parisheen?—Yes.

Did they ever call you so?—No; I never heard them say so to me.

To whom did you hear them say so?—To the girls in the school.

Did you ever hear the word Brat?—Yes.

Where?—Through the street I have heard it.

Were you ever called Brat?—No; unless any of the children would not like me they would call me Brat, and that would not do me any harm.

What does the word Brat mean?—I do not know.

What does the word Parisheen mean?—A child educated in the Foundling.

Appendix, No. 18.

Examination of Esther Wade; Friday, 10th December 1824.

Examination of Esther Wade,
10 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—I do not know.

Are you fifteen or sixteen?—I do not know.

How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Since the 20th of July last.

What was your nurse's name?—Ann Corfey.

Where did she live?—In the county of Westmeath.

How long did you stay with her?—I was going on nine years.

Where were you before that?—I do not know.

You must have been at nurse somewhere else before you were there?—I do not know.

Was Ann Corfey a Protestant?—Yes.

Did you attend any school when you were living with her?—Yes, every day.

What did you learn?—In the New Testament and the Old.

Can you read well?—Yes.

Do you know any thing of figures?—Yes.

Where did you learn fastest, there or at the Foundling Hospital?—At school.

What is the reason of that?—I do not know.

Are you improving at the Foundling now?—Yes.

Did you ever attend the Sunday school?—Yes, every Sunday.

Where did you learn best, at the Sunday school or day school?—The day school.

Who kept the Sunday school?—Mr. Dobbin.

Did you ever learn the catechism?—Yes.

What catechism?—The explanation of the catechism.

Did you never read any others?—I do not recollect.

Did your nurse use you well?—Yes.

Should you like to go back to her?—Yes.

Are you happy in the Foundling Hospital?—I am well enough.

Should you be happier if you went back to your nurse?—Yes.

Why, what is there would please you better?—I would rather be with her.

Do you ever expect to see her again?—I do not know.

Had she any children of her own?—Yes.

Were they about your own age?—No, big boys.

Had she any girls?—No.

Is there any one in the Foundling Hospital you love as well as your nurse?—I have two sisters that were reared in one house.

Are they in the Foundling?—Yes.

Do you love them better than any other girls in the house?—Yes.

Are there any other girls in the house you love better than the rest?—No.

Do you stay more with your sisters than with the other girls?—Yes.

Were they brought in at the same time you were?—No, before me.

Did your nurse feed you as well as you are fed in the Foundling?—Yes, better.

What did she use to give you?—She used to give me tea some mornings, and stirabout and milk some mornings.

Did she ever give you any potatoes?—Yes, at dinner.

Did you dine with herself?—Yes, I never had any thing but with herself.

Did the children and you agree well at the Sunday school and day school?—Yes.

Do you not think they made light of you?—No.

Did they not call you unpleasant names?—No.

Did you ever hear the word Parisheen?—No.

Were you ever called a Brat?—No.

Was it a thatched cabin your nurse lived in?—Yes, a large thatched house.

How

Examination of Esther Wade,
10 Dec. 1824.

How many rooms below?—Two rooms down stairs.
Did you all sleep in the same room?—Yes.
How many beds?—Two beds.
Who slept in the beds?—My father and brother used to sleep together, and my mother and us three in the other.

Appendix, No. 19.

Examination of Ann Creane; Friday, 10th December 1824.

Examination of Ann Creane,
10 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Sixteen.
How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Five years.
How old were you when you came into it?—I think near twelve.
Were you ever with more than one nurse in the country?—No.
What was her name?—Mary Corfey.
Was that the nurse that one of the girls below was with?—No.
Was she a Protestant or Roman-catholic?—A Roman-catholic.
Did she use you very well?—Yes, as well as was in her power.
Was she a poor woman?—No, in a middling state.
What was her husband?—He was dead.
What means had she of supporting you besides the sum allowed?—By her own earnings.
Had she any land?—No.
What kind of work did she do?—She used to wash, and spin, and sew.
Had she any other children to take care of but you?—No, only one.
Had she any children of her own?—Yes, but they were grown up.
Had you ever any cause to complain of her?—No.
Did she ever punish you?—No.
What did she give you to eat?—The best she had for herself.
What did she give you?—Stirabout and milk for breakfast.
Had you any meat?—Yes.
Had you as good a bed as at the Foundling?—No.
Were you very sorry to leave her?—Yes.
Did you cry very much?—Yes.
How long were you before you were reconciled to the Foundling Hospital?—About a twelvemonth.
Would you go back to her if you could?—No, she is a Roman-catholic; I would not go back to her if I could.
Did she ever talk to you about the Roman-catholic religion?—I would rather be a Roman-catholic when I was with her, but not now; I have seen what is the true religion.
Did you ever go to the school there?—Yes, the day school and Sunday school.
Who was the master at the day school?—A Roman-catholic.
Did you ever go to chapel?—Yes.
How came you afterwards to go to church?—Because that was the order of the Foundling Hospital.
Before that you used to go to chapel?—Yes.
What made you think the Roman-catholic religion was the best?—I think it was love to her that made me like it.
Do you not think she thought the Protestant religion the wrong religion?—Yes.
Why should she recommend it to you?—Because the minister desired her to do so.
Before that order came out, did she tell you to be a Roman-catholic?—No, she never told me to be either the one or the other.
Did she never talk to you about the Virgin Mary?—No; I heard her pray to the Virgin Mary.
Did you not pray to her?—She taught me two or three prayers.
When did you stop saying those prayers?—Till I came here, and till Mr. Murray taught me better.
Have you any doubt in your own mind which is the best religion?—Not the least.
Do you think if you were to go to live among Roman-catholics you would be one?—No, by the blessing of God, I would not.
How do you know the Protestant religion is the true religion?—I see that the religion of the Bible is the true religion.
What do you see against the Roman-catholic in the Bible?—From their worshipping saints and angels.
Is there any thing else?—They are very superstitious, and hate every Protestant; they would do them every injury if they could.
How do you know that?—I have seen them, and heard them.
What did you hear?—I heard them curse me when I was going to church, and said, I would be damned.
Did they ever call you any particular names?—Yes, they called me a foundling.
Any thing else?—No.
A brat?—Yes.
Who used to call you that?—Children about the parish.
Did the scholars too call you so?—No.
Did you attend the school after the order of the board came out?—Yes.

Examination of Ann Creane,
10 Dec. 1824.

Did the children all call you those names?—No, they would be afraid of the master; but they would afterwards.

Did that vex you much?—Yes, it did.

Had you any friends among them?—They were my playfellows.

Were you often talking about religion with those children?—Not often.

What made them call you names, and say you would be damned?—Because I went to church.

Did you ever tell them you were right, and they were wrong?—I did not know whether I was right or wrong.

Did the clergyman look after you, to see that you went to church?—Yes, he did.

Did your nurse try to keep you from church?—No, not after the order was made.

Are you looking for an apprenticeship?—Yes.

Are you rather older than they are in general?—Yes.

What is the reason of that?—I was a monitor.

Can you say whether you learnt fastest at the Foundling Hospital, or at the day school?—I think I learnt more in the Foundling Hospital about religion and the Bible.

You did not hear any thing about that in the Roman-catholic school?—No.

Did you ever see the Bible before you came to the hospital?—Yes, in the church.

Did you ever read any part of it?—Yes, in the catechism, a small book.

Have you read much of the Bible now?—Yes, I have.

Putting religion out of the question, do you think you learnt to read faster in the day school in the country or in the Foundling Hospital?—I could read when I came in.

Do the children in the Foundling Hospital learn to read as fast as in the country?—Some of them do not.

Are you happy in the Foundling?—Yes.

Have you any thing to complain of?—No, nothing.

Would you rather be apprenticed than be a monitor?—Yes, if I got a good place.

What do you mean if you got a good place?—A religious master and mistress that would care for my soul.

Did any body ever advise you to give that answer?—No.

Do you think much of religion yourself?—Yes, I do.

Do the girls at the Foundling Hospital talk much about religion, when out of school?—Yes, some of them do.

Have they any dispute about which is the true religion?—Yes, some of them.

Do any of them think the Roman-catholic religion the best?—Yes, I heard some of them say so.

Who put it into their heads?—Their nurses I suppose.

Had they lately left them?—Yes.

Do you know what becomes of most of the Foundling girls after they leave the hospital?—No.

Have you ever any talk among yourselves about it?—No.

Do you think they get good places or bad?—I think the generality of them get bad places.

What becomes of them when they get bad places?—I do not know.

Do you think if you had lived in the country with your mother, you would have got a service there?—Yes, I think I would; but I am glad I was taken away.

Why?—Because I think I should have been always ignorant, and not know any thing about Jesus Christ or God.

Was your nurse able to read?—No.

Were there any books in the house?—No, only my own books.

You have a clearer view of those matters than most of the girls who are fourteen or fifteen in the house?—Yes.

Do you think that in general they would rather stay in the Foundling Hospital than go back to their nurses?—I think there are hardly any but would rather go back to their nurses.

How long do you think that feeling stays by them; do they begin to lose it after they have been two years in the house?—Yes; some of them do, and some not.

Do they often run away?—Not a good many of them.

If there was a hole in the wall, do you think a great many would go out?—Yes, I think many would; I do not think they would all go away.

Would they go to their nurses?—Yes, I think so.

What do you think their nurses would do?—They would not keep them long.

Why not?—They would not be paid for them.

Do you not think the nurses are fond of them?—Yes.

Do you not think they are fond enough of them to keep them without being paid?—No.

Appendix, No. 20.

Examination of Eliza Stroaker; Friday, 10th December 1824.

Examination of Eliza Stroaker,
10 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—I was going fourteen when I was taken in, and that was last March. How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Since last March; the 6th of last March.

Where were you at nurse before you came into the Foundling Hospital?—County Wicklow.

What was your nurse's name?—Margaret Burns.

Was

Was she a Protestant or Roman-catholic?—A Roman-catholic.

What was the reason you remained with her so long?—The minister of the parish used always to give her a letter when she would be coming to town.

Who was the minister?—Mr. Porter.

What was the name of the parish?—Wicklow it is called; it is within a mile of Wicklow.

What school did you attend?—The mistress died before I came down.

What was the name of the place?—The town of Wicklow.

Was the mistress of that school a Protestant?—She was.

How long did you attend the school?—I went to two schools; first to a master that used to teach gentlemen's children; he had a boarding-school, and I used to go to him, and he had a day-school; the nurse used to pay for me; then he got so many scholars he could not attend to us, and then I went to a mistress to learn to sew.

How long were you with the master?—Going two years I think.

How long were you with the mistress?—I think above a year.

Did you sleep every night at your nurse's house?—Yes.

Was she quite satisfied you should attend the Protestant school?—She was. I used to go to school on Sunday, and to the church too, and the minister sent a note to Mr. Murray, and the Archbishop of Dublin was looking over the books, and all that were above ten were to be brought in; and the minister wrote to Mr. Murray to know if he would let me remain to July, and he did not get an answer.

Did you read the Bible at those schools?—Yes; I always used to attend the Sunday schools.

Before you went to that school?—Yes.

Did you learn to write?—No; I am learning now.

Did you learn any ciphering at the school?—No, I did not.

Did you learn any sewing?—Yes.

What sewing?—I could make shirts or gowns, or any thing else.

How did you know the archbishop took all that trouble?—The minister told me the archbishop was writing for all the children; and my mother wondered how I was sent for, and the other child left with her, and she came to the minister, and he told her that the archbishop was looking over the books, and he sent for me.

How old was that girl?—She was taken in the year before me; she was taken in July, and I was taken in March.

What catechism did you learn at the school?—The Church catechism.

Any other?—I am learning Crossman's catechism.

You did not learn that at the school?—No.

Did you learn Stopford's at the school?—No.

What other books did you learn at the school?—Spelling books.

What spelling book was it?—The beginning of it, the large syllables; the beginning of it, five or six syllables. I used to get off four or five words of those, and the meaning of them.

Did your nurse treat you kindly?—Yes; better than her own child.

How many children had she?—Two children.

Were they older or younger than you?—They were older; she had a daughter married.

Did you and the children agree well together?—Yes.

Did they slight you?—No, they would not be allowed to do that, if they had a mind to it; but they would not.

How did the children treat you at the schools you were at?—Very well.

Did they ever call you any unpleasant names?—No; unless we fell out.

What names did they call you when you fell out?—A parisheen.

Did they ever call you any thing else?—No.

Did that happen often?—No.

Did that vex you?—Yes, very much; but it did not do me any harm.

What did you say to them in reply?—I did not say any thing.

Did the nurse ever interfere with your religion?—No; she would give me her old cloak to go to church in.

Did she ever ask you to go to chapel?—Never once; except before the orders were given out for the children to go to church.

How old were you before you went to church?—About nine years.

Did you not think it odd to change your religion?—I only went with the little girls.

Which of the two religions do you think the best?—I should like to go to church.

Why?—It is the best.

Is it better than mass?—Yes.

What is the difference?—It is the best.

Why is it the best?—The priest reads the Latin, and the people do not know what it is; and the minister explains the scriptures.

Why did not your nurse go to church?—I do not know.

If the church appears a better thing to you, why not to her also?—I may be different from her.

Did you ever read any books of your nurse's at home?—Yes.

What books?—Story books.

Tell me the names of a few of them?—I forget them.

Do you not remember the name of one of them?—No.

Try?—I forget them now.

Were you happiest with your nurse when attending at the school or at the Foundling Hospital?—I was a great deal happier with my nurse; I am always crying now.

Examination of Eliza Stroaker,
10 Dec. 1824.

What do you dislike in the Foundling Hospital?—Indeed I learnt more when I was at home with her; I think I have lost a great deal of my learning since I have been in the Foundling Hospital. I have never a mind to get my lesson.

Was there any thing that made you happier with your nurse than now?—Yes.

What was it; what did you like better with her?—I had rather be with her than any one; but I would not like to go to her now.

Why?—I would rather go out apprentice.

Are you old enough?—Yes; I am going fifteen.

What would you like to be apprenticed to?—As a servant.

Do you think you should be happier?—Yes.

Do you not think your mistress might use you ill?—Not if I went to a religious person; unless I behaved ill.

Would you rather go out as an apprentice than return to your nurse?—Yes.

Why?—I could send her word where I was going to; if I was to go to her, I do not think she would let me go away any more. I think it would be better for me to learn to know how to earn my bread; and if God be pleased to take her, there is no one to take me then.

Is there any thing that vexes you in the Foundling Hospital at present?—Yes; I cannot see my mother, and I have not my liberty.

You call Margaret Burns your mother?—Yes.

Do you think she was your real mother?—No; but she is the best mother I have. I was only three days old when she got me, and she had me fourteen years.

And was always kind to you?—Yes.

Were you sorry to part with her?—Indeed I was.

Have you ever seen her since?—No.

Would you be glad to her?—Yes.

Were you better fed with your nurse than in the Foundling?—I was better fed with my mother, but I could not expect as good here; but I get many things here I could not there; there is plenty for all the children considering the numbers.

Do you not get meat in the Foundling Hospital?—Yes.

Did you get that with your mother?—Yes, she was always sewing, and she got plenty for us.

What did she give you to eat?—She used to keep a pig herself, and she had a cabbage garden and potatoe garden as well.

Have you not a better bed in the Foundling Hospital than when with your mother?—No, nor so good.

Did your mother ever use to punish you?—No, it was very seldom I deserved it; if I deserved it she would beat me.

Are you ever punished in the Foundling?—No, unless I get a slap, and there are very few children that do not deserve it sometimes.

Do you get enough to eat in the Foundling?—Yes.

Are you not better dressed than when with your nurse?—No.

In what situation was your nurse?—She was a servant at first, and her husband died, and there was an old gentleman and his wife; the old woman was doating, she was so old, and he got a paralytic stroke, and she used to wash and mend for them; he used to pay her, and she used to get things out of the house, and he used to pay her, she used to get money from him, and she used to get milk and meat.

Appendix, No. 21.

Examination of Margaret Nelson; Monday, 13th December 1824.

Examination of Margaret Nelson,
13 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Fourteen next May.

Where were you nursed?—In the county Wicklow.

What is the name of the place?—Ballyfad.

Had your nurse any children of her own?—Yes.

How many?—Five.

Did she treat you as well as she treated them?—Yes; I went to a ladies school and a schoolmaster.

Did her own children go with you?—One of them.

How came only you to go?—The rest went to another school.

What sort of a school did the others go to?—To a Roman master.

Was she a Roman-catholic herself?—Yes.

How came she to send one child with you?—I do not know.

Was it a Foundling child?—Yes.

Her own children went to a Roman-catholic school?—Yes.

How long had you been in that school before you came into the Foundling Hospital?—I went four summers to it.

Which school did you learn fastest at, in the school at Ballyfad, or in the Foundling Hospital?—In the school at Ballyfad, I learnt to read and write there.

What makes you think you learnt the fastest there?—Because I had more books to instruct me.

Did the master take more pains with you?—Yes.

Do

Do you think if you had continued in the school at Ballyfad you would have been forwarder in reading and writing than you are now?—Yes.

And in working?—Yes; the ladies school I went to learnt me to work.

At your needle?—Yes.

Have you not learnt it at the Foundling Hospital too?—Yes.

Which school do you like best to be at?—At Ballyfad.

How many hours a day were you in the school at Ballyfad?—From nine till six.

Were you out any part of that time?—An hour.

And all the rest of the time in school?—Yes.

Who taught you your catechism?—The master of the day school and Sunday school.

Could you say it well before you left the school?—Yes.

Can you say it now?—Yes.

Were you ever taken to chapel before you went to the Foundling?—No.

Never?—No.

Are you quite sure?—Yes.

Were you ever taught the Roman-catholic catechism?—No.

Did ever any body talk to you about the Roman-catholic catechism, and tell you which was the best?—The nurse would sometimes say to me that the Roman-catholic religion was the best, but told me to go which way I pleased.

Did they always make you go to church?—Yes, every Sunday.

Have you had much talk about the Roman-catholic religion since you have been in the hospital with the other girls?—No.

Do not you talk of it to one another?—No; the minister said he would come down for me to take me out apprentice.

What minister?—Mr. Benson.

As a servant to live with him?—Yes.

How long is it since you have seen your mother?—Last April.

Did she come to see you?—She came, but would not be let.

Would you be glad to see her again?—Yes.

Should you like to go to her again?—Yes, I should.

What makes you think your nurse came to see you?—She sent in word to me.

What makes you cry at present; is it the recollection of your nurse?—Yes.

And a wish to see her again?—Yes.

How long were you with your nurse?—Thirteen years.

Do you ever expect to see her again?—Yes.

How do you expect to see her?—When I have served my apprenticeship I will go and see her, she bade me go to her when I had served my apprenticeship.

Appendix, No. 22.

Examination of Mary Everett; Monday, 13th December 1824.

WHERE were you nursed?—In the county Kildare.

What was the name of the place?—Leixlip.

Had your nurse any children of her own?—Yes.

How many?—Nine.

Were they older than you?—Older, all but one; the youngest of them was twelve years old.

Was she as kind to you as to her own children?—Yes.

She made no difference?—No.

What sort of food did she use to give you; did she feed you well?—Yes, she did.

Did she feed you as well as her own children?—Yes; every bit.

Did she give you as good clothes?—Yes; I had plenty of clothes.

Was she a Protestant or a Roman-catholic?—She was a Roman.

What was her husband?—A Roman.

Did they use to take you to church or to chapel?—I used to go to church,

Were you ever at chapel?—I never was at chapel that I can recollect myself.

Who went with you to church?—I had a little sister and brother that were out of the same house, the Foundling Hospital.

Were they as well taken care of there as you were?—Every bit.

What school did you go to?—The Protestant.

Was it at Leixlip?—Yes.

Who was it taught by?—Mr. Ottoway kept the school.

Were you fond of your nurse?—Yes, I was.

Did she teach you to say your prayers?—Yes; night and morning.

What prayers did she teach you?—The Protestant prayers, the Lord's Prayer, and every thing.

To whom whom did you say your catechism?—To my schoolmaster.

Did you ever say it to your mother?—Yes.

Did your father ever hear you say it?—Yes, he did.

Did they ever talk to you about the Roman-catholic religion?—No.

Are you sure of that?—Yes.

Did they never try to persuade you to be a Roman-catholic?—No.

Did they ever talk to you about it at all?—No, never.

Examination of Mary Everett,
13 Dec. 1824.

Have you been in the infirmary since you came to the Foundling Hospital?—Yes, once.
What was the matter with you?—I had sore eyes.
How long were they sore?—About a month.
Are they quite well now?—Yes.
Could you read when you came into the Foundling Hospital?—Yes, and write.
Could you do any figures?—No.
Where did you learn fastest; at the school at Leixlip, or in the Foundling?—In the Foundling Hospital.
Do you think if you had staid there you would have been better able to read and write than now?—Yes.
Did you learn to work there?—Yes; I could write better when I came in than I can now.
How do you account for that?—I had to be in the dormitories.
Are you a servant?—Yes.
Did any body ever try to persuade you to be a Roman-catholic?—No.
Where had you the best food, before you came into the hospital or since?—When I was at home.
Had you a better bed at home?—Yes.
Were you happy at home?—I was.
Would you like to go home again?—Yes.
Do you think it would be better for you?—Yes.
What makes you think so?—I would like to go home to my mother again.
Do you think you would do better in life?—Yes, I would.
What makes you think that?—I should have my liberty better than I now have.
Are you too much confined now?—Yes.
Does it make you ill, or make you unhappy; have you your health as good as when you were with your mother?—Yes.
What do you wish to be when you go from the hospital—a servant, or what?—A servant.
Do you think if you were with your mother she could get a service for you?—Yes.
Do you think she would not persuade you to be a Roman-catholic?—No, she would not.

Appendix, No. 23.

Examination of Jane Maxwell; Monday, 13th December 1824.

Examination of Jane Maxwell,
13 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—I believe going on for fifteen.
How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Going on two years.
Who was your nurse in the country?—Rose Kean.
Where?—At Ballymore Eustace.
At what county?—Dublin.
Was she a Protestant?—No.
Did she treat you well?—Yes.
Did you attend a day school when you were with her?—Yes, always.
Whose school?—Mr. Bourke, the clerk of the parish.
Did you learn much at the school?—Yes.
Could you read when you left it?—Yes.
Could you write?—No.
Did you know any thing of figures?—No.
Could you read the Testament before you left it?—Yes.
Could you say your catechism?—Yes.
Have you learnt much more since you have been at the Foundling Hospital than you did when you came into it?—Yes, I have.
Can you read better now than you could when you came in?—Yes.
Where did you learn fastest, at the day school or in the Foundling Hospital?—In the day school.
Were there many children at it?—Yes.
What were they; Roman-catholics or Protestants?—Protestants.
Did they call you any names?—Yes, they called me a parisheen.
Was that the only one?—Yes.
Did that vex you?—Yes.
Where was that?—As we were coming home.
The other children did not call you that or any other name?—No.
Were you happy with your nurse?—Yes.
Did you cry when you left her?—Yes.
How long were you crying before you got reconciled to the place?—Three days.
Are you happy in the Foundling Hospital now?—No.
Would you rather go back to your nurse?—Yes.
Would you like to be apprenticed?—Yes.
Would you rather go back to your nurse than be apprenticed?—Yes.
If you went back would you have any chance of getting an apprenticeship?—I do not know.
Would your nurse be glad to get you again?—She would.
Had she any children of her own?—Yes.
Did she use you as well as them?—Yes.

Examination of Jane Maxwell,
13 Dec. 1824.

Did she feed you as well as you are fed in the Foundling?—Yes.
Was your bed better or worse than in the Foundling?—Better.
What rank of life was she in?—A mantua-maker.
Did she ever talk to you about your religion?—Yes.
What did she say to you about it?—She always told me to stick to the religion I was always.
Do you not think that was a little odd of her?—No.
Did she not think it a wrong religion, the Protestant religion?—I do not know; she did not say so to me.
Do you think the Roman-catholic religion a wrong one?—Yes.
Did you think it so when you lived with her?—Yes.
Would not you wish to be a Protestant?—Yes.
Did you ever try to persuade her to be a Protestant?—No.
Did the priest ever talk to you about religion?—No.
Did he never come into the house?—No.
Did she ever go to the priest?—Yes.
Did she not go to attend mass?—Yes.
Did she ever take you?—Yes; only one Sunday that there was no prayers in the church; the clerk of our church said I might go, as the minister was not there.
How long was that before you left your nurse?—A year.
Did you attend the Protestant church regularly?—Yes.
Was it often there were no prayers in the Protestant Church?—Sometimes Mr. Baker would not be at home.
Were there many Protestants in the parish?—Yes.
What did the Protestants do when Mr. Baker was not there?—They used to go to other churches.
Were there other churches near them?—Yes.
Did Mr. Baker keep a curate?—Yes.
Where was the curate when Mr. Baker was not at home?—I do not know.
Who taught you the catechism?—My master and my brother.
Did you ever say your catechism in the church?—Yes.
Did you ever go to the Sunday school?—Yes.
Did Mr. Baker teach you your catechism, or examine you upon it?—Yes; he used to keep us in church till four o'clock, and hear us our catechism.
Were there many Protestant children?—Yes.
Were they very good friends with you?—Yes.
Did any Roman-catholics talk with you about your religion?—No; but when we were coming home from church they used to bawl after us, and say we were coming from church.
Did they say there was any harm in it?—No.
Did you mind that?—I did not mind what they were saying.
Did the Protestant children bawl at them when they were coming from chapel?—No.

Appendix, No. 24.

Examination of Eliza Clayton; Monday, 13th December 1824.

Examination of Eliza Clayton,
13 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—I do not know.
How old do you think you are?—I do not know.
[The witness appeared to be about thirteen.]
How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Since the 9th of April.
Have you had sore eyes since you have been in the hospital?—Yes.
How long were you in the infirmary?—I was in it three times.
With sore eyes every time?—Twice with sore eyes, and once with a sore throat.
How long altogether were you there?—I do not know.
A fortnight each time?—Yes, and more.
What school have you been at?—A Protestant school at Castle Pollard.
Was it an every day school, or only a Sunday school?—I was in an every day school and a Sunday school.
Could you read and write before you came to the Foundling?—Yes.
Could you do sums?—I was beginning sums.
At what school did you learn fastest at; the Foundling Hospital school, or Castle Pollard?—In Castle Pollard school.
Can you read much better now than when you came into the Foundling?—I do not know.
Can you read much better?—I do not know whether I can or not, but I could read the Bible before I came in here.
Can you read it now?—I think I can.
Could you say your catechism before you came into the Foundling?—Yes.
Does Mr. Murray hear you say it?—Yes, when I came in he heard me.
What was your nurse's name?—Anne Coffey.
Had she any children of her own?—Only one.
Was there any other Foundling girl but her?—Yes, two more.
Are they in the Foundling Hospital now?—Yes.
Did she treat you well?—Yes.
Was she a Roman-catholic or a Protestant?—A Protestant.

Examination of Eliza Clayton,
13 Dec. 1824.

Was her husband a Protestant?—Yes.
Used you to dine at the same table with her?—Yes.
Did she give you as good food as she gave her own child?—Yes.
And as good clothes?—Yes.
Were you very fond of her?—Yes.
Were you very sorry to come away from her?—Yes.
Used you to go to church every Sunday?—Yes, except when I was sick, before I came here; I was sick of a fever and could not go.
Did she teach you to say your prayers?—Yes.
How many prayers?—The creed and the Lord's prayer, and some of the commandments.
Did any body ever try to persuade you to be a Roman-catholic?—Nobody.
Were the other boys and girls at the school you were at good natured to you, or did they call you names?—No, none of them called me names; they would not be allowed.
When you were out of school did they ever call you names?—No.
Were they Protestant children, or Roman-catholic children?—Some of them were Protestants, and some Roman-catholics.
Who is your best friend in the Foundling Hospital?—Mary Drake, and Esther Wade.
Where did you know them first?—They lived in the house with me.
Do you call them your sisters?—Yes.
Now?—Yes.
Should you like to go to your nurse again?—Yes.
Should you like to leave your sisters behind you, and go to your nurse by yourself?—No, I would not.
Which would you rather do—stay in the Foundling with your sisters, or go to your nurse without them?—I could go to my nurse, and get a man to come in for my sisters.
Do any of the girls in the hospital ever talk to you about the Roman-catholic religion?—Yes.
What do they say of it to you?—They ask me, would I rather be a Roman-catholic or Protestant; and I said, what my father and mother were I would be.
What did they say they would be?—They said they would rather be Romans as their father and mother were.
Are there many girls in the school that would rather be Roman-catholics?—Yes.
Would you?—No.
What makes you think there are many that would rather be Roman-catholics?—I hear them speaking of it.
Do they ever acknowledge they would rather be Roman-catholics to Mr. Murray, or Mistress Ross, or Mistress Innes?—No, they do not let him know at all that they be talking of the like.
Do they ever argue with each other what is the best religion?—Yes, sometimes.
What do they say in favour of the Roman-catholic religion?—They do say which of them is the best religion; they say that they think that the Roman-catholic is the best religion; and I do say that I think the Protestant religion is the best.
Do you give your reasons on both sides?—Yes.
What reason do they give for the Roman-catholic religion?—I do not know what they say about it.
Do they give any reasons for it?—No; I do not know what reason they give.
Do they ever say it is the oldest religion?—Yes, they said it was the oldest religion.
Have they any other arguments in its favour?—I said I would not like to go there for to worship idols.
Where did you learn that?—I used to hear them talk of it.
Do the others own that they worship idols?—No, they do not do that at all.
Were you happiest with your nurse, or in the Foundling Hospital?—I think with my mother.
Would you be very glad to go back to her?—Yes.
Would she be very glad to see you?—Indeed she would.
Did you cry much when you left her?—Yes.
When did you stop crying after you came into the hospital?—I used to be crying every day.
For how long?—For about two months.
Were you as well fed at home as at the Foundling?—Yes.
And had as good a bed?—Yes.

Appendix, No. 25.

Examination of Bridget Haywood; Monday, 13th December 1824.

Examination of
Bridget Haywood,
13 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Going on fifteen.
How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Going on two years.
Could you read before you came into the hospital?—Yes, I could.
As well as you can now?—No.
Could you write?—No, I could not.
Where were you at school before you came to the hospital?—A place called Clonmore.
What county was it in?—In the county of Carlow, I believe.
Were you with the same nurse all the time?—Yes, I was.
Was your nurse kind to you?—Yes, as kind as to her own children.

How

Examination of Bridget Haywood,
13 Dec. 1824.

How many of her own children had she?—Three.

Were they older than you?—Yes, they were.

Was she a Protestant or Roman-catholic?—A Protestant.

Had she a husband living?—He was dead six years before I was taken in.

Did she give you good food?—Yes, as good as she made for her own children.

And as good as she made for herself?—Yes.

Did she give you the same clothing as her own children?—Yes.

Were her own children as kind to you as to one another?—They were.

Were you as kind to them as they were to one another?—Yes.

Would you be glad to see them again?—Yes, I would be very much delighted to see them again.

How did your mother get her livelihood?—She was a mantua-maker, she used to make clothes.

Have you been as happy since you came into the Foundling Hospital as you were before?

—I find myself not so happy as I was with her.

Were you sorry to lose your nurse?—Yes.

Was she sorry to part with you?—Yes, as sorry as if I was her own child.

Have you heard of her since?—I have heard from her twice since.

Used you to go to church on Sunday?—Yes, every Sunday, and to an evening school after I came home from prayers.

Did your nurse hear you say your catechism?—Yes.

Did she hear you say your prayers?—Yes, every night and morning continually.

Have you been in the infirmary since you came into the hospital?—Yes, for sore eyes.

How long?—I believe two months.

Which of the girls in the hospital are you fondest of?—I know a couple of girls in it that went to the school in the country with me.

Have they been the best friends to you ever since?—Yes.

Did any body, before you came to the hospital, try to persuade you to become a Roman-catholic?—Yes; a woman that lived next door to me.

What kind of woman was it?—She had a girl out of this house, and I used to ask her to go to prayers with me, and she used to say, I was going to hear the devil preach.

Where did she take the girl to she had with her?—She seldom took her any where.

What is her name?—Mary Percival; she is now in the house.

How long did she stay with that nurse?—She stayed there till she was taken in.

How old is she?—Thirteen.

How long has she been in the hospital?—About a year.

Is she most inclined to the Roman-catholic religion now?—I could not tell that.

Did this nurse take Mary Percival to chapel ever?—No, not to my knowledge.

Did she often tell you you were going to hear the devil preach?—No, only once.

Never more than once?—No.

Do you often hear the girls in the Foundling Hospital talking about religion when they are not saying their lessons?—No.

Do you ever hear those who have come in from the Roman-catholic nurses expressing dislike to the Protestant religion?—Yes, those who would be different to us, they would be talking to us because we became Protestant children.

Does that happen to you when you come into the hospital?—Yes, it happened to me to-day, when we were coming here.

What happened to you?—They were talking to us.

Who were they?—I do not know; they were Roman-catholic children.

Do you think they will change their opinions?—Yes, I think they will.

Do you think they will conceal their opinions?—They may conceal it some of them.

Do you think there are any girls that put on the appearance of Protestants to please their teachers, but are Catholics in their hearts?—I have heard them say, that when they leave this institution, they will not be Protestants again.

Have you heard many say that?—No, only those who have been ruled at all before—that they would never be their friends, whether it be in this house or no—that they would always state what they were in that house; some of the girls, that were turned from Roman-catholics, say, they would never turn from the religion they would be in this house; they would never turn when they went into the country.

Does that arise from their being fairly convinced that the Protestant religion is the best?—Yes.

Do you think there are many Roman-catholic girls, who think the Roman-catholic religion the best?—I do not know.

Are they all in general very fond of their nurses?—Yes.

Do you know any who are not fond of their nurses?—No.

Do you ever hear any of them complaining that their nurses have not treated them well?—No.

Do you know that any of their nurses do treat them ill?—No; that one that said I was going to hear the devil, did not do by the child she had to nurse as she did by her own children.

Did she treat Mary Percival well?—Yes; but she did not give her the same clothing she gave her own children.

Do you think in general the nurses give the Foundlings as good clothing as to their own children?—Some of them may and some may not, but that woman did not; she used to let

Examination of
Bridget Haywood,
13 Dec. 1824.

Let her go to the school very seldom, the schoolmaster used to come to the house after her and send for her.

Was he a Protestant?—Yes.

Who was the clergyman?—Mr. Dawson.

Did he look after Mary Percival?—Yes; but she would not let her go, and he sent a letter to this house, and she was taken in.

Would you be very glad to be apprenticed and leave the Foundling Hospital?—Yes, if I could continue to go to church and hear prayers.

Would you rather go back to nurse or be apprenticed?—I would rather be with my nurse, if she would let me stay to my religion.

Do you think you could have got an apprenticeship in the country, if you had not come to the hospital?—Yes; the schoolmaster was saying he would take me as an apprentice.

Do you think it has been of much service to you taking you into the hospital?—Yes.

In what way?—In my knowledge; I did not know half as much.

Was it a good day school you went to in the country?—Yes.

How came it that you learnt more in the Foundling Hospital than in that day school?—I was taught more in this school in the Foundling Hospital than in the country.

Were there many children attending this school in the country?—Yes.

Roman-catholics as well as Protestants?—Yes.

Appendix, No. 26.

Examination of Rebecca Palmer; Monday, 13th December 1824.

Examination of Rebecca Palmer,
13 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Thirteen.

How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Going on a year.

Have you been in the infirmary since you went there?—Yes, once.

With sore eyes?—Yes.

How long did that last?—For a month.

Have you got quite well?—Yes.

Did you go to school before you came into the Foundling?—Yes.

Where?—In the country.

What is the name of the place?—Kilcullen.

Was it a large school?—Yes.

An every day school?—Yes.

Did you go to school on the Sunday?—Yes.

Could you read and write before you came to the Foundling?—I could read—I could not write.

Can you write now?—No.

Are you much improved in reading since you came into the school?—No.

Which school did you learn fastest at?—The school at Kilcullen.

Should you have been forwarder if you had stayed there than you are now?—Yes.

Did they teach you arithmetic at Kilcullen?—Yes.

Do you learn arithmetic now?—Yes.

Was your nurse a Roman-catholic or Protestant?—A Protestant.

Had she any children of her own?—Yes, two.

Had she a husband alive?—Yes.

Was he a Protestant too?—Yes.

Did they treat you as well as their own children?—Yes.

Did they give you as good food?—Yes.

As good food as they had themselves?—Yes.

Did they give you good clothes?—Yes.

And a good bed to sleep on?—Yes.

Were her own children kind to you?—Yes.

Did they take you to church?—Yes.

And teach you to say your prayers?—Yes.

Every night?—Yes, and every morning.

Were you very sorry to leave your nurse?—Yes.

Was she sorry to part with you?—Yes.

Did she cry?—Yes, she did.

Were you happiest at the Foundling Hospital, or with your nurse?—I would rather be with my nurse.

Which little girls are your friends in the hospital?—Susan Paul.

Where did you know her first; did you know her before you came into the hospital?—No.

Is there any little girl in the hospital that was at Kilcullen with you?—Yes.

Is she a friend of yours?—Yes.

Did any body ever endeavour to make you a Roman-catholic before you came into the hospital?—No.

Have any of the girls talked to you about it since?—No.

Appendix, No. 27.

Examination of Mary Harison; Monday, 13th December 1824.Examination of Mary Harison,
13 Dec. 1824.

WHERE were you nursed?—In the county Wexford.

Was your nurse a Protestant or a Roman-catholic?—A Roman-catholic.

Had your nurse a husband living?—Yes.

Had they any children of their own?—Yes.

Older than you, or younger?—Older and younger.

Were they as kind to you as to their own children?—I was reared the same as them.

Had you the same food to eat?—Yes.

And as good clothes?—Yes, the same as them.

Did your father and mother give you as good food as they had to eat themselves?—Yes.

How did your father get his living?—He was a labourer.

Did you go to school before you came into the Foundling?—Yes.

How long have you been in the Foundling?—Going on two years.

Who paid for your schooling?—My nurse.

How long were you at school before you came into the Foundling?—Going on a year.

At what school did you learn fastest; at the day school, or in the Foundling?—At the day school.

What school was the day school; who was it taught by?—By the schoolmaster.

What was his name?—Mr. Davitt.

Were there a great many children at it?—Yes.

Were they Protestant children principally, or Roman-catholics?—The principal part were Roman-catholics.

Did you read the Testament then?—Yes.

Could you read it yourself?—Yes.

Did the clergyman come and teach the catechism?—Yes, at the Sunday-school.

Did you learn the catechism on week days at the school?—No, not at the school, but at home at night.

Was it a Roman-catholic master?—Yes.

Did he teach the catechism to the Roman-catholic children?—Yes; but I used to learn my own catechism.

Who used to teach you your own catechism?—Myself used to learn it, and sometimes my nurse's children.

Did your nurse hear you say the catechism?—Yes, and my father too.

Was he a Protestant?—No, a Roman-catholic; but he used to hear me my catechism.

What catechism did her own children learn?—The Roman-catholic catechism.

Did your father and mother ever talk to you about the Roman-catholic religion?—No; I used to go to church every Sunday it was fine.

Who used you to go to school with?—With the rest of the children I used to go.

Did your brother and sister ever talk to you about the Roman-catholic religion?—No.

Used any body to talk to you?—Yes, some of the people about the place.

What people?—They used to ask me what would I rather be.

What used you to say?—I said, I would rather be a Protestant.

Did many people ask you that?—Very seldom.

Who used to ask it?—people that I would meet when I was going to church.

Were they Protestants or Roman-catholics that used to ask you?—I would not know them.

Has any body ever talked to you about the Roman-catholic religion, since you have been in the Foundling, and has any body tried to persuade you to be a Roman-catholic?—No, they do not.

Have none of the girls talked to you about it?—Some of them used to ask me.

Are some of the girls in the Foundling Hospital more fond of the Roman-catholic religion than the Protestant?—Yes, some of them.

What makes you think so?—They are asking me questions.

What do they ask you?—Whether I would be a Roman-catholic.

What did they say themselves?—That they would rather be Romans.

Do you think that is the case with many of them?—No, not many; only the drafts that came in this year.

Have they come in from Roman-catholic nurses, many of them?—Yes.

Do you think they like the Roman-catholic religion the best?—I do not know.

Were you happier before you came into the Foundling Hospital than you have been since?—I would rather be with my nurse.

Were you very sorry to leave your nurse?—Yes.

Was she sorry to part with you?—She was.

Have you learnt to work?—Yes.

Could you work at all before you came to the Foundling?—Yes; I was taught to sew and spin, and to knit.

Did you help your mother a little?—Yes.

Have you had any thing the matter with your eyes?—Yes; I have twice since I have come in.

How long was it between the time they were first sore and the second?—Only a week.

Were you in the infirmary all the time?—Yes, I was in the infirmary.

Did you go to school when your eyes were sore?—No.

Of whom did you catch it?—I do not know.

Examination of Mary Harison,
13 Dec. 1824.

How soon after you came to the hospital did your eyes get sore?—In two or three days.
You made them sore by crying perhaps?—Yes.
How long did you cry after you came into the hospital?—A good while; I was sorry when I came in first, and I am sorry still; I would rather be with my nurse.
What makes you uncomfortable in the Foundling Hospital?—I do not know.
Is not every body very kind to you?—Yes.
Have you any friends there?—Yes.
Which of the girls are your best friends?—Mary Mackay.
Where did you first know her, in the country?—I did not know her in the country.
Where did you first see her?—In the Foundling Hospital.
Had you any sister at nurse with you?—Yes, Anne Sardin.
Where is she now?—In the Foundling.
Are you and she good friends?—Yes.
What time of the day do you play in the Foundling Hospital?—From ten to eleven, if the day be wet we get half an hour in the morning, and from four to five in the evening.
Do you ever go out and take a walk?—Yes, in the summer.
Outside the walls?—Yes, in the fields.
Do you ever go out and walk two by two together?—No, only in the fields.
You run about in the fields and play?—Yes.
Are you in doors all the day, except the time you have named?—Yes.

Appendix, No. 28.

Examination of Bridget Gale; Monday, 13th December 1824.

Examination of Bridget Gale,
13 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Fourteen next Christmas.
How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Going on two years.
Have you had sore eyes since you came there?—No.
Could you read before you came into the hospital?—Yes.
Could you write?—No.
Could you say the Church catechism?—Yes.
Where did you learn it?—At home.
Did you go to school before you came into the Foundling?—Yes, every day; and to the Sunday school.
Where were you at nurse?—In the county of Wicklow.
What was the name of the place?—The parish of Kilconnel.
Was there a large school where you went?—Yes.
How many girls and boys were there?—My nurse paid for my schooling; I do not know how many girls and boys were at it.
How much did your nurse pay?—I think fifteen pence a quarter.
Was it a school where girls were only, or girls and boys?—Boys and girls.
Who was the schoolmaster?—Mr. Parsley.
Was the catechism taught in the school?—Yes, every evening.
By whom?—The schoolmaster.
Were there any Roman-catholic children there?—Yes.
Did they learn that catechism too?—No.
Did they go away?—Yes, they used to go out.
Was the Testament read in the school every day?—Yes, and the Bible.
Who taught in the Sunday school?—The gentlemen and ladies.
Who used you to say your catechism to?—To Mr. Taylor, the minister, and the schoolmaster.
Where did you learn fastest at; the school you were at in the country, or at the Foundling Hospital?—I think I learnt the most at home.
Were you taught to work before you came into the Foundling?—No.
Have you learnt since?—Yes.
Needle-work?—Yes.
Was your nurse kind to you?—She was.
Were you very fond of her?—I was.
Had she any other children but you?—Yes; she had two more Foundlings, and one out-apprentice.
Had she any children of her own?—Yes, five.
Used she to treat you as well as the others?—Yes.
Quite without any difference?—Not a bit.
Used you to dine at the same table with her?—Yes.
And of the same food?—Yes.
Which was the best food, that you had with her, or in the Foundling Hospital?—I do not know; I got very good at both.
Had you as good a bed to sleep on with your nurse as now?—Yes; she used me very well while she had me.
Where were you happiest; before you came to the Foundling, or since?—I think I was the happiest at home; I would rather be at home.
Were your brothers and sisters kind to you?—They were.
Was your nurse a Roman-catholic or a Protestant?—A Protestant.
What was her husband?—A hatter.

Used he to make hats, or sell them?—He used to make them and sell them.
 Did he go to church every Sunday?—Yes.
 Was your nurse's husband a Protestant?—Yes; and he did belong to it.
 Did the children at the same school use you kindly, or did they call you names?—One little girl and me fell out one day, and she called me a parisheen.
 Did that vex you?—Yes, it did.
 Was that the only time?—Yes; but it was not any of my nurse's children.
 What little girls do you like best in the hospital?—Two or three I knew in the country.
 Are you in the same class with any of them?—I was with one of them for a while.

Examination of Bridget Gale,
 13 Dec. 1824.

Appendix, No. 29.

Examination of Mary Hogarty; Saturday, 18th December 1824.

HOW old are you?—Going sixteen.
 How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Going on three years.
 Did you come in the middle of the year 1822?—Yes.
 Where were you nursed?—In the parish of Blessington, in the county of Dublin.
 With a Roman-catholic or Protestant nurse?—A Roman-catholic.
 Were you with her all the time?—Yes.
 How old were you when you came into the hospital?—Going thirteen.
 Whilst you were out with your nurse, did you attend at church or chapel?—The church sometimes, and chapel sometimes.
 Did you go to school?—Yes.
 What sort of a school was it?—A Roman-catholic school, and I went to a Sunday school.
 Was it a Protestant Sunday school?—Yes.
 What catechism did you learn?—The Roman-catholic catechism and the Protestant catechism too.
 You learnt them both?—Yes.
 Your mother used to take you to chapel?—Yes, sometimes.
 When you went to church who took you there?—She used to come to the door.
 How many years did she use to take you to the church door; how came she to take you to both?—I could not tell, it was about two or three years.
 Did you ever receive the sacrament in the chapel?—No.
 Were you ever confirmed?—No.
 Did she ever teach you to say your prayers?—Yes.
 The Lord's Prayer?—Yes.
 What were the last words of it, after "Deliver us from evil," what came next?—That was all.
 Are you certain?—Yes.
 What was her husband?—A Roman-catholic.
 How many children had they?—Six.
 Were they all bred up Roman-catholics?—Yes.
 Had you any other Foundling there?—No.
 How did they treat you?—The same as their own children.
 Did they ever laugh at you for going to church?—No.
 Did they ever ask you what you heard there?—I do not remember it.
 Since you have been at the hospital, what have you been learning?—The Protestant catechism, and sometimes the Bible.
 Did you ever read the Bible or Testament when you were at nurse?—Yes, the Testament.
 Had you one of your own?—Yes.
 Where did you get it from?—The Sunday school.
 Did they let you read it in the house?—Yes.
 Did you ever read it to them?—Yes.
 Did they listen to it?—Yes.
 The whole of the family?—Yes.
 Did they ever read it themselves?—No.
 Did the priest ever know you had it?—I do not know.
 Did the priest ever say any thing to you?—No.
 Did he ever speak to you while you were there?—No.
 Did the children of the parish, when you went to the Sunday school, reproach you for being a Foundling?—No.
 Did they ever call you any hard names?—One, when I was going to church, said I was going to the devil.
 Who said that?—A neighbour.
 A Protestant or Roman-catholic neighbour?—A Roman-catholic.
 Do you like being in the hospital better than with your father and mother?—With my father and mother.
 Should you like to go there now?—Yes.
 Which should you be, a Roman-catholic or Protestant?—Indeed I do not know.
 Which do you think is best?—I think the Protestant.
 Have you not learnt enough in the hospital to make you a Protestant; if you were to go out now, which would you be?—A Protestant, I think.

Examination of Mary Hogarty,
 18 Dec. 1824.

Examination of Mary Gale,
 18 Dec. 1824.

Examination of Mary Hogarty,
18 Dec. 1824.

Why do you think that?—Because I think it is the best religion.
What makes you think that the Protestant religion is the best?—Because they are more attentive to the Bible and every good thing.
If you were to go to your father and mother, should you go to chapel?—No, to church.
Could you read before you came to the hospital?—Yes.
Could you write?—Yes.
Have you learnt to write since you have been in the hospital?—Yes.
Can you write pretty well?—Yes.
Are you waiting for an apprenticeship?—Yes.
Do you think you learnt fastest in the hospital, or at the school?—In the school.
Are there any girls in the Hospital you are particularly intimate with?—Yes.
Who are they?—Anne Croaker.
How came you friends with her particularly?—I took up with her when I came into the house.
You did not know her before?—No.
Have you any girl in the hospital you knew in the country?—Yes.
Are you very thick with her?—Yes, she is my own namesake, Mary Hogarty.
Was she in the country?—She lived two miles from me.
Is she a Foundling too?—Yes.
Did you not think it rather strange, when you were in the country, that you should go sometimes to the Roman-catholic chapel, and sometimes to the church?—Yes.
What did you think of it; did you think they were both good religions?—Yes.
Do you not know that your mother told you she was to take you to church; that you were to be brought up a Protestant?—Yes.
She always brought you up here?—Yes.
Did you not know your mother was doing wrong to take you to chapel?—Yes.
Did you cry when you left her?—Yes.
Have you ever seen or heard of her since?—No.
Or your brothers or sisters?—No.
Were they older or younger?—Both.
Did you love them?—Yes.
Were you clothed well?—Yes, as well as her own.
Have you had any complaint in your eyes?—No.
Have you been ill in the infirmary?—Yes, I was sick once.
What was the matter with you?—I had a pain in my stomach.

Appendix, No. 30.

Examination of Anne Calvert; Saturday, 18th December 1824.

Examination of Anne Calvert,
18 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Going on sixteen.
How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Going on five years; I was out in the country sickly.
Did you go to the same nurse you had been at before?—No, I went to a Protestant.
Was the first nurse you went to a Roman-catholic?—Yes.
You staid with her till you were nine years old?—Yes.
Did you go to school while you were with her?—Yes.
What school?—A Protestant school.
Did you ever go to chapel?—Yes, with my first nurse I did.
Did she take you to chapel?—Yes; one year all the nurses got papers, and I went to church; that year they were to send us to church, and I went to church that year.
And ever after that?—Yes; I was one year with my first nurse that I went to church.
Have you ever taken the sacrament?—No, never with the Romans; I never did.
Did they ever talk to you about it?—No, I was but little.
How did your nurse use you?—She used me the same as her own children.
Did they use you as well as if you had been their own sister?—Yes.
Were you well clothed?—Yes.
Did you love your nurse?—Yes, I did.
Were you very sorry when you came away from her?—I was.
Did you love your brothers and sisters?—Yes, all of them in the house with me.
Should you like to go to them now?—Yes, to my last nurse; my first nurse is dead.
Did she use you well?—Yes, the same as her own children.
Did you go to church then?—Yes.
Was she married?—Yes; but her husband was dead before I went out to her.
Did you learn to read when you were with her?—Yes.
Do you learn to read now?—I am working in the preparatory.
What do they call you?—I am cook.
Do you go to school much now?—I am heard lessons on Thursday.
What do you read?—The Testament, the creation book, and the catechisms.
Where were you in the country?—In the county Wicklow.
What part of the county?—I was at Clonmore.
Near what market town?—Nighest town to that was where Mr. Broughey was the minister; I was only there one year.
Had you any teaching there?—Yes, I went to the Sunday school there, and every day school.

Were

Were you with a Protestant that year?—Yes.

If you were to go back now, would you be a Roman-catholic or Protestant?—I would be a Protestant.

Can you give any reason for that?—Because I have been longest going to that religion.

Have you any other reason for preferring to be a Protestant rather than a Roman-catholic?—I think it is the best.

Have you any particular friend in the school you are very intimate with, more than the rest?—Girls I knew in the country.

There were other girls in your neighbourhood?—Yes, there were.

When you were with your first nurse, or the second?—The second.

You are more intimate with those girls than the rest?—Yes, I knew them in the country.

Do you know whether there are any girls in the hospital that are Romans?—No, I never see any thing of it.

How many of you are in the preparatory school?—Twenty-one of us, who are called monitors; but I am a working girl, I am always at work.

Examination of Anne Calvert,
18 Dec. 1824.

Appendix, No. 31.

Examination of Mary Rider; Saturday, 18th December 1824.

HOW old are you?—Going on sixteen.

How long have you been in the Foundling?—Going on five years.

You were about nine when you came into the hospital?—I do not know.

Where were you at nurse?—In the parish of Hollywood.

What county is that in?—It is in the county Wicklow.

What was the nearest town to it?—Donard.

Was the nurse a Protestant or Roman-catholic?—A Protestant.

Were you with the same nurse all the while?—No.

Were you shifted?—Yes.

What was the first?—Margaret Ellis.

Did she die?—No.

How came you to be changed?—I was taken in in a draft and fell sick, and got sore eyes, and I was kept in the hospital.

Were you sent back to the same place?—No.

How long ago is it since you were taken in the first time?—Going on five years.

How long did you stay in before you went out again?—Seven weeks.

How long did you stay out the second time?—A year.

You have been in the last time for four years?—Yes.

How did your mother use you?—Very well.

Clothed and well fed?—Yes.

Had you any brother?—Yes.

Did they ever call you any names?—No.

Did you learn to read or write when you were there?—Yes.

Who did you go to?—To the clerk of the parish, William Gilltrop.

Did you learn to read and write?—Yes.

You have been learning to read and write since you have been in the hospital?—Yes; but not for the last two years, I have been up in the preparatory school, working and washing for them.

Do you never go to school?—Yes, we are heard by the minister's wife in the hospital.

Who is that?—Mr. Aickins's wife.

How long has he been there?—Only a few months.

Who heard you before?—The ladies used to come in once of a Saturday.

Can you read pretty well now?—Yes.

Would you like best to be with your nurse in the country?—Yes.

Why—can you give any reason—were you better fed there than in the hospital?—No; I get very good victuals now.

Had you a better bed?—No, I have a very good bed.

Had you better clothes?—No, I had very good clothes, as good as I could wish for.

Had you any companions you liked?—Yes.

What friends had you there you liked better than those in the hospital; have you any girl in the Foundling you are more friendly with than others?—Yes.

Who is she?—Catherine Pilsworth.

How came you and she to be great friends?—She lived hard by me when I was out with my first nurse.

Did she go to school with you?—Yes.

Should you like to go back again to your nurse?—Yes.

Would you rather go back than stay and be apprenticed?—Yes.

Examination of Mary Rider,
18 Dec. 1824.

Appendix, No. 32.

Examination of Ann Bryan; Saturday, 18th December 1824.

Examination of Ann Bryan,
18 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Going on seventeen.
How long have you been in the hospital?—Going on six years.
You were about eleven years old when you came in?—I was going on twelve.
Where were you at nurse?—At Ferns.
With a Roman-catholic or Protestant nurse?—A Roman-catholic nurse.
Were you with the same nurse all the time?—I was part of the time with a Protestant nurse.
Which part?—The last part.
How long were you with the Protestant nurse?—A year and a quarter.
And with a Roman-catholic nurse from your childhood?—Yes.
Did they live in the same village?—Yes.
Which did you like best, the Protestant or Roman-catholic nurse?—The Protestant nurse.
Why?—I think, I should be brought up better.
Why were you changed from the one to the other; did the first die?—Yes.
Did she use you well?—Yes, as well as she could afford, she did; she used me the same as her own child.
Was that pretty well?—Yes.
Did she feed you pretty well?—Yes.
How did the Protestant nurse use you?—She used me very well.
Were you sorry to leave her?—Yes.
Did you learn to read or write before you came into the hospital?—I did not learn to read before I came into the hospital; I was only about a month sent to school.
Have you learnt to read since you left it?—Yes.
And learnt to write?—No, only a little.
How is that; do they not teach you to write?—I was sent up to the preparatory school and I did not be learnt to write there.
What were you sent there for?—To work.
To clean?—Yes.
Have you got a shaking hand?—No.
Nor any thing that prevents your writing?—No.
Do you go to any of the schools at all?—No; only on Thursday, I am heard to say my lesson.
What is the lesson then?—In the Testament, the creation book, the catechism, and hymns.
Is that when Mr. Murray examines you?—No; Mrs. Aickins.
Is that the lady who is here with you now?—No, she is at home.
How long have you been in the preparatory school; what are you?—Working maid.
How long have you been there?—Going on two years.
Do you learn nothing then?—No, only to read of a Thursday.
Till you went into the preparatory school, you were taught like the other girls?—Yes.
Does Mr. Murray ever ask you questions?—No, not since I came to the preparatory school.
Did he before?—Yes.
Is it the custom, when a girl goes into the preparatory school, she is to stay there all the time?—No.
Which do you like best, being with your nurse, or in the hospital?—I would rather go back to my Protestant nurse.
How many children had she?—She had three of her own, and another nurse child.
A Foundling?—No, a nurse child of a gentleman in Dublin.
What reason have you for wishing to be with her?—I would rather be in the country.
Would you rather be in the school in the country?—Yes.

EXAMINATIONS of 12 Boys at the FOUNDLING HOSPITAL.

Appendix, No. 33.

Examination of Thomas Grant; Monday, 13th December 1824.

Examination of Thomas Grant,
13 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—About twelve years old.
Where were you nursed?—In the parish of Wicklow.
How long have you been in the hospital?—About two years; two years this July.
Could you read before you came into the hospital?—Yes, I could.
Could you write?—No.
Where have you been in a school?—In a Sunday school in Wicklow.
Who was it taught by?—Mr. Mac Fall.
Who was the clergyman?—Mr. Porter.
Were there many children at that school?—Yes.
Many Foundlings besides you?—Yes, there were a good many in it besides me.
Were the other boys good natured to you, or did they call you names?—Some of them did, and some of them were good natured enough.

Did

Did some of them call you names?—Yes, some of them did, and others were very good natured.

Were you very fond of your nurse?—Yes, I was.

Had she a husband living?—Yes.

Had she any children of her own?—Five.

Were they older than you?—No, never a one older than me.

Were you very fond of them?—I was.

Did any of them go to school with you?—Yes, the two eldest.

Were they Protestants?—Yes they were.

How did they get their livelihood?—She would be doing things, knitting stockings and such things as that, or binding corn.

What did your father do?—He was a carpenter, and lost his eyesight.

Was that when you were with him?—No, a little before I went to him.

Were you happier then than in the Foundling?—I was happier with them.

How was your father supported after he lost his sight?—People supported him, and gave him things to keep him up.

What prevents you being as happy in the Foundling as you were with them?—I got more to eat in the country.

Have you not enough to eat?—No; I could eat more if I could get it, but it is pretty well; there are so many of them. I am clothed better here than in the country.

Had you a good bed to sleep in there?—But middling enough; I have a better bed here.

Did you get more play in the country?—Yes, I used only to go to school on the Sunday.

Was that the reason you liked the country better, because you had more play?—No, I would rather keep to my book.

Have you any particular friends among the boys that you like better than the rest?—Yes.

Is that the little boy that has not been called up here?—Yes, Pat Henly.

What makes you like him?—Because I went to school with him every Sunday in the country.

Examination of
Thomas Grant,
18 Dec. 1824.

Appendix, No. 34.

Examination of Richard Holmes; Monday, 13th December 1824.

Examination of Richard Holmes,
13 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Fourteen.

Where were you at nurse?—At Kilcullen-bridge.

In what county?—County Kildare.

When were you taken into the hospital?—In 1823.

In what month?—August.

Was your nurse a Roman-catholic or Protestant?—A Protestant.

Had she a husband living?—Yes.

Was he a Protestant?—No, a Roman-catholic.

Did you go to school?—Yes, I used to go to the Sunday school.

And day school?—Yes.

Did you learn to read and write?—Yes.

And your catechism?—Yes.

Did you learn any figures?—No, I could not do any figures; I could not write when I came into the hospital.

Have you learnt to write and to do figures since you came into the hospital?—Yes.

Who taught you your catechism?—The minister used to bring us to his own place every Wednesday; the boys belonging to this house he used to take to his school.

Who was the clergyman?—Mr. Wade.

Who kept the day school you went to?—Mr. Rossiter.

Was he the parish clerk?—Yes, he was.

Were there any Roman-catholic children at the school?—I do not know.

Did your father ever interfere with you about your religion?—No.

How did they feed you?—I would not wish a bit better usage than I got with them.

Were your sisters all treated as well as you?—Yes, they were; there was one little girl of fifteen, and the nurse and her used to go to church every Sunday.

Had you the same food as your mother?—Yes, we used to eat all at one table.

What did you get?—I used to get stirabout and milk for breakfast.

Was it buttermilk?—Mixed milk sometimes.

As much as you wanted?—Yes.

Were you clothed well?—Yes.

As comfortable as you are now?—Not quite so well.

Were you kept warm?—Yes.

Had you a comfortable bed?—Yes.

Did you wear shoes and stockings?—Yes.

Regularly?—Yes; I had shoes and stockings as long as I can remember.

Would you rather stay where you are, or go back again?—I would rather go back if I could.

Why?—I am so confined now.

What did your father do?—They kept a little shop.

Have you got any particular friends in the Foundling?—Yes.

Examination of Richard Holmes,
13 Dec. 1824.

Who are they?—I know a good many boys.
How came they to be friends of yours?—We used to go to the same school.
And you keep up an acquaintance now?—Yes.
Do you often talk about Kilcullen-bridge school?—Yes.
Would you rather be there than here?—Yes.
Where did you learn fastest, at Kilcullen-bridge school or here?—I learn the fastest here.
Did any people, before you came into the Foundling, try to persuade you to be a Roman-catholic?—No.
Did you ever change your nurse?—No.

Appendix, No. 35.

Examination of James Sweeney; Monday, 13th December 1824.

Examination of James Sweeney,
13 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Fourteen, I believe.
How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—One year and three months.
Where were you at nurse?—Athy, in the county Kildare.
Were there any other Foundlings at nurse with you?—Yes, a little girl.
Where is she?—In the Foundling Hospital.
Is she younger than you?—Yes.
Did you go to school before you came into the Foundling?—Yes.
How many children were at the school you went to?—I could not exactly tell; all the little children about that belonged to this house, and other children.
Were there many of them?—Yes.
A hundred do you think?—Yes, of every sort.
Was the school at Athy?—Yes.
What did you learn there?—To spell, and my catechism.
Were you taught the catechism in the school?—Yes, and in the church every Sunday evening, and I used to go to the Sunday-school.
Who was the clergyman?—Mr. Bristow.
Did he hear you your catechism?—Yes, he did.
Did your nurse treat you well?—Yes, she always used to make me go to church every Sunday, and my father.
Was he a Protestant?—Yes.
What was your mother?—A Roman-catholic. My father would make me always go with himself; I used to go and sit by him.
What was he?—A weaver, he used to be weaving.
Did they give you plenty to eat?—Yes.
Plenty of clothes?—Yes, I was very well clothed.
Had they any children of their own?—Yes, they had, they were married; they had only me and a little girl with them in the house; they used to give me what they had themselves.
Used you to dine at the same table with them?—Yes, the very same table, they would not let me go any where else. only to eat at the table with themselves.
Did they keep a servant?—No.
Was your sister treated as well as you?—Yes, she was every bit.
Did she go to church too?—Yes, her and me used to go to the church and Sunday school together.
Had you any books?—Yes.
What were they?—The mistress that kept the Sunday school gave them to me, a spelling book and a little hymn book.
Have you got them now?—Yes.
Are they at the Foundling?—No, I did not bring them up with me; I forgot them when I was coming.
Did you cry when you came away?—Yes.
Were you sorry to leave them?—Yes.
Would you like to go back to them?—Yes.
Are you happy where you are?—Yes, pretty happy.
Where had you the best food, at your mother's house or at the Foundling? With my mother.
Had you as good clothes as you have now?—Yes, every bit; I had corderoy trowsers, a frieze bodied coat, and a light waistcoat, and black hat. I had two shirts, and a clean shirt every Sunday.
Had you any shoes and stockings?—Yes, I had; she used to wash me herself.
Did you wear your shoes and stockings every day?—Yes, while they held.
Did your sister wear shoes and stockings too?—Yes, she did.
Did all the Foundling children you met at school wear shoes and stockings?—Yes.
Have you got any friends in the Foundling now?—No.
Are there no boys you went to school with at Athy?—Yes, one little boy.
How came you to be friends with him?—I used to go to church with him, and the Sunday school.
Had you a good bed?—Yes, I used to lie with my father and mother.
Were the children at the school kind to you, or did they call you names?—They used not;

not; the children used not to call me names, but the boys running about from one place to another that had not a house to themselves, running about looking for bits of food.

What names did they call you?—Poor-house brat.

And parisheen?—Yes.

Did that used to vex you?—Yes.

Have you been in the infirmary since you came to the hospital?—Yes, I was.

How long were you there?—About a fortnight or ten days.

What was the matter with you?—I had a pain in my head.

Have you ever had sore eyes?—Yes; but I was not there long; I was not there above ten days or a fortnight altogether.

Were you well taken care of there?—Yes.

When was it you had sore eyes; was it soon after you came from the nurse?—No, I had left her a long while.

Was it this year or last?—I cannot tell; my eyes are very sore now.

Did your mother ever talk to you about religion?—No; she used always to make me go to church, and my father used to bring me by the hand; I never went any where but to church.

Your father and mother never differed about religion?—No, they never did.

Examination of James Sweeney,
13 Dec. 1824.

Appendix, No. 36.

Examination of Patrick Henley; Monday, 13th December 1824.

HOW old are you?—Going eleven years old.

How long have you been in the Foundling?—Five months the 19th of this month.

Have you had sore eyes?—Yes.

How long were you in the infirmary?—Three months.

Were your eyes very bad?—Yes, I could not see with them.

Could you read as well when you came into the Foundling as you can now?—No, I could not.

Can you read now?—Yes.

Could you say your catechism before you came into the Foundling?—Yes.

Where have you been at school?—In the town of Wicklow.

A Sunday school?—Yes.

And day school too?—Yes; until it was broke up.

What broke it up?—He used not to teach the boys well, and the minister made him break it up: the boys were out keeping the horses out of the potatoes instead of learning the lessons, and the minister heard it, and he made him break it up.

What was the schoolmaster's name?—Mr. M'Phale.

Was there another master appointed?—No; he was a printer on tomb-stones, he used to put letters on tomb-stones.

Who was your principal friend at the Foundling?—Mr. Flinley.

Who among the boys is your best friend?—My brother.

Who is he?—John Hutton.

Was he nursed with you?—Yes.

Is he older than you?—Yes.

Was he at nurse with you?—Yes, and I call him my brother.

He is very good to you?—Yes.

Were you fond of your nurse?—Yes, I was.

Was she very good to you?—Yes.

Did she take care of you?—Yes.

Did she give you plenty to eat?—Yes, any thing she had herself—she gave me a share of it.

Did you always dine at the same table?—Yes.

Had your nurse a husband living?—Yes, she was married.

How did her husband employ himself?—Making boots and shoes.

Were they Roman-catholics or Protestants?—My father was a Protestant, and my mother was a Roman-catholic, who used to learn me the Protestant prayers of a night she had them all, and she had the Roman prayers too.

Did she teach you to say the Lord's Prayer?—Yes, she did.

What other prayers did she teach you?—All the catechisms, and the belief.

Did she make you say it word for word?—Yes.

Did she teach you the catechism by a book?—Yes.

Is it the same catechism you now learn at the Foundling?—Yes, the very same; she taught me the Lord's Prayer every night of her life.

[The witness repeated the Lord's Prayer with the doxology.]

Had you a good bed?—Yes, a very good feather bed.

Did you wear shoes and stockings?—Yes, sometimes.

Not always?—No, on Sundays only; I am not to tell any lies, I am to tell the truth.

Did they ever call you any names at school?—Yes.

Did they call you parisheen?—Yes.

Did they ever slight you or make little of you?—No.

Did the nurse punish you?—Yes, when I did a fault, only when I did wrong; she would not have done it if I had not deserved it.

Examination of Patrick Henley,
13 Dec. 1824.

Examination of
Patrick Henley,
13 Dec. 1824.

Did you mind it when they called you names?—No, it did not hurt me, it did me no harm.

Did you call them any thing in return?—Yes, any name I thought of—I was as good got as them.

Do you know how old you were when you went to your nurse?—I was young; I was not with any other nurse.

What would you like to do if you had your choice?—I should like to go to my father and learn the trade.

Have you learnt much since you came into the Foundling?—No, I have not.

Did you ever go to chapel?—No.

You never heard the mass?—No, I never went to the mass-house.

Did the priest ever say any thing to you?—No.

Did he never come to the house?—No.

Was your nurse never ill?—Yes, but the doctor used to come.

The priest did not pray by her?—No.

Appendix, No. 37.

Examination of William Brady; Monday, 13th December 1824.

Examination of William Brady,
13 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Going fifteen.

How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—A year and four months.

Have you been in the infirmary since you have been there?—Yes.

What was the matter with you?—I had a pain in my ear.

Had you sore eyes?—Yes; only once.

How long were they sore?—I was in seven days.

When you were taken ill of sore eyes, was it soon after you came from the country, or how long after?—Soon after I came from the country.

Have you had any return of sore eyes since that time?—No.

Where were you nursed?—In county Carlow.

Was it near Carlow?—Yes, at Rahoul.

Was your nurse kind to you?—Yes, she was.

Had she a husband?—Yes.

Was he kind to you?—Yes.

Had they any children?—Yes, they had.

Were they older than you, or younger?—Some of them were older, and some younger.

She treated you as well as them?—Yes, the same.

Did she treat you well?—Yes.

Were you as well fed as you have been since you have been in the Foundling Hospital?

—Yes, I was as well fed, but I had not so good clothing.

Had you as good a bed?—I had not so good a bed and clothing in the country as I have here.

Had you shoes and stockings?—In winter I had.

Every day?—No.

Were your father and mother Roman-catholics or Protestants?—Roman-catholics.

Used they to send you to church?—Yes, sometimes.

Did they want to make a Roman-catholic of you?—Yes.

Did they ever take you to chapel?—Yes.

How often?—I do not know.

Did the priest ever speak to you?—Yes.

What did he say to you?—He would advise me to go to chapel.

Did he give you any reason for it?—He would give me the catechism and books.

What catechism?—The Roman catechism.

What other books?—The prayer books.

What prayer books?—The Roman-catholic prayer book.

Did any person teach you to say the catechism?—Yes; some of the children.

Did either your nurse or father teach you the catechism?—Sometimes; but she would most times teach me the Protestant prayers.

Which do you like best of the two, the Roman-catholic or the Protestant religion?—The Protestant.

Why?—I was a Roman with my nurse.

For what reason do you like the Protestant worship best; do you understand it best?—Yes.

What makes you understand it best?—I hear the minister preach it.

Could not you hear the priest?—Yes.

Could you understand him?—No.

Why not?—He would not preach it that we would understand it so much as the minister.

Did he preach in English or Irish?—Irish.

Did you understand Irish?—No, I could not.

When were you last at chapel?—About a year and six or seven months ago.

[The witness repeated the Lord's Prayer, with the doxology.]

Did the priest teach you that?—No.

Have you learnt it since you have been in the hospital?—Yes.

Who

Who was the minister of the parish church?—Mr. Magee.

Did you attend the Sunday school ever?—Yes; Mr. Brough was the minister for a while, and he went into another parish, and then Mr. Magee was over us.

Were you instructed in the catechism in the Sunday school?—Yes.

Have you got any particular friends in the school, that you are more intimate with than others?—Yes.

Who are you most intimate with; what boy do you like best?—Carefoot.

How came he to be so intimate with you?—He is a monitor.

Did you know him before you came into the hospital?—Yes.

Where?—At Ravilly.

Where is that?—It is down by Carlow.

Was he at nurse there?—Yes.

Did he come to church there?—Yes.

You knew him there?—Yes.

Who came first to the Foundling Hospital, he or you?—He did.

Did he see you when you came to the hospital?—Yes.

And you have been good friends ever since?—Yes.

Examination of William Brady,
13 Dec. 1824.

Appendix, No. 38.

Examination of Thomas Rose; Monday, 13th December 1824.

HOW long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Going on two years.

How old are you?—Going on thirteen years.

Where were you at nurse?—In the county Kildare.

Had your nurse any children of her own?—Yes.

How many?—Four or five.

Was she as good to you as to them?—Yes; the same.

Used she to give you good food?—Yes.

Had you better food before you came into the hospital, than you have had since?—
I had it as good.

And as good clothing?—Yes.

Had you as good a bed to sleep on?—Yes.

Were your brothers and sisters kind to you?—Yes.

The same as to one another?—Yes; the very same.

Should you like to see them again?—Yes.

Was your mother a Roman-catholic or Protestant?—A Roman.

Had she a husband alive?—Yes.

Was he a Roman-catholic too?—Yes.

Did they ever take you to chapel?—No.

What did they do?—I used to go to church.

Every Sunday?—Yes.

Did you learn the catechism?—Yes.

Who taught it you?—The minister and schoolmaster.

Did your mother ever teach you to say your prayers?—She would give them me out of the Protestant catechism.

Did she hear you repeat the Protestant catechism?—Yes.

How often?—Every night I came from school.

What catechism used she to teach her own children?—I was never taught any of that.

Used she to teach them any catechism?—Yes, she used.

Used they to try to make a Roman-catholic of you?—Oh no.

Did the priest ever talk to you?—No.

Used your brothers and sisters to find fault with you, and laugh at you for being a Protestant?—No; not the least.

They did not quarrel with you about it?—No.

Used you to go to school every day?—Yes.

Were there many boys at the school?—Yes, a good deal.

Where was the school?—In the court house.

In the town of Kildare?—Yes.

Did the boys there call you names?—No, not the least, and they dare not.

Every body was very kind to you?—Yes.

Were you happier before you came into the Foundling Hospital, than you have been since?—Yes.

Does any thing make you dislike being in the Foundling Hospital?—No.

Are you very well treated there?—Yes.

And Mr. Murray is very good to teach you?—Yes.

And treats you very well?—Yes.

Do you learn faster than you did at Kildare?—Yes.

You are better taught now?—Yes.

Would you rather stay where you are, or go back to your nurse?—I would as lief stay where I am.

Do you wish ever to see your nurse again?—Yes, I wish to see her.

Are there any boys in the Foundling Hospital you like better than others?—No, they are gone now into the country.

Examination of
Thomas Rose,
13 Dec. 1824.

Examination of
Thomas Rose,
13 Dec. 1824.

Why did you like them?—Because I knew them in the country.
Have you had sore sore eyes?—Yes.
How long were they bad?—Not more than a fortnight.
Were you in the infirmary?—Yes.
Were you taken care of?—Yes.
Did you nurse and husband go regularly to chapel?—Yes, they did.
Had you shoes and stockings in the country?—Yes.
Did you wear them at all times?—Yes, bating the very hot times.

Appendix, No. 39.

Examination of John Jameson; Monday, 13th December 1824.

Examination of
John Jameson,
13 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Twelve years old.
Where were you nursed?—In the county Wicklow, parish of Hollywood.
What was your nurse's name?—Mary Cavanagh.
Was she a Roman-catholic or Protestant?—A Roman-catholic.
Had she any other children besides you?—Yes, one.
Was that a boy or girl?—A girl.
Was she older or younger than you?—Older.
Did your nurse take good care of you?—Yes.
As good care as she took of her own children?—The same thing.
Did she give you as good clothes?—Yes.
Did you eat the same food with her?—Yes.
Had you always as much food as you wanted?—Yes.
When did you leave her?—Last July was twelve months.
Have you been in the hospital since last July twelve months?—Yes.
Were you very sorry to leave your nurse?—Yes, I was.
Has she ever been to see you?—No.
Have you ever written her a letter?—No.
Should you like to go to her again?—Yes, I would.
Which do you like best, being with her or where you are?—I like being with her best.
Does any thing make you uncomfortable where you are?—No.
Where had you the best food, with your nurse or in the hospital?—In the Foundling.
What food did your nurse give you?—Potatoes and beef and bacon.
What do you get now?—The same.
What sort of a house did your nurse live in?—In a small slate house.
Did you go to school when you was with her?—Yes.
A day school?—Yes.
Were many boys at it?—About thirty-one.
Did you learn much there?—Yes.
Did you go there every day in the week?—Yes.
Did you know how to write before you came into the Foundling?—No.
Did you know how to read?—Yes.
How long have you been at school?—About a year.
Could you read out of the Testament then?—Yes.
Have you much improved since you came to the Foundling?—Yes.
Can you read now?—Yes.
Could you say your catechism when you came into the Foundling?—Yes.
Who taught it you?—My nurse.
Was not she a Roman-catholic?—Yes; but she behaved to me the same as if she was a Protestant.
Did she ever try to persuade you to be a Roman-catholic?—No.
Did she send you to church?—Yes, every Sunday.
Did you go by yourself?—Yes.
Did her own children go to chapel with her?—Yes.
Had your nurse a husband alive?—Yes.
Was he a Roman-catholic too?—Yes.
How did he get his livelihood?—He was a tailor.
Was he kind to you?—Yes; he used to learn me the trade.
Should you like to be bound apprentice to him?—Yes, I would.
Have you got any friends in the hospital you like?—Yes.
Who are they?—There's one gone out now; there's one of the name of Stone.
Why did you like him?—He lived by me in the country.
Did he go to the same school?—Yes.
And the same church?—Yes.
And the clergyman used to teach you the catechism?—Yes.
Did you go to the Sunday school?—Yes.
And you used to play together?—Yes.
Was it a Protestant school?—Yes.
Were there no Roman-catholics at it?—No.
Was it taught by the parish clerk?—Yes.
What makes you wish to go back to your nurse?—I have a great liking for her, being so long with her.

Who

Who teaches you in the hospital?—Mr. Flenly.
 Have you been in good health since you came to the Foundling?—Yes.
 Have you been in the infirmary at all?—Yes.
 How long?—Three weeks.
 What was the matter with you?—Sore eyes.
 Have they got well?—Yes.
 How long after you came to the Foundling did you catch sore eyes?—About three months.
 Were your eyes very bad?—Yes, they were.
 Were you taken good care of while in the infirmary?—Yes.
 Had you any books when you were with your nurse?—Yes, the prayer book and Testament, and spelling book and the catechism.
 Where did you get them?—The clergyman gave them to me.
 Could your nurse read?—Yes.
 What could she read?—Her prayer book.
 Who was the clergyman?—Mr. O'Brien.

Examination of
John Jameson,
 13 Dec. 1824.

Appendix, No. 40.

Examination of Joseph Stammers; Monday, 13th December 1824.

HOW old are you?—Going twelve.
 How long have you been in the Foundling Hospital?—Ever since the 3d of August.
 Have you had sore eyes since you have been there?—Yes.
 How long were you ill of your eyes?—A month.
 Were they very bad?—Yes, they were.
 Where were you nursed?—The parish of Allan.
 What county is that in?—The county Kildare.
 Had your nurse any other Foundling but you?—Yes, two more.
 Boys or girls?—Two girls.
 Older than you?—One was eleven, and the other twelve.
 Had she any children of her own?—Three.
 Was she as good to you as to them?—Yes.
 Did she give you the same food?—Yes.
 Did she feed you well?—Yes.
 And give you good clothes?—Yes.
 As good as you get in the Foundling?—Yes.
 Where were you best fed; before you came to the hospital, or now?—Before I came to the hospital.
 Did you go to school before you came to the Foundling Hospital?—Yes.
 Could you write before you came?—No.
 Did you go to school only on Sundays?—No, on week days; I used to go to church on Sundays.
 Who took you to church?—She used to send me herself.
 Was she a Roman-catholic?—Yes, she was.
 Who taught you your catechism?—I learnt it in the school.
 Did your nurse ever teach you the catechism?—Yes, she used.
 Did she teach you to say your prayers at night?—What prayers.
 Did she teach you to say any prayers?—No.
 Had your nurse a husband?—No, he was dead.
 What became of your two sisters?—They were taken in here.
 Do you ever see them now?—No.
 Are you happy in the hospital?—Yes.
 Where would you rather be, in the hospital or in the country?—In the country.
 Were there any boys at school with you, who are in the hospital?—None.

Examination of Joseph Stammers,
 13 Dec. 1824.

Appendix, No. 41.

Examination of John Roberts; Saturday, 18th December 1824.

HOW old are you?—Going fifteen.
 Where were you nursed?—In the county Wicklow.
 How long were you with your nurse there?—I was going on twelve when I came in, and I have been in a year and four months.
 Were you with a Protestant or Roman-catholic nurse?—A Roman-catholic nurse.
 Did she use you well?—Yes.
 Did she teach you to go to mass?—No, I went to church every Sunday
 And to school too?—No, she sent me to school only a quarter of a year.
 What did you learn at church?—My catechism, and my book.
 Who taught you your catechism?—Mr. Moore.
 Is he the clergyman?—Yes.
 It was a Sunday school?—Yes.
 Did your mother teach you your prayers?—No.
 Did you say them night and morning?—Yes.

Examination of
John Roberts,
 18 Dec. 1824.

Examination of
John Roberts,
18 Dec. 1824.

Who taught you?—The clergyman every Sunday evening.
Did your mother ever try to take you away from the church?—No.
Had she any other children?—Yes, four.
Did she treat you as well as her own children?—Yes.
Feed and clothe you?—Yes.
And you loved her as you would your own mother?—Yes.
And did she love you as well?—Yes.
Did you live happily with your brother and sister?—Yes.
Did they ever call you names?—No.
You were very sorry to leave her?—Yes.
Would you like to go back?—Yes.
Have you had sore eyes?—Yes; in the infirmary.
When was it?—Last year.
Can you read pretty well?—Middling.
Are you reading every day?—Yes.
Have you any particular friends in the school now?—Yes.
Who are they?—John Greenwell.
How came he to be your friend?—He went to the same school with me.
You look upon him as your brother?—Yes.
Would you like to be bound apprentice in the country where you were nursed?—Yes, I would.

Appendix, No. 42.

Examination of James Pennyfeather; Saturday, 18th December 1824.

Examination of James Pennyfeather,
18 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Going on thirteen years of age.
How long have you been in the Foundling?—A year and four months.
Where were you nursed?—In the parish of Wicklow.
By a Protestant or Roman-catholic nurse?—A Roman-catholic.
How long were you with her?—I was twelve years of age when I left her.
Did you go to chapel?—No.
Did you go to church?—Yes I did.
Did you never go into the chapel?—No.
Did your mother never take you to chapel?—No.
How came that about?—I would not go with her.
Why not; what reason had you for refusing to go with her, where she would take you?
—She never asked me.
Then how could you refuse her?—If she had asked me, I would not go.
Then how could you refuse her, if she took you to church?—She sent me every Sunday.
Who sent you?—I went with the rest of the boys.
What boys?—All the children that would be going from the place.
Had you any other child, a Foundling, at her house?—No.
They were all neighbours about you?—Yes; the boys out apprentice.
Did you go to school?—Yes.
Sunday school?—Yes.
Did you learn to read?—I could not read when I came in.
You have learnt to read since?—Yes.
Can you read pretty well?—Yes.
Were you taken good care of down there?—Yes.
Were you fed well?—Yes.
As well as here?—I did not get quite so good victuals.
Did you get plenty of it?—Yes.
Were you well clothed?—I was middling, not as well as I am here.
Were you clothed as well as her own children?—She had only a son grown up, and little girls.
Did you eat the same as they did?—Yes, the very same.
Had you a good bed?—Yes, I had.
Were you sorry to leave her?—I was.
Was she married?—Her husband was dead.
Should you like to go back again?—I should.
Why should you like to go back again?—I like to be in the country best.
Have you got any particular friends in the hospital?—Yes.
Who are they?—John Daniel.
How came you to like him better than the rest?—I was with him since I came in, and I would rather have him.
Were you with him before you came in?—No; he is a quiet boy, and I like him.
He was not with you in Wicklow?—No.
Are there any boys there you used to go to school with in Wicklow?—The boys went to the children's school that came in with me; there is no one that came in with me, they are out apprentice.
As long as they staid, used you to be great friends with them?—Yes.
Do you remember when they went to the charter schools?—Yes.
How many went?—One John Ward, and two went out apprentices, Pat and James Mills.
Did they come into the Foundling Hospital first?—Yes, I was at nurse with them.

Appendix, No. 43.

Examination of Thomas Garder; Saturday, 18th December 1824.Examination of Thomas Garder,
18 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Turned of thirteen.
 How long have you been in the hospital?—One year and four months.
 Where were you nursed?—The County Wicklow.
 What was the name of the place?—Castle Timond, in the parish of Dunganstown.
 Was your nurse a Roman-catholic or Protestant?—A Roman-catholic.
 How did she treat you, kindly?—Yes, I used to go to church every Sunday.
 Did you never go to chapel?—No, I never remember that; they lived by the minister, and I used to go to prayers every Sunday.
 Your mother never taught you the Roman-catholic religion?—No.
 Did she teach you to say your prayers?—Yes, she would make me say the Roman prayers before I went to church, when I was a little fellow.
 Can you remember them now?—No.
 Can you say the Protestant prayers now?—Yes.
 Were you taught to read or write there?—I was taught to read at the school.
 Were you very happy there?—Yes.
 Should you like to go there again?—Yes.
 Were you better off there?—Yes.
 Were you fed as well?—Yes.
 As well as her own children?—Yes, quite as good.
 Were you clothed pretty well?—Yes.
 Shoes and stockings?—Yes.
 All the time?—No; I had not them in summer, but in winter.
 Did you care whether you had them or not?—I would like to have them in winter; I do not care much about them in summer.
 Had you a good bed?—Yes.
 How many brothers and sisters?—Eleven.
 How many beds had you in the house?—Two.
 How many slept in one; how did you manage it; how many did you get in one bed?—There were three; my mother and father lay on one bed, and two little children and the four girls in another bed, and I and two brothers laid in a turned up-bed.
 You would like to go there again?—I would.
 Can you read pretty well now?—Yes.
 Are you very happy now?—Yes.
 Which are your best friends in the school?—I like them all very well; I could not tell which I liked best; I like them all.
 Have you any body that was nursed with you?—Yes; I used to go to school with him.
 What is his name?—Pat Tisdale.
 Do you like him better than the others?—No, I like them all.
 Do you learn a good deal?—Yes.
 In writing and summing?—Yes.
 Can you do the rule of three?—No.
 How far have you got in figures?—I have got into long division and short division; there are better boys than me in it.
 And bigger boys in it?—Yes.

Appendix, No. 44.

Examination of Aaron Ruff; Saturday, 18th December 1824.Examination of Aaron Ruff,
18 Dec. 1824.

HOW old are you?—Turned over of thirteen.
 How long have you been in the hospital?—A year and four months.
 Where did you come from?—The parish of Carnew, in the county Wicklow.
 Were you near John Roberts?—Yes.
 Did you know him in the country?—Yes.
 Are you good friends still?—Yes.
 How far were you from him?—About half a mile.
 Did you go to church together?—Yes.
 Was your nurse a Protestant?—No, a Roman-catholic.
 Did you go to chapel or to church?—She used to send me to church, when I got pretty big.
 Did she try to teach you to be a Roman-catholic?—No.
 How many children had she?—Five.
 Did they like you?—Yes.
 Did you like them?—Yes.
 Did they ever beat you?—No.
 Or call you any names?—No.
 How did she feed you?—Middling, not very well.
 Did she feed you as well as her own children?—Yes.
 How did she clothe you?—Not very well.
 Were you clothed as well as the rest of the children?—Yes.

Examination of Aaron Ruff,
18 Dec. 1824.

Where would you rather be, at the Foundling or in the country?—I would rather be in the country.
Can you read pretty well?—I am reading every other day, and I am at a trade.
What trade?—Shoemaker and gardener; when the shoemaking was broken up, I was made a gardener.
Should you like to go to see your mother again?—No.
What! you do not want to go and live there?—No.
Are you happy where you are?—Yes.
Have you many friends in the hospital?—Yes.
What time do you play?—From eight to half-past nine, and then leave the school at one, and play till four.
You dine in the mean time?—Yes.
Were you bred up a Roman-catholic?—No.
Had you ever a complaint in the eyes?—Yes; I was in the infirmary, and had sore eyes.
How long after you came up?—About half a year after I came in.
Did you ever have them down in the country?—No.
What sort of a bed did you have there?—It was not very good; but I used to lie with her own children.

Appendix, No. 45.

Examination of the Rev. James Aickin; Tuesday, 20th December 1825.

Examination of
Rev. James Aickin,
20 Dec. 1825.

HAS there not been recently instituted in the Foundling Hospital an establishment for the education of schoolmasters?—Yes, schoolmasters and parish clerks.
Did it originate with the Association for Discountenancing Vice?—Yes.
In what way are you connected with it?—I am superintendent.
By whom were you appointed?—I was appointed by the committee, and by his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin.
Are you a clergyman of the Church of England?—I am.
Do you hold any preferment?—I have no preferment; I merely assist the chaplain of the Foundling Hospital; that was one of the conditions of my appointment.
Do you reside in the Foundling Hospital?—I do.
What salary do you receive for the trouble you have undertaken?—150*l.* a year.
And a residence?—Yes.
And coals and candles?—No, only a residence.
Be so good as to describe the nature of the duties you discharge?—I superintend the education solely; also I have the providing of every article connected with the establishment, and keep the accounts.
What does the establishment consist of?—We are limited at present to thirty.
Have you thirty in the establishment?—No, not at present.
How many have you?—We have fifteen at present on the establishment; the limited number at first was fifteen, the committee have but lately increased it to thirty.
When did the instruction of those masters first commence?—On the 24th of January, this year, we admitted the first young man.
How are they selected, and by whom appointed?—The clergyman of the parish writes up to the secretary of the association, and the secretary sends him a printed form, which he fills up. The conditions are principally that he shall be actually engaged as parish clerk and schoolmaster, or either; and that he should have a natural capability for singing, and that he should be subjected to an examination, previous to his being admitted.
What are the necessary conditions for the admission of any one of those youths; first, at what age is he admitted?—Between nineteen and thirty. There have been one or two admitted as junior pupils, under the age of nineteen; but I do not know whether they will still continue to admit them so young.
Is there any examination upon their admission as to their proficiency in reading and writing, and the ordinary branches of learning?—I examine them in the presence of the committee.
What is it necessary for them to know before their admission?—They should read, write, and know the Scriptures tolerably well; and also they should be pretty well grounded in arithmetic, as far as the rule of three.
Do you happen to know whether any of the young men admitted are born of Roman-catholic parents?—I do not.
Is it at all a matter of inquiry?—I never heard it inquired into.
If known, would it be a reason of preference, or the contrary?—A Protestant would certainly have the preference.
Is any preference given to particular places of education?—No, I am not aware that there is any preference given.
Is there any impression to the contrary; would persons educated in the common country schools be preferred to children educated in seminaries, where they are separated from their families and parents?—They seldom are asked where they are educated.
Will you describe that a little more fully?—They are not admitted into our schools without an appointment, and without a certain salary; because the idea of the association was, that the young men might otherwise come into our school, and remain in it four months (which

(which is at present the limited time), then go out; and the committee would have no security that he would act as schoolmaster afterwards.

In the selection of youths for this purpose, should you prefer those educated in the charter schools, or in a parish school, where the children are boarded and lodged, to a young man who had been educated in a country day school, and who continued, during the time he received his education, to live with his family and friends?—There is no preference given on that ground, nor any inquiry made.

Can you say why so small number as fifteen have as yet been admitted?—Although there are at present only fifteen since the commencement, thirty-nine altogether have entered the institution.

Besides those now in it?—No, including those.

What condition do you make with them as to their stay?—They must stay four months; one or two were admitted for one month; but they were not entitled to a certificate.

They are not to stay more than four months?—No; except on special application.

Is voice made a necessary qualification in a young man, who is not intended to be a parish clerk, but merely for a schoolmaster?—No, by no means.

At whose expense are they maintained?—At the expense of the association.

Do the individuals who are educated contribute any portion of the expense themselves?—No.

Do they provide themselves with clothes?—Yes, and pay their travelling expenses.

They are provided in lodging, food, and instruction?—Yes.

Is any portion of the expense whatever defrayed out of the funds of the Foundling Hospital?—Not at present.

Is it intended to be so?—Yes; they have of late been talking of joining the Foundling Hospital, to provide a proper master for 100 boys, that are to be selected from the male school, and are to be arranged as a model school for the training masters.

Will not that give rise to a very considerable complication of accounts?—I should think not; the governors of the Foundling Hospital have proposed, I rather think, to allow the association the salary and provisions they give an under master, and the association are to pay the overplus.

In what way is the food for those young men provided?—By me.

Have you entirely a separate establishment from the Foundling Hospital within the institution for cooking and providing the food?—No, not entirely; the cooking is done in the Foundling Hospital kitchen.

Does not that produce a confusion of accounts?—No, I am not aware that it does.

Are the dinners dressed by the Foundling Hospital servants?—Yes, by their cook.

Do all these youths sleep in one room?—No, there are two dormitories—fifteen beds in each dormitory.

In case of any of them being ill, are they provided for in the infirmary of the Foundling Hospital?—No.

Have you any separate infirmary?—We have had but one instance of a young man being ill, and that was the other day; the second dormitory was vacant, and he was placed there: I cannot say what arrangement our committee may hereafter make.

What medical attendance will they receive?—I think it is the intention of the association to give the surgeon of the Foundling Hospital a small salary for his attendance.

In what way are the young men instructed?—They are lectured in the Scripture, and taught to examine the Foundling Hospital boys in Scripture, under my superintendence; they are also taught the advanced branches of arithmetic, Pestalozzi's system, English grammar and geography; and half an hour each day is devoted to reading parts of the church liturgy aloud.

Have the goodness to describe the course pursued in any one day in the week?—On Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, it varies from the other days. On those days, from nine o'clock to ten, I lecture them in Scripture, the boys in the training school being also present; from ten to eleven they attend Mr. Murray's lecture.

Do you mean the boys?—Both boys and training pupils. The latter take notes of both our Scripture lectures. From eleven to half-past one they study arithmetic; the school breaks up at half-past one—the dinner is ready at two—they come into school then at half-past four, and prepare their geography and English grammar till six. At six, I lecture them upon geography and English grammar till half-past six; and from half-past six to seven they read the church liturgy aloud; at seven they sup; and from half-past seven to half-past nine prepare exercises for the morning. The younger pupils transcribe certain portions of Bell's system, and the more advanced write questions from Pestalozzi, and answer them.

Have the goodness to describe the course they pursue on the alternate days?—On the alternate days, that is Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, from nine till ten they are lectured by me in Bell's system upon what they have transcribed the two preceding evenings—from ten to eleven they are exercised in Pestalozzi—from eleven to half-past one they cypher—at half-past one the school breaks up—the dinner commences at two—and from half-past two to half-past four the music master attends—from half-past four to half-past six they prepare and are lectured in geography and English grammar, and then read the liturgy.

Is there not a class of boys admitted into the Foundling Hospital who are placed under their instruction?—Yes, there are two classes.

What number do they consist of?—One of twelve and the other of thirteen.

Examination of
 Rev. James Aickin,
 20 Dec. 1825.

Have the goodness to describe in what they are instructed, and by whom?—They are instructed, under my superintendence, by the training pupils, in arithmetic and Scripture.

In what way can you contrive to occupy so many young men as teachers of twelve and thirteen boys?—Their time is so limited in the institution they can hardly devote it to those few, they have so much to learn themselves—they have but four months to learn geography and English grammar and arithmetic.

Is four months the limited time?—Yes, except on a special application to the committee, and then if they prolong it, it is considered a favour.

Do the young men take in turns the duty of instructing those two classes?—Yes they do.

Do they instruct them according to Bell's system?—Principally according to Bell's system, there are some little variations.

Are monitors employed?—Yes.

What do they teach to these boys?—Principally writing, arithmetic, and Scripture.

At what age are the boys selected; do you take the boys that are the oldest?—We have taken a class of the oldest, and a class of the youngest.

How long in succession does each youth continue as class master?—One day; they take it alternately, the advanced students take the advanced class, and the junior students the younger class.

Do you find they are good instructors?—Indeed, generally speaking, I do not think they are.

Do you think the boys under their care come on as fast or faster than those who remain in the hospital undergoing the usual course of instruction?—I think they have come on faster.

To what do you attribute that?—It is really hard for me to say.

Do the same boys continue, or do you change them?—I think they will be apprenticed out from our school; we have not changed them as yet.

Do you observe that during the practice of these young they improve in their mode of teaching?—Very much.

Are they slow in acquiring the art of attending to the boys disposition and manner, and the mode of conveying instruction to them?—Some are, and some are not, according to the capacity of the young men.

Have any of those youths that have been admitted been employed as teachers in schools before they came to you?—Yes, the greater number of them have.

Have they any power of punishing the boys during the time they are there?—No.

In what way is that managed?—I punish them whenever it is necessary.

Do you find that the young men conduct themselves to your satisfaction?—Generally they have conducted themselves remarkably well, with the exception of two.

What was the nature of their misconduct?—Insubordination, and not adhering to the rules of the institution.

What became of them?—They were expelled.

What degree of liberty do you allow to these young men while under your care; do they go out into Dublin, and at what hour?—They have hitherto been allowed to go out, on special application to me, for a short time; but that must not be oftener than once a week or once a month. On Sundays they are allowed to go out for two hours, if well behaved; but the committee on Thursday last issued an order, prohibiting them from going outside the walls.

In future they are to continue strictly within the walls of the Foundling Hospital during the four months?—Yes, except on special application to a member of the committee.

Do they appear impatient at that degree of restraint which is imposed upon them?—I think some of them do evince a degree of impatience.

Was there any particular reason for that order abridging their liberty?—One reason might have been, that one of the young men absented himself from the institution without leave.

Had you made any representation to them that you suppose led to it?—I stated that the applications for leave were of late very numerous, and that it was difficult to discriminate to whom I should give leave, and to whom I should not.

Do you think it yourself a desirable order to have made, or the contrary?—There are some advantages and some disadvantages attending it.

State them?—The disadvantage I conceive to be, that such grown young men as they are do not feel easy under restraint, who have been all their life accustomed to liberty; but the advantages attending it more than counterbalance that, for it keeps them from bad company, which young men coming to Dublin would be very apt to run into—indeed their time is so very limited, and they have so very much to do while in the institution, that they ought not to think of any thing else but their business; and to do their duty well, they cannot think of any thing else.

Do you give them any sort of certificate of good conduct, or competence to teach?—Yes, on my recommendation, and a reference to the judgment books, the committee grant them a certificate; of late there has also been an examination, in the presence of the committee, before they receive it.

How many young men have left the institution up to the present time?—Twenty-four altogether.

How many do you expect to be able to supply from it in a year in future?—The committee are in hopes of being able to supply ninety in the course of a year.

Are they intended merely for the schools of the Association for Discountenancing Vice, or or would a young man be received intended for any other?—Yes; for any school in Ireland.

We presume there is some particular recommendation?—Yes, a schoolmaster and parish clerk has the preference; he must be recommended by the clergyman of the parish, as having an actual appointment, and being a moral, well-conducted man, and if appointed as a parish clerk he must have a capacity for singing.

To put an extreme case to illustrate the rule: suppose a respectable gentleman in a parish were to prevail upon a clergyman to recommend a young man who professed himself to be a Roman-catholic, is there any thing in your rules to prevent his being admitted into the institution?—I am not aware of that; but I think the committee would not admit a Roman-catholic.

Have you ever admitted a Protestant dissenter?—I do not know.

Are you aware of there being any rule to prevent a Presbyterian from being admitted into your school, declaring himself to be so, and at the same time declaring himself to be willing to attend the church while with you?—I never heard the committee ask the question of any one, nor that they made any rule respecting it.

You are not aware of any reason to prevent his admission?—No.

Mention what religious books are made use of by the candidate masters in addition to the Scriptures?—Indeed I cannot say there are any religious books made use of except the Scriptures.

No catechism?—No catechism whatever.

Nor any explanation?—No; they merely take down notes of Mr. Murray's and my lectures, and they refer to their note books when they wish to ask a question.

Do you examine them in the Scripture itself?—Yes.

In that sort of extempore examination they cannot know what questions are to be put to them?—They know the chapter in which they are to be lectured and have the book before them.

Are the lectures confined either to the Old or the New Testament?—Hitherto we have lectured them entirely in the New Testament; in fact, whenever Mr. Murray lectures the boys, I lecture the young men.

During the four months of attendance, through what parts of the New Testament do they pass?—I should think they are able to get through one gospel, perhaps two, and that will be a clue to the rest.

That would not be at the rate of more than a fourth part of a chapter per day?—They are lectured on more than that, probably half a chapter; sometimes I am an hour lecturing them on ten or twelve verses, according to the degree of incident.

When your course of lectures begins with a particular part of the gospel, is it your practice to confine yourself to that during the four months that a young man stays with you, or do you take him generally through the New Testament?—We confine him to that generally; at the same time there is such a connection between one part of the New Testament and the other, that we refer them frequently to other parts; and also to the Old Testament.

Have you hitherto confined yourself within the limits of the four gospels?—Yes, and the Acts of the Apostles.

Do you ever intend to go beyond those limits?—I have not made up my mind upon it; it depends upon the will of the committee of the association.

Have they intimated to you any wish upon the subject?—No.

Is there no reference made to any exposition of the Church catechism to those young men?—No.

How are they supposed to become acquainted with it?—They must be acquainted with the Church catechism before they come in.

We speak of expositions; Mann's, Crossman's, and Lewis's, for example?—We have made use of no exposition except the catechism broken into short questions, which the children make use of.

Is any reference made to those expositions of the Church catechism in the course of your lectures?—No, not at all.

In what manner do you suppose those candidate teachers, when they go to their respective schools, will communicate religious instruction to the children under their care; by the same species of scriptural lecture, or teaching them the catechism?—By the same species of scriptural lectures.

From the advantage you presume they receive while with you, do you conceive they are capable of undertaking that duty?—If they were longer in the institution I am confident they could undertake it much better, but at the same time many of them are fully qualified.

Do you find when they begin to attend your lectures they have a pretty clear view of the outlines of the religion of the established church?—I think generally speaking the young men are tolerably acquainted with the Scriptures, for in fact they cannot be admitted unless they have made some tolerable proficiency in the Scriptures; but at the same time they are not acquainted with the mode of questioning, and I may say extracting the spirit of it.

Have they a sufficiently clear view of the nature of the doctrines of the Christian religion—a correct view of them?—I think many have.

You alluded to some regulation that ensured that no young man should be admitted without some knowledge upon the subject of religion; will you explain the nature of that regulation?—They are subject to an examination in the presence of the committee before they are admitted, and the committee have the power of admitting or excluding them.

Have they in fact excluded many?—Yes, several.

On the ground of insufficiency?—Yes.

Examination of
Rev. James Aickin,
20 Dec. 1825.

What should you suppose is the most advanced age of any candidate teachers who have been under your care?—I should think thirty-eight; I think I had one thirty-eight; it is generally from twenty to thirty.

Do you in general find them sufficiently humble in their manner, and sufficiently disposed to receive your instruction with deference.—Generally so.

Do you think it is their general feeling, that they have an opportunity of deriving particular advantages from the situation in which they are placed?—I am sure it is.

Are they at liberty to leave the Foundling Hospital if they should conceive a dislike to the scene around them during the four months?—On a special application to the committee I dare say they would be at liberty, but I should think it must be with the concurrence of the clergyman who recommended.

Has any instance occurred of a candidate teacher desiring to put an end to his instruction?—Yes, some instances.

How were those cases disposed of?—The applicant was permitted to go away with the consent of the clergyman who recommended him.

Was there any resistance made to the gratification of their wish to go away?—I do not think there was on the application of the clergyman.

Has there been any instance of gross misconduct in a candidate teacher while within the walls of the Foundling Hospital?—Not of gross misconduct, with the exception of those two expelled; they were guilty of a degree of insubordination that was contrary to the rules.

How soon is the number to be completed to thirty?—It depends upon the applications we receive from the country.

Have you room prepared for them?—Yes.

Are you aware of any steps having been taken to make it generally known throughout the country that applications may be made?—There are at this moment circulars struck off that will be forwarded to every clergyman in Ireland, stating the rules and regulations.

As yet there have been no such steps taken?—With the exception of an advertisement in the newspapers.

[The witness was directed to furnish a copy of the circular alluded to.]

Are there any gentlemen who act as visitors of the school?—Yes, each member of the training school committee takes it in rotation.

How often do they attend?—Sometimes once or twice a week; there is no regular time.

Will you mention the names of the committee?—Sir Francis Lynch Blosse, Mr. Magee, Mr. Russell, Mr. Foote, Mr. Paulus Emilius Singer, Mr. Dickenson, and Mr. Murray, and the two secretaries of the association.

We understand you to say there has lately been a rule established that the young men shall not go without the walls of the hospital?—Yes.

Will you describe the portion of the hospital they are at liberty to range in?—In the boys court, and occasionally in the field.

In what way are they prevented having communication with the females?—There is a porter between the male and female department, who has orders not to admit any one.

Is the Foundling Hospital so divided by walls, or in any other way, as to make it impossible for the male part of the inmates to communicate with the females?—I should think it would be impossible.

Is there by walls such an effectual separation?—Yes.

Has there been any wall built?—No; but the plan they have adopted at present I think completely precludes the males from communicating with the females.

Describe the plan?—The two doors that form the principal communication with the female court are kept locked, and every avenue that leads to the dining-hall, which is in fact the only way they could communicate with the female court, with the exception of passing the porter.

Is there any thing to prevent their stepping out of the windows into the female court-yard?—Yes, the windows are nailed down.

Are they barred?—I do not know that all of them are; some of them are.

Are not the girls constantly in the eyes of those young men; do not a number of the windows of the building they inhabit look into the court-yard of the girls?—Yes; but there is silk paper pasted on the windows to prevent them seeing them.

You think the means taken are sufficiently effectual?—Yes.

Have the young men in this institution free access to all the parts of the building that the boys inhabit?—They have not access to the dormitories nor to the school-room.

They have to the play-ground?—Yes.

Is there much communication between them?—No, I keep them as separate as possible.

Do you find it a matter of inconvenience to you that these young men are placed in an institution with a number of individuals with whom it is desirable they should not communicate?—No; I think the young men are not fond of associating with the children in the establishment, they do not wish to do so, in fact they are so much occupied they have not time; they have but two hours in a day, and those two hours are only on the alternate days on which they can exercise.

Do the candidate masters live on friendly terms with each other?—Yes, they do in general.

Have you observed any exceptions?—I have had trifling complaints, but not of any consequence.

From what part of Ireland do the young men principally come?—I think we have had more from the north than any other part.

Any particular county?—I do not recollect without referring to the admission book.

Does

Examination of
Rev. James Aickin,
20 Dec. 1825.

Does any particular individual recommend a large portion of them?—No; there was an individual recommended three as well as I recollect.

Have any of them been Foundlings?—There were two boys from Santry charter school,

Are those the only charter school boys you have had?—Yes, to my knowledge.

Had they been candidate teachers at Santry?—I think they had.

How old were they?—About twenty or twenty-one.

Have they left you?—Yes.

Did you observe that there was any material difference between them and the average of other candidate teachers; were they either better or worse?—They were very well grounded in Scripture and in arithmetic, at least one of them was particularly so, but at the same time I found them rather difficult to manage.

In what respect difficult to manage?—They were very apt to transgress some of the rules.

Did they get certificates?—One did, and one did not he was not the full time in the institution—of course he was not entitled to it.

Was he impatient of restraint that he would not stay?—I do not know the cause of his leaving the institution.

Was his moral conduct to your satisfaction so long as he did stay?—It was tolerably good.

Did you make any observation with respect to his adherence to truth?—With respect to that young man I did not, he was but a month in the institution, I had not so good an opportunity of knowing him.

With respect to the other young man who had been educated in Santry?—I think he was rather addicted to falsehood.

Had you any opportunity of making any observations upon their honesty?—No; they appeared very impatient of restraint; one, particularly, broke through the bounds once or twice.

Did they appear to feel their own previous education as a circumstance to be proud of, or rather to be regretted?—They appeared rather puffed up with it.

Did they consider themselves superior or inferior to the candidate teachers with whom they were associated?—I think they considered themselves superior.

Your fifteen teachers instruct twenty-five boys?—Yes.

Could you not pursue your system of instruction to the teachers nearly as well if they had no boys to instruct?—The great advantage in my mind in having the boys is, that they can practise upon them.

Do they in fact practise upon them to any material extent?—They do, particularly in the mode of questioning and answering.

Do you see it done?—Yes.

Could not they extend their usefulness in practising in the hospital at large?—Yes, if they were in a longer time; but their time is very limited.

Who instructs them in Pestalozzi's arithmetic?—I instruct the head class. I have divided the training pupils into two classes, the head class under my superintendence instruct the junior pupils and the children; I generally stand over the junior class while one of the senior students is instructing it.

Do they read any books whatever while they are within the institution except those you have named?—There have been a few books given to us as the commencement of a library.

By whom?—By Sir Francis Lynch Blosse; but they have had little time to read them.

You have nothing in the nature of a lending library to take to their own sitting places?—No, we have not.

What English grammar do they learn?—Murray's.

What geography?—Sharman's geography.

Appendix, No. 46.

Examination of the Rev. T. P. Magee; Wednesday, 21st December 1825.

YOU have directed your attention particularly, we believe, to the school that has been formed in the Foundling Hospital for the training of candidate masters connected with the Association for Discountenancing Vice?—I have.

Examination of
Rev. T. P. Magee,
21 Dec. 1825.

How long is it since it was opened for the reception of candidate masters?—About twelve months; I think the master was appointed in September, and the first admission was about the second week in January.

The number of candidate masters at present in the institution is about fifteen we understand?—Yes.

And you contemplate carrying that number to about thirty?—Yes.

What is the time it is intended upon the average that the candidate masters should stay in the institution?—Four months.

Is it felt that will be sufficient, or do you contemplate the probability of extending it afterwards to six months, or any other period?—The idea was, that we were so limited as to number that it would not be practicable to accomplish more than a certain number in a certain time; where there is a memorial, requesting longer continuance, sent forward by the clergyman who recommended, we prolong the time.

The expense is to be defrayed out of the funds of the association?—Yes.

Examination of
Rev. T. P. Magee,
21 Dec. 1825.

Vide Estimate at the end of this Examination.

Can you state the probable amount of the expense that will be entailed upon the association by this institution?—I cannot.

When you extend the number to thirty can you form any estimate of the amount?—About 1,100 l.; but the estimate is making out.*

[The witness was requested to furnish a copy of the same.]

About ninety masters is the amount you expect to be able to send forth each year?—Yes.

Will you describe the nature and the extent of the instruction which it is proposed these candidate masters should receive?—Our object is to improve upon the machinery of the Kildare-street system, by having Church of England instruction added to it; and as far as parish clerks are concerned, we wish still further to improve upon it by the addition of psalmody.

At Kildare-street the masters have the advantage of a most extensive model school, where they can learn the most improved system of teaching; is it intended there should be a model school in the Foundling Hospital?—The committee have just determined to have a hundred boys selected from the hospital school, on purpose to have a model school for the masters to be trained to teach schools.

The one hundred boys are to form a school separate from the existing school in the hospital?—Certainly.

Are they to be the oldest boys or the cleverest boys?—They are to be selected so as to have a gradation of classes, the best boys in each gradation—suppose five classes.

Is it intended to have a system of instruction that is to be communicated to these boys by the candidate masters, as perfect in the details of its arrangement as is to be witnessed in Kildare-street?—That is the intention.

To try out all the present improvements, whether of Bell's, Pestalozzi's, or any other system?—Yes.

And it is fully expected that this model school will not be behind any model school that can be established?—That is the intention; we hope it will not.

Hitherto you do not profess to have realized that object?—No; it has been merely an experiment.

From the examination of Mr. Aickin, the superintendent of this institution, we have received an impression, that, hitherto at least, almost the entire time of the candidate masters is occupied in receiving instruction, that does not connect itself with the model school, and that their opportunities of learning how to teach children have been extremely limited?—That has not been much attended to as yet; but it is our present intention to enlarge the time still further to three weeks or a month, for the special purpose of training the masters to teach schools.

Is it intended that the candidate masters shall be confined to schools of the Association for Discountenancing Vice?—Certainly not.

Should you give the preference, ceteris paribus, to a master intended to belong to one of those schools?—There is no rule upon the subject.

Are we right in our conception that it is intended to limit the admission to Protestants of the Established Church?—There has been no rule laid down upon the subject; but we conceive that no person, who is not a member of the Established Church, will submit himself to our rules.

Do you conceive it improbable that Protestant dissenters, Presbyterians for instance, would adhere to your rules and reconcile themselves to your regulations?—If a Protestant dissenter came forward with a clergyman's certificate, there would be no objection to admit him.

What is the certificate to contain?—His appointment either as parish clerk or school-master.

You do not admit any without one of those destinations?—Not at present.

What is the regulation as to age?—The committee have been divided upon the subject; nineteen and thirty, I believe, are now determined upon as the limits.

Not exceeding thirty?—No.

Is it proposed that the entire expense of these candidate teachers should be defrayed by the association?—Yes.

What regulation is it intended to make as to the travelling expenses?—To be defrayed by the person who recommends the candidate for admission.

Are we to collect that you do not consider that the experiment has had any thing you would consider to be a fair trial?—We are satisfied with the results, as far as they have gone.

But the results you anticipate in future will be more satisfactory?—Yes; particularly in consequence of the model school now contemplated.

About how soon do you calculate upon having the whole of your machinery in active operation?—The committee have empowered Sir Francis Lynch Blosse to procure a competent master from England, and the very moment we hear of his appointment the school will commence.

Do you contemplate discontinuing the service of Mr. Aickin?—No; this other master is intended for the model school of the 100 boys.

Mr. Aickin will continue to have the general superintendence of the institution?—Yes.

Will you describe the extent of instruction in religion, which it is intended to give to the candidate masters?—A thorough knowledge, as far as we can, of the Scriptures, and reading the liturgy; in fact, to qualify them to discharge the duties of parish clerks properly.

Are there any particular books of the nature of commentaries or catechisms, that it has been determined should form a part of their instruction?—Nothing of the kind has been decided upon.

Should

Examination of
Rev. T. P. Magee,
21 Dec. 1825.

Should you suppose any particular books will be selected for that purpose, or would you leave it to Mr. Aickin, or others?—No; the books are to be selected by the committee.

It is intended there should be books selected?—Certainly.

Not merely reading the Scriptures?—No.

Is it intended that any particular catechism should be employed in the model school?—The Church of England catechism solely.

That beyond all doubt; but we mean in the nature of explanation, such as Mann's, Stopford's, Crossman's, or Lewis's?—The committee have not taken that subject into consideration.

Do you think it probable that any books of the description alluded to will in some short time be determined upon, in preference to others?—I think so; we have hitherto been contented with the candidate masters attending Mr. Murray's catechetical lectures.

Mr. Murray does not refer to any particular catechism?—No.

Will you describe the nature of the superintendence that the individual gentlemen of the committee give to this institution at present; how often they attend it, and what they do?—The members of the committee, in rotation, visit the institution weekly, but how often each member of the committee may visit in his week I cannot tell.

We may presume it will be once or twice?—Yes.

And during that time he will exercise his judgment as to what ought to be done?—Yes.

Do you anticipate having a very large demand for admissions, such as to keep the institution full?—Yes, we do, from the number of applications for admission we have lately received.

Have you as yet made it known to clergymen and others, that such facilities are to be afforded?—We have just drawn up a prospectus that is to be forwarded to every clergyman in Ireland.*

Vide Prospectus at Foot.

[A copy of the prospectus was handed in.]

Is there any circumstance connected with the institution as to which we have not inquired, that you would deem it desirable to bring under our view?—I am not aware of any thing.

Are you satisfied with the means that are taken to separate the young men in this institution from the boys and girls in the Foundling Hospital?—From the boys there is no separation; from the girls they are completely secluded.

Is it wished they should communicate much with the boys?—There is no particular wish; the boys are in the same court; it cannot be avoided.

Has it ever become a matter of discussion in the association, whether it would be desirable to have a similar institution for school-mistresses?—Yes, it has; the only point was the expense.

Supposing funds should be supplied, do you think it would be the feeling of the association, with the assistance of ladies, to establish a similar institution for school-mistresses?—

It would be, I conceive, the unanimous wish of the association: there was some intention of trying it at the Foundling Hospital, but we wished to ascertain how far the experiment would succeed as to the masters.

The question was asked particularly in reference to seeing that at Kildare place the two do exist, and that the female department succeeds as well as the other?—The sole objection has been the expense.

ESTIMATE.

PROBABLE EXPENDITURE for Thirty Pupils for Twelve Months.

	£.	s.	d.
Provisions at 1s. 3d. per day for each man	684	7	6
Provisions for two servants	40	—	—
Salary to superintendent	150	—	—
Ditto to master of model school	50	—	—
Ditto to music-master	35	—	—
Ditto to attending physician	10	—	—
Wages to two servants	10	—	—
Coals and candles	25	—	—
Soap, starch and blue	10	—	—
Books, paper, quills, ink, &c. &c.	40	—	—
Incidents	50	—	—
	£. 1,104	7	6

Received the above from the Rev. Mr. Foote, December 15, 1825.

(signed) J. Wilson.

“ PROSPECTUS.

“ Board Room of the Association for discountenancing Vice, and promoting the knowledge and practice of the Christian Religion, “ 7, Capel-street, December 1, 1825.

“ THE association have now established a training school for the instruction of parish clerks and schoolmasters; and the following are the regulations necessary to be known by all persons who may be desirous of recommending candidates.

“ The principal object in view is to qualify parish clerks and schoolmasters for discharging

Examination of
Rev. T. P. Magee,
21 Dec. 1825.

more creditably their respective duties. A clergyman of the Established Church has been placed over the institution, and the entire conduct of the seminary is under the direction of a special committee, whose members, weekly in rotation, undertake a personal superintendence of it. The pupils are lodged and dieted at the expense of the association, and every thing requisite for their education is supplied, but no travelling expenses are in any case defrayed. The time generally allowed for the pupils remaining in the institution is four months, but in particular cases, the committee have a power to extend it, on their observation of the capabilities and progress of the pupil, and having had further communication with the clergyman who recommended him.

"It will be evident that in the space of time contemplated for the pupils generally, it could not be expected that any person should be properly qualified who had not made a considerable progress previous to his being admitted; all candidates therefore for admission, must undergo a strict examination before the committee, and such as are found deficient will be rejected; the singing master deciding upon the capabilities of receiving instruction in music, in all instances of persons who are recommended as parish clerks. An important object with the association is, to improve the psalmody in the parish churches; they have therefore engaged the assistance of an excellent singing master for the institution, and particular attention is paid to this branch of education.

"The general course of instruction in the institution may be stated as follows: In the first place, religious knowledge, comprising an accurate acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures, and with the catechism and liturgy of the Church of England; and in the next place arithmetic in all its branches, on the best modern systems; geometry, with its most useful practical applications, if the pupil be capable of acquiring them; and a course of English grammar, book-keeping, and geography. The pupils are also exercised in reading portions of the liturgy aloud, every evening, to prepare them for a more correct and decorous discharge of their public duties; and they are taught to conduct schools upon the most improved system.

"No applications will be entered upon by the committee where the persons recommended are under nineteen, or above thirty; or where they have not actual appointments as schoolmaster or as parish clerk; and as it is desirable to unite in one person, wherever it may be practicable, the offices of parish clerk and schoolmaster, a preference will be given, in all cases of competition, to candidates who have the double appointment. The form of the applications is given below; they are to be directed to the Rev. James Wilson; and if sent by the post-office, under unsealed envelopes, addressed to "Sir Edward S. Lees; on the business of the Association, 7, Capel-street." The clergyman so recommending will be informed whether his candidate will be admitted to the examination, or otherwise; and in the former case, he will receive notice of the time of the examination.

"The institution has accommodation for thirty pupils; and the committee have it occasionally in their power to recommend well qualified clerks and schoolmasters, to clergymen in want of such persons.

"I, _____ minister (or curate) of the parish of _____ certify that _____ is actually engaged to perform the duties of schoolmaster,
(and) parish clerk in this parish. I have every reason to be satisfied with the testimonials of his moral and religious character, and he appears to me, in every respect, a proper person to be admitted into the training school of the association, and likely to derive material improvement from a good course of instruction. He is about the age of _____ *and has a good natural capacity for singing.

Signed, _____
minister, or curate."

Appendix, No. 47.

EXTRACT from the Examination of the Rev. Robert Daly; 15th December 1824.

Examination of
Rev. Robert Daly,
15 Dec. 1824.

HAVE you formed any opinion of the comparative effects of education in charity schools in which the children are boarded, and necessarily separated from their parents, with that which is given to children in public schools which they attend daily from their homes?— I have for many years considered that the system of charity boarding-schools was extremely erroneous, and that there was a great deal of evil connected with it: in the first place, there is a much greater expenditure of money; the sum that one of these small boarding-schools costs would give all the means of education to the whole neighbourhood around. My own opinion is, that though the heads of the children there educated are better stored with learning, that there is not that good effect produced upon those children as where you train them up in the scene in which they are afterwards to live; if you can excite any good habits in their houses, it is something accomplished; but you are never sure of any good effect produced by the instruction upon the child trained in a boarding-school, and then thrown open to the wide world afterwards. I have generally found them turn out ill; and my opinion is, that the system of education must be one that will carry it on in their own houses, connected with their families, and with the scenes they are afterwards to be conversant with in the world. I have been asked frequently to preach charity sermons.

* This latter clause may be erased, if the application should be for the pupil to be instructed only as a schoolmaster. It is requested that the post town of the recommender may be always stated in the same line with the date.

sermons for parochial schools here, as St. George's and St. Mary's, and different schools, but I have declined it, from conviction that it was a bad principle. I have said, "You must excuse me."

Have you observed that any of those schools are so much better regulated than others, that you would consider them exceptions?—Yes, some of them are better; but I am sure the principle is a bad one: great care may sometimes overcome the bad tendency of the principle, but I feel assured that the principle is bad.

Have you had any opportunity of observing the effect of the charter school education?—I have not had the same opportunity that I have had with the Foundling Hospital children. Among the charter school children they have friends to go to; but it is a dreadful state of absolute destitution that belongs to the Foundling Hospital children—it is that that makes them so much to be pitied. I have known some of the charter school children got in for three, four, or five years, by their parents, and then they were taken out, and there were their friends to receive them.

Have you known any instances of persons who have got their children into the charter schools, who would have been able to educate them if they had exerted themselves?—Yes; I have known a great many servants, and people of that kind, who have got their children into the charter schools.

* * * * *

Are not a very large number of Foundlings nursed in the county of Wicklow?—Yes, a great number.

Are many of them nursed in the parish of which you are rector?—I should think there are this year not far short of 100; I say this year, because they sent this year a great number of a certain age for the sake of attending school; there are beyond the average number of Foundlings in the parish of Powerscourt this year. I think sixty-five Foundlings attending schools in the parish, but few of them are included in the returns, as they came after the time when the average was struck.

When you say 100, does that number comprehend the whole in the parish of all ages?—Yes.

Are you sufficiently acquainted with the adjoining parishes to know whether there are a great many in them?—Yes; there are a great many farther up in the county towards Rathdrum.

Do the children in your parish fall much under your observation?—Yes, now they do a good deal; those that have been sent of a certain age, with the idea of their attending school, I see every week.

What opinion have you formed of the conduct of their nurses to them, and the treatment they receive from the children of the nurses?—About me they treat them exceedingly well, they treat them in fact as their own.

Do you think in all respects they bring them up equally as well as their own?—Yes; I could hardly state an exception to it.

Do you think they acquire an affection for them at all resembling that which they bear to their own children?—Yes, a very wonderfully strong affection for them.

Is that reciprocal on the part of both?—Yes; the unhappiest scenes I have ever seen were separating the children from those who had taken care of them for eight or nine years.

Does much affection arise among the nurse's own children and the Foundlings?—Yes; they almost always call them by her name, unless they happened to have two or three, and two happen to have the same Christian name, then they are obliged to call them by the surname; but if they have a Tom or a John, they call them by the name of the nurse, and not the Foundling name: sometimes they have a number of them, and then they cannot do that, there would be a jumble in the house; but if they have only one or two, and they have not the same Christian name as their own children, they then call them by the name of the family, and send them to school by the name of the family that nurses them, and not the Foundling names. I can state that almost all the women in my parish that have Foundlings to nurse, if they were sure that the children would be taken from them, they would not go up for the salary—they would lose their 3*l.* or 4*l.* to keep the children; but they take them up, the salary being a great object to them, in the hope that they may get the salary and the child; and they have often said, "We will not take them another year, we will keep them." There are a great number in my parish that they have kept back and not brought up, who are now living along with the families who nursed them; and I know poor women who, although they know it is a crime, and that I could not be a party to it, although inclined to wink at it, when a child has a good parent, have said, "When that child is five years old I will not take it up to the hospital, I will lose the money."

Do they act up to that?—Yes, they do; and when I have said to them, "My poor people, I wonder you can be such fools;" they say, "Oh, sir, you do not know the love we have for a child we have had so long!"

Are those children the objects of reproach or obloquy in the neighbourhood?—I do not think they are when children, till they go into the hospital, but they are most dreadfully so when they go back again. When they are called by the name of the people in the house, nobody knows whether they are their children or not; but when they come down—the boys with a blue coat and a red cape, from the hospital, they are looked at in a very reproachful way.

Do many of the Foundling children attend at the schools?—They do; they attend now since last August, since the new regulation. They took a great many children from some of the other counties, and were anxious to have them sent to places where they would be

Examination of
Rev. Robert Daly,
15 Dec. 1824.

Examination of
Rev. Robert Daly,
15 Dec. 1824.

looked after, and they applied to me to know whether I would take care of some of them, and select some persons to whom they might send them. I said I would if they would pay me ten shillings a child for them; that if they came to me and went to the schools they must have a chance of the premiums, and I did not choose to pay that myself, or take it away from the other children that belonged to the place, and therefore if they sent them, they must give five shillings for the schoolmaster, and five shillings to help to clothe them; and for those that they have sent this year, they are to give ten shillings for their clothing and education—on those terms they have sent between forty and fifty children.

Of what ages?—From five to eight the poor people are obliged to feed and clothe them; but if they go to my school, if they attend with certain regularity, they will be entitled to rewards. I said to the governors of the Foundling Hospital, these poor children will have the chance of premiums in my school, and I must either give extra premiums on account of their number or take them from my own children, and therefore you must give me five shillings a child to provide their rewards, and I will give them a great coat, or a pair of shoes, or a little suit of clothes, and the other five shillings shall pay the master.

Do the nurses, who are Roman-catholics, appear to take great pains to educate the children in their own religion?—Yes, they do.

Do they permit them to go on Sunday to church?—Yes, they do now, because the children would be taken from them if they did not do it, but till this year and a half they did not do it; it was a very hard thing to get them to send them to school or to church.

Both with respect to their instruction and sending them to church do they treat them as their own children?—Yes, uniformly as their own children.

Have you ever known any one instance in which a nurse had voluntarily sent a Foundling child to the church when her own children went to chapel?—Yes; there are some Roman-catholics about me whom I have a good opinion of; I have said to them, "Do you think it a wrong thing, when you are intrusted with a child, to send it to school or to church? if you do I would not give you the child, but I think you are honest, and if you say you do not think it a wrong thing to let the child be brought up according to the religion of those who send him to you, I will let you have the child." And they do most scrupulously send the children to church and school.

Was it a condition required of the nurses heretofore that they should as far as possible educate the child in the Protestant religion?—It was required that they should send the child to church and school after a certain age, but they did not do it.

Have they always been desired to do it?—I do not think always; I think there was very little care about it some time ago.

Have you been able to observe what effect has been produced by the system lately introduced of transferring the children from Roman-catholic nurses to Protestant nurses?—I think the effect has been good as far as the desire of the Foundling Hospital has been to bring them up as Protestants and not as Roman-catholics.

You used an expression that great pains were taken to educate them in the Roman-catholic faith—can you point out exactly what course was pursued?—As far as I know they are uniformly taught their prayers according to the forms of the Roman-catholic church; they teach them the prayers at the youngest age, as soon as ever the children can speak, and I know they bring them to the chapel too along with their own children.

Have you ever known any of them taken to the confirmation that is practised in the Roman-catholic church?—I do not know that myself, but there have been instances that I have no doubt I could authenticate of children being taken as early as seven years old to receive the sacrament in the Roman-catholic church, but I cannot speak from my own knowledge—it was told to me by a person that I have every reason fully to believe, but it never came within my knowledge.

Have you ever had occasion at all to consider whether the 3*l.* a year paid for the children, is too little or too much?—I think it too little; the more respectable people, that take good care of their own children, do not like to have them from its being so very low.

Is there a class of persons who could receive them in a rank of life somewhat superior to those who receive them at present, who could be induced by superior pay to take them?—Yes; people who would be very glad to have them if it was not for the small sum; they are very fond of having the Foundling children for this one reason—they are sure to be paid; they know the day they will be paid, and if they have any character at all, any body will advance them goods upon the payment of the Foundling children. A great number of poor people about me endeavour to earn a little by getting servants children from town; they perhaps pay them 5*l.* or 6 guineas a year, and after a time leave them their children. I saw two children the other day in an elderly woman's house, they were promised to be paid 6 guineas a year; but they could not find out where the parents were, and she has them upon her hands; therefore the certainty of payment by the Foundling Hospital makes them more anxious to take them than they would other children.

Will that poor woman keep those two children?—Yes, just as her own; she could not open the door and turn them out, and she could not get any body else to take them. There is a poor woman near me who has two grown up children; after the first two or three years she did not receive a farthing for them, and she has brought them up as her own.

Are many of them nursed by Protestants?—Yes; but the great majority by Roman-catholics.

When the children are not returned to the hospital at the proper time, what steps do the governors take to reclaim them?—They do not take proper steps; I should suspect they are glad to hear no more of them; I have written to them and told them of children sometimes, but in many instances I have not, because I thought the children were just as well there as any any where they could put them; in other cases, where they were with bad nurses, I have written to them and they have not attended to it.

Are we to understand you, that when the children are not brought up to Dublin, to entitle the person having them to the wages, that no question is asked by the Foundling Hospital?—I can state many instances in which no effectual question was ever asked; no inquiry ever came to my ear, certainly no inquiry that ever took the child out of the hands of the poor people to the hospital, that I can prove; I could bring many children from the parish of Powerscourt, that were not taken up for payment, and are there now at this moment.

Is the only information the governors of the Foundling Hospital receive of the children by the application for payment?—Yes, if the child dies in the mean time, they require a certificate from the clergyman, that it died at such a time, that they may pay up to that time; but if the woman does not choose to go up with the child, they make no inquiry about it. Applications have been made to them about children that they did not attend to—they do not follow them up: there is a child this very year, a boy in my parish, that I wrote to them about, and there has not been any thing done about it.

Does not it sometimes happen that the nurses stay for two years before they go for their pay?—They have one day for paying those who cannot attend upon their proper day; they have a time for paying for children where the nurses may be ill; they have a day in November to pay their regular children, and they state that any nurse that does not come by that day, will not receive any thing for them that year; whether they pay two years I cannot say.

In those instances where you say the board have done nothing effectual, have they answered your letter?—I cannot distinctly state that, because I have written about other things; they may have said they would inquire, but I know they have not done the thing, that I can answer for—I can produce the children. The board now correspond with me, and I have recommended women to them to nurse the children, but I have no control over those who go up, they are not paid through me; and if I write to them that certain people are keeping back their children, or that certain children that had been taken from those people had run out of the hospital, and come back and are with them, I would generally state that they take no notice of it. I will not say they have not answered it, but the children are in the parish of Powerscourt at this moment that I have written about, and they do not send for them.

Do the nurses obtain from you any certificate of good conduct towards the children?—No, they obtain from me a certificate within the last two years of their sending them to church and school after a certain period, without which the governors take the children away.

Do you think that certificates of that kind are signed as matters of form?—I have no doubt they are often; I think the best security is having the whole certificate in the handwriting of the person signing it.

Are the Protestant nurses exactly in the same condition of life as the Roman-catholic nurses?—Yes, generally they are; about me there are more of the poor people Roman-catholics than there are Protestants; if you were to get twenty of each class, the Protestants would be rather in a better line of life than the Roman-catholics.

Do you see any difference in their treatment of the children with respect to kindness?—No, I do not; I think the Roman-catholics are more disposed to keep the children there—they have an extra reason for it.

What do you conceive that extra reason to be?—If they are fond of the child they would be glad to have them in their own faith, they would feel in parting with them an additional pang.

Do you think the system of transferring the children from one nurse to another has a bad effect upon their character; does it break in upon the affection which seems to be substituted for that of parental feeling?—I should think if they were transferred young it would be a very good plan, because persons might be found to nurse them till they are three or four years old who would not be proper persons to have them afterwards, and to transfer them from those to respectable people who take care of their own children was a good plan.

Would it not be a better plan to seek out, in the first instance, a Protestant nurse; the question is put particularly with respect to greater affection subsisting on the part of a woman who has a child to take care of for some years than one who has had it a short time?—You cannot get a sufficient number of Protestant nurses without a much larger sum being paid for them, and therefore you bring into the field a different class of people.

Stating to you that the number of admissions into the Foundling Hospital has been reduced from 2,000 to 500 annually, do you not think that a sufficient number of unexceptionable Protestant nurses might be obtained?—Not at 3*l.* a year.

Do you think 4*l.* a year would be sufficient?—I think 4*l.* would do more; for a young child they pay 2*l.* extra; no woman on the face of the earth would take an infant for 3*l.*; the woman must give up her time entirely to it; in the other case they are no great trouble to them: 4*l.* and 2*l.* make 6*l.* and many decent people would be glad to get that 6*l.*

Have you ever had any opportunity of observing the state and condition of the children when they were about to be removed into the Foundling Hospital, and to see what these same children had become after having undergone the routine of instruction there, and afterwards apprenticed out?—Not the same children. I think I only know one boy whom I knew before; he went into the hospital, and since he came out he is not a favourable specimen certainly, but I have not an opportunity of judging.

Do you know the general character and appearance of the children sent into the hospital, and have you had any opportunity of observing their general character after they came out?—

Examination of
Rev. Robert Daly,
15 Dec. 1824.

No, because I have set my face against receiving any children into my parish who have been in the Foundling Hospital.

What has been the cause of that feeling?—I felt them a charge upon me that I was not able to discharge; I felt there were so many more persons coming into my neighbourhood that I was chargeable for; I considered them coming under peculiarly unfavourable circumstances, and for these last eight years I have given but one recommendation to any family to get an apprentice out of the Foundling Hospital.

What do you mean by “unfavourable circumstances”?—I have remarked that no children turn out so ill as those children.

Have you been led at all to examine the causes of that?—I think it is the degraded state they are in, in society that is unfavourable to them.

What do you mean by turning out ill?—Most of the females that I have known have turned out profligate; and there is one thing that I have remarked, that there is not a Protestant in the parish of Powerscourt, except a Foundling himself, that would have a Foundling girl for his wife; they are looked upon as degraded, and are then either open to prostitution, or are married by Roman-catholics who are some of them lower in society, so that they have not their fair chance of being settled in life as married women.

When they are married to Roman-catholics of the rank you have described, do they become Roman-catholics?—Yes, almost always; I know but one or two exceptions.

How do the boys usually turn out?—I think they have generally turned out better. I cannot speak so much against the boys turning out as against the girls; there are some decent young lads in my neighbourhood that have been in the Foundling Hospital.

Have you known of any instances of girls returning to Dublin for the purpose of prostitution?—Not for that; but I know a great many have ended in that way, from want and different things of that kind.

But who had been previously sent to the country, and had returned to town?—Yes; they have often been destroyed in the very places they were sent to; there is no one to call them to account for it. A profligate fellow feels that a Foundling girl has no friend, and he would not offer her that which is honourable; she is more exposed to vice than any description of woman in the country, and from that circumstance I have not for nine years signed a recommendation for one Foundling girl to be brought as an apprentice to my parish.

Have the children that have remained in the families where they were nursed, received the same protection that the children of the nurse received?—The same affection and the same care.

Have they turned out the same?—Yes, just the same as the rest.

Do you think it would be possible to carry into effect any scheme that should secure in the first instance, that the children should be sent to Protestant nurses, and should then continue in the families of the nurses; their education to be provided for in schools in their immediate neighbourhood, and that a sum of money should be provided to assist the nurses and their family in providing for them?—I should certainly think there could be such a plan, if they were continued in the neighbourhood of good schools, to be as members of the family of the people that brought them up; and if they were apprenticed or disposed of from that, they would always have a family to go back to: if a poor Foundling child is turned out of the place he goes to (and he is as liable to behave ill, or to be used ill, as other children), he has no other place to go to in the wide world.

Do you think if a moderate apprentice fee was given to a child, and an option was afforded to the nurse of taking that child as an apprentice for the term of the apprenticeship, that in most instances it would have the effect of inducing the family in which the child had been reared, to continue to extend their care over it?—I should think the giving the apprentice fee to a poor woman who had reared the child would be throwing it away.

Have you not assumed, in your former answer, the probability of a child being taken away from the care of that nurse to be apprenticed to a stranger?—That is what I would do; I would apprentice them to a stranger, as a poor man would do his own child, and then they have their nurse as a parent to go back to if any thing happens to them; whereas, if you paid the apprentice fee to the nurse, you would not get any thing for it.

The question supposes that the annual payment to the nurse would necessarily cease about the period when the apprenticeship should commence—do you see either any objection or any recommendation to the nurse or her husband becoming the master or mistress of the apprentice, rather than a stranger?—I do; because I think by their being put to a stranger, he would be better qualified to teach them a trade, and then they would have a parental house as a place for them to look to; you would provide in two ways for them by that instead of one; and you might be quite sure, if there was an option with the nurse to get the apprentice fee, they would always strive to retain them, and the child would not be a gainer by it; whereas if you apprentice them, the poor woman must get rid of her children in some way, and you dispose of that child for her, at the same time that there is a retreat to this house for the child if any thing happens to the person it is bound to, or if it runs away or behaves ill, it will run home.

If an apprentice fee were provided for a child so circumstanced, would it not be placed in a situation better than a child of the nurse's?—Yes, it would; if there was proper care taken to have them apprenticed to people who ought to have them, they would have that advantage over the nurse's child.

Do you think it would be practicable for the governors of the Foundling Hospital to establish a correspondence with the clergymen of the respective parishes to ensure a due attention to the education of the children so circumstanced?—It is hard to get people to take responsibility upon themselves.

Examination of
Rev. Robert Daly,
15 Dec. 1824.

Do you consider that the children, before they are returned to the Foundling Hospital, are as fine looking children, in a physical point of view, as the general average of the children of the peasantry of the country?—I should rather think not, generally so; but I have been remarking to some friends near me, that the Foundling children about us are as fine children as I ever saw in my life; but still I have a sort of feeling as if they are not always equal to other children, as if hardship of carriage, or things of that kind, may have injured them; but the children about me are as fine children as I ever saw in my life.

Have you ever had an opportunity of observing whether the Foundling children who have passed through the hospital, are as fine in their physical appearance as those who have not passed through it?—I have not had an opportunity of judging; I only know one boy who has been so circumstanced, they seldom apprentice them in the same county.

Have you any grounds for forming an opinion as to the degree of religious education that Foundlings receive in the Foundling Hospital?—I have reason to think that as far as mere outside instruction, they are very well instructed; but I have no reason to think that they are instructed in a way to have influence upon them; I have not seen it.

Have you had any instance of a child attending your own Sunday school, that had previously passed through the Foundling Hospital?—Yes, I had four or five in it.

Did you observe any thing particular as to their instruction?—No, they knew the Scriptures well; their heads were well stored in general.

Were they all able to read upon leaving the Foundling Hospital?—Yes, all that come out from the Foundling Hospital as apprentices are able to read; there is an exception; there have been two or three who were anxious to keep their children; there are two in my parish that did not pass through the Foundling Hospital; they were only there a few weeks and they could not read, but those who come out at their full time can read very well.

Appendix, No. 48.

EXTRACTS from the Examination of the Rev. James Carlile; 25th November 1824.

Examination of
Rev. James Carlile,
25 Nov. 1824.

HAS the boarding school answered the expectations of the persons who established it?—It is difficult to answer that; certainly it has not answered my expectations, and there are others of the gentlemen in the session quite of the same opinion.

In what way has it not answered your expectations?—The children, in general, have not turned out so well as one should have expected in theory, by removing from intercourse with the world, and educating them exclusively in the school; it has not manifested itself so effective a system as we were led to suppose it would have done. A very large proportion have been withdrawn by their parents, or ran away from the school; and a considerable number of those apprenticed have run away from their masters.

Is it found that by removing the children from their parents and friends, and putting them under the care of masters and mistresses, they are, in point of fact, removed from temptation?—I do not conceive they are, by any means, but very frequently brought into it.

* * * * *

Do you conceive that the parents would be more likely to prevent or to correct bad habits than the master or mistress?—I do not think there could be one single moment's doubt, when the question is between a respectable parent and a master; the only doubt would be when the children are not of respectable parents; in such cases it may be supposed that a decent master will do more to train up children to decency than a profligate parent; yet this is balanced by several considerations, such as the danger of improper masters, and the difficulty of detecting them; the danger of children of profligate parents corrupting the children of decent parents, among whom they may be introduced. A few instances of the children of decent parents introduced among vicious children, and placed under the care of a worthless master or mistress, is sufficient to counterbalance all the good that any school is likely to do to the children of profligate parents: besides it often happens that a parent, although profligate himself, is at pains to preserve his children from his own vices; and such parents frequently succeed in rearing to ideas and habits of decency. The conductors of such schools have always to choose between evils; namely, either to select only the children of creditable parents, and then to remove such children from their relations, and place them under the exclusive care of a kind teacher; or to select only the children of profligate parents, and thus hold out a premium to vice; or to mix reputable with disreputable children, and thus to run the hazard of rendering the vices of the bad common to all.

* * * * *

Do you conceive that the effect of separating children from their families and connections, and shutting them up in boarding schools, has the effect of quenching those kind feelings in their hearts, which would otherwise exist there?—Unquestionably, to a great extent. The children who are educated, at least for a considerable time, at boarding schools, and who see little or nothing of the anxieties and labours of parents for their maintenance and their moral tuition, cannot feel the same interest in their parents as those who have witnessed all their solicitude; and I believe that in point of fact it will be found that children who are reared in boarding schools, are very seldom disposed to do much for their parents, or near relations in distress; from what I have seen of the dispositions and habits of children who have left our school, I conceive that they were much more likely to prove burdensome to their parents and relations than to assist them.

Do you think four or five years passed in a boarding school of the description spoken of, have a tendency to qualify or disqualify the children for their future prospects in life?—

Examination of
Rev. James Carlile,
25 Nov. 1824.

I think they get habits of idleness, which they seldom conquer: they have nothing to do but to be taught to read and write, and such other matters as may be done about the school; they have not those habits of industry that are likely to fit them for life.

Do you conceive the condition of the children in such a school is one of greater or less hardship than it would be in a parent's house?—I think it is to the children of the school one of more tedium and less interest, but not so much hard work.

Is it a state of less exertion?—Yes, if the people are in any degree industrious.

Do you conceive it desirable that children from their early youth should be inured to those exertions that have been referred to?—I think it is highly important that they should, but not overworked. There is also a distinction to be made respecting the nature of the exertion in these schools, it is usually of a totally different kind from what they would find in their parents house; they would there be employed in any sort of drudgery—bringing in coals and cleaning out the dirtiest places about the house; and in schools they are rather employed in a genteel sort of occupation, such as learning lessons, writing, &c. and the consequence is, that when they go out into the world, they are usually disgusted with common drudgery.

* * * * *

Can you state whether the feelings of the children in the school of St. Mary's Abbey are generally those of shame or pride, in consequence of their education in the school?—After they have been for some time in the school, the prospects of their future life get much higher than they were when they entered the school. We had a child the other day whose mother, when she was brought into the school, I visited; I found her a widow woman, who had five or six children in a room full of filth and the most offensive smells; the child has been in the school some years, and there was an application from a very decent man, a shoemaker, to train her to binding ladies boots and shoes, which he represented to be a good trade, and by which I found a woman could earn a good livelihood; but the child was greatly shocked and chagrined at the idea of such an apprenticeship, although at the time she came into the school she would have been delighted to have been taken into any kitchen, or received by such a person to assist in the common work of his family for her food; and such instances are perpetually occurring.

Do you think those projects of ambition salutary, and as being likely to lead to greater exertion, or to lead to disappointment?—They make them dissatisfied with their apprenticeships, and they form one great cause that induces them to leave their apprenticeships.

Are the children ashamed of having been educated at a charity school after they leave it?—I think there is the strongest tendency to be ashamed of it. They seldom return to the congregation in which they were exhibited as charity children; the disposition to get rid of that is one of the effects of their being ambitious.

* * * * *

Do you think, in after life, it is a circumstance they consider an opprobrium to have been educated in the school at Mary's Abbey?—In some few cases we have found them disposed to recognise us again, but from the way they talk of it, they show they consider it an effort; they say, "We are not at all ashamed of it," from which we infer that there is a temptation to be ashamed, and accordingly the greater part of them never do look near us; some of them have turned away from me, and would not recognise me in the street, though they knew me well.

To what number of children do you refer in making these observations?—To the whole of the children who have passed out of it during the last thirteen years.

* * * * *

Have you found that the minds of the children have been much impressed by the scriptural instruction they have received?—They very readily receive scriptural instruction, so as to be ready to give accurate answers; nothing is more easy than to excite a little competition between them, and you may make them answer admirably; but in very few cases have I seen it have any influence upon their hearts, so as to take it home as a practical matter to themselves, though I have endeavoured to impress upon their minds that religion is a personal and practical thing; I have frequently rivetted their attention to such subjects, but when you come to the point of practical effect upon them, I have observed such effect in but very few instances.

If the children were not removed from their parents, but continued still in the ordinary habits and circumstances of life, do you think they would see that religion was more closely connected with themselves, than they do being confined within the walls of a school?—I think the experience of Sunday and day schools is to that effect; they would then have the parent's sanction for what was taught them at the school—even if the father was not a religious man, he would perhaps give his sanction to the instruction which they received in the school, and if he was a religious man, it would have ten thousand times more effect than any thing that could be said to them at the school; the approbation of it at home would add prodigiously to the effect of any instruction given in the school.

Have many instances occurred to your knowledge in which, from peculiar circumstances, you have been able to make impression upon the minds of the children?—There have been very few instances—some have seemed to be seriously affected, but a very small proportion; there were two that died, and another or two at the utmost that seemed to be under serious impressions. With respect to the superior efficacy of instruction given while the children are staying with their parents, I would make this observation; there is one particular vice of females, that of lewdness, which is a subject we can scarcely touch upon; the consequence is, that the child goes out into the world totally unprepared to guard against that temptation:

Examination of
Rev. James Carlile,
25 Nov. 1824.

temptation: the mistress may, but very few mistresses I apprehend do touch upon it, and if they did, it would have comparatively little effect; whereas a child living with its parents, and probably hearing reference to a woman that has lost her character, and witnessing the horror with which another speaks of that vice, is more impressed with the danger of it, and made better to understand the effect that such a fall would have upon her future life, than she would be by any thing that could be said in the school; and I believe it will be found that that description of vice carries off a very large proportion of the girls that go out of these schools; they are not warned against it; it is a matter upon which the clergyman can say little or nothing, as its coming from him might do more harm than good; the mother and father could say with effect what nobody else could say; and I have reason to believe it would be found, on inquiry, that what I have stated respecting the after lives of girls reared in charity schools is the fact.

Have any facts come to your knowledge that have led you to the opinion you entertain upon this subject?—There are none I could give in evidence, as I received them only at second hand; I have reason to fear some of our own girls have gone upon the streets, and I have strong reasons to entertain the same fears with regard to the children of many of the female charity boarding schools in Dublin. It has been stated to me by persons who had abundant opportunity of knowing the facts, that a very large proportion of the female patients in the Penitentiaries and Lock Hospitals of Dublin, consist of young women who had been inmates of charity boarding schools.

Would you except from that observation the parochial female schools of Dublin?—Not if they are boarding schools.

Does there exist out of doors a prejudice against the children educated in these schools?—Among the lower class of people there does; I think in the upper class of people there is no such prejudice; on the contrary, that they would prefer them if they found them generally to turn out well; in this, however, they are frequently disappointed, so that few are disposed to receive them; they find it difficult to make the other servants agree with them—they are placed in a sort of dilemma with regard to them; if they keep the charity child excluded from the other servants, it excites envy and ill-will, and the child is often rendered proud and unmanageable; or if it is permitted to associate with the servants, it very frequently will be corrupted.

Are they rendered worse than the other servants, or do they only fall to the level of the general class of servants?—If pains are taken to separate them from the other servants, then servants are afraid of their telling tales, and they either annoy them or endeavour to corrupt them, and thus to get them to side with them; and charity children lying under a kind of reproach among servants, if once they are corrupted, they sometimes are led further into vice than other children would be, for the purpose as it were of redeeming their character in the kitchen; just as a young person who has made a serious profession of religion, but who has afterwards fallen into bad company, will often go further in profanity and vice than the other, as if it were purposely to convince them, that although he once seemed to be religious, he is now as bad as themselves, and may safely be received into their fraternity.

* * * * *

You have said that fifty-seven children have passed through the school?—Yes, up to August 1822, and a few more since that time.

Can you state exactly what has become of those children, dividing them into classes most convenient for the purposes of statement?—Not precisely; I can give a sketch of them; of those fifty-seven up to 1822, there were apprenticed or provided for by the governors thirty-two, eloped from the schools eighteen, four were withdrawn by their relations, and there have died in the schools three, making a total of fifty-seven.

In the first place, what became of the eighteen that eloped, so far as you can state?—I can state but with regard to a very few of them; we have reason to believe some proportion of them were removed in consequence of being Roman-catholics, and by the influence of the Roman-catholics—I traced some of them to Roman-catholic institutions.

What is your impression as to what became of the remainder?—My impression is that they have not turned out well; some went back to their relations, and their relations were exceedingly anxious to bring them back to the school; sometimes they have not been admitted, at other times they have, if they have not staid away any length of time.

* * * * *

Speaking of the thirty-two that were apprenticed, have you any means of knowing how many eloped from their masters?—There were sixteen of them eloped from their apprenticeships.

* * * * *

Do you conceive, upon the whole, as much pains have been taken with the religious instruction of the children in St. Mary's Abbey, as in other charity boarding schools in the city of Dublin?—I do conceive so.

Have you felt it particularly your duty to attend to them in that respect?—Yes, I have.

In how many instances have you had reason to be satisfied with the result of your care?—In point of knowledge the progress of the children has been satisfactory in many instances, but in practical religion in very few.

Can you state how many out of fifty-seven?—It is difficult to judge of the heart; there may be more seriousness in a child than you are led to imagine. I should not think out of the fifty-seven, so long as they remained in the school, there were more than four or five of them that were seriously impressed, and even of some of them I had some doubt.

* * * * *

Would the same sum that is now applied to the maintenance of one of these children

Examination of
Rev. James Carlile,
25 Nov. 1824.

in the school, if distributed in a different manner, produce greater relief and more beneficial effects upon the children of the poor?—Decidedly so. I consider that in any family if the same sum now expended upon the education and maintenance of one child was expended upon the whole family, it would be much more judicious for the relief and instruction of the family. Suppose a family of four or five children, according to the present system, you pick one out of the rest, and educate that one in a style much superior to the rest, whereas you might for the same sum educate the whole, and leave something for the support of the family, they would be kept together, and they would all be educated, and in all respects the 13*l.* or 14*l.* a year would be incomparably better distributed among them.

* * * * *

Assuming the probability of a moderate degree of neglect and inattention on the part of the nurse, is it your impression upon the whole that a given number of children, suppose 700, distributed under the care of 2 or 300 Protestant nurses, are more likely to become efficient members of society than if they were drafted into the Foundling Hospital, in which there are usually 1,200 children?—I should think much more likely to become useful members of society by being connected with a family where they form domestic affections.

It being also understood that the governors of the Foundling Hospital are in very particular correspondence with the clergymen of the parishes in which such children are situated, and who undertake to exercise over their education peculiar superintendence?—I should think the children were much more favourably circumstanced for turning out good members of society by being in those families, than by being in the hospital.

Appendix, No. 49.

EXTRACTS from the Examination of James Digges La Touche, Esq.;
14th December 1824.

Examination of
J. D. La Touche,
Esq.
14 Dec. 1824.

HAVE you paid much attention to the system of education pursued in schools, in which the children are boarded as well as educated, and in which they are necessarily separated from their parents and friends?—I have long had my mind turned towards it; and though I cannot say I have much experience upon the subject, yet the strong impression upon my mind has for a long time been, that there was something exceedingly futile in the expectation of good from boarding schools, where the children are received early and shut out from all intercourse with society, and then, just at the most dangerous age, cast upon the ocean of life without any friend and without any experience of life, and shipwreck, I conceive, must too often follow; it is a wonder it is ever avoided. It strikes me that a child educated in a cabin really enters life, as far as circumstances are concerned, with more advantages than a child educated in a boarding school—and circumstances will operate more or less with respect to common life.

* * * * *

Have any instances of the kind (infanticide or abandonment of children), come to your knowledge?—There was an instance of a Foundling that occurred last year in the parish I belong to; I do not know for what reason it was not admitted into the Foundling Hospital; there were different stories about it; but she is living in right good health; there was a poor woman took her, and she has continued to support her literally without any payment. I do not approve of boarding schools, at the same time really it is a hard thing to know what to do in the state of society that exists in Ireland at present, where there is no legal provision for the poor, nor do I desire there ever should be where there is such an immense mass of poverty; it really sometimes does occur, when every thing about one is imperfect, whether the adoption of a perfect system will work well. I do not think there is an animal on the face of the earth that excites more my commiseration than one of those children going out to any place; I think a gentleman's house the last place I would wish to see them in.

Why do you think they are particularly ill calculated to be servants in gentlemen's houses?—I think gentlemen's servant are very bad company for them, and I think gentlemen and ladies are very bad masters and mistresses for them. They come out of those schools overgrown children, with many of the pettish tempers and manners of children; therefore, supposing they got a stubborn fit, you have one of those children quartered upon you for two or three years; what are you to do with them? you cannot give them a beating, every feeling of your mind would revolt against that; you do not like to get one of your servants to beat them, that is very unpleasant too; what can you do? you cannot get rid of them. At the same time, I have known of young persons educated in charter schools, and the orphan house, that have been completely blessings to the families which received them, they have been the most excellent that could be conceived; but at the same time that is only what we see continually, that Divine Providence counteracts the evils of human systems.

Are the cases of failures more frequent than those of success?—I have not experience enough to answer that. I have heard it said by those who have been chaplains to penitentiaries, that it is a very hard thing to do good to people that are locked up, who are excluded from all intercourse with the world; I think there is a reason for it that satisfies my own mind, that the temptations that occur tend to the formation of principle, although they also frequently tend to the destruction of it; the person gradually becomes accustomed to wield the instruction that he requires, and when they are locked up it sinks merely as a kind of science into their mind, and is not an operative principle; at the same time I would state, that I believe that the generality of persons that have been dismissed from from the penitentiaries have turned out well, to which, however, we may suppose their experience of the miseries of vice much contributes.

Do you think, from the observations you have been able to make upon the subject, that the character of the children from those schools is decidedly different from those of the children who are educated in cabins and cottages, and day schools?—I am inclined to think it is; they are overgrown children and totally unacquainted with the world, and totally unfit to deal with others; that is the impression on my own mind; I would not speak as having very large experience upon the subject, but as rather expressing an opinion grounded on my own reasoning and the opinions of others. I never had any in my own family.

Examination of
J. D. La Touche,
Esq.
14 Dec. 1824.

Appendix, No. 50.

EXTRACT from the Examination of Paulus Æmilius Singer, Esq.;

Monday, 29th November 1824.

IN your superintendence of those establishments (penitentiaries), have you had any opportunities of forming an opinion as to the effects of the different descriptions of education of females which are pursued in this country, upon the character and conduct of the women?—In those various institutions we have had many, very many instances indeed, of characters coming forward, that have been educated in various institutions in and about Dublin, from the Foundling Hospital, and the various parochial charities; but the numbers contrasted with the great aggregate of the individuals passing through, do not admit of comparison; but this I will say, without hesitation, that with regard to moral feelings, we have not discovered those from the schools to be possessed of one particle more than those who have never been in them.

Examination of
P. Æ. Singer, Esq.
29 Nov. 1824.

Do the girls appear to have lost the effect of the religious instruction they have received in those schools?—Entirely; I never saw a trace of it in any of them.

* * * * *

Of the women now in the house, what number have been educated at different schools in which they have been separated from their parents?—There are eight at present in the Lock Hospital out of 150.

Does it appear at what schools they were educated?—Yes; there are six of them from the Foundling Hospital, and I understand one from a Roman-catholic establishment on George's Hill, and one from the Arklow charter school. In our penitentiary on the Circular road, from April 1813 to November 1824, the number received into the house was 284, of whom thirty-eight passed through different charity boarding schools; of those that have passed through the penitentiary, some have gone from the house, whom we knew had been in schools, but were not able to ascertain the exact school they came from, but the thirty-eight are persons from many schools in Dublin and its vicinity.

Can you state what number of patients pass through the Lock Hospital in the course of a year?—From the 4th of March 1820 to the 4th of March 1821, 593; for the same period to 1822, 813; to 1823, 775; to 1824, 673; and from March 1824 to 27th November, 619.

* * * * *

You have stated that there are eight out of 150 now in the Lock Hospital, who have received their education in charity boarding schools?—Yes.

Is it your impression that there is the same proportion in the total number that pass through it in the course of each year?—As a matter of opinion, I should say yes.

* * * * *

Have you been able in your own mind to account at all for the fact you have stated, of so many of those girls falling into vicious habits?—I will state what my opinion is: it appears to me, from the best view I can take of the subject, that the reason why girls educated in these schools fall into vicious habits afterwards, arises from this circumstance—that they are removed in the first place from their natural protectors, whoever they may be, whether parents or other relations, and they are taken into the school and placed among strangers, the consequence of which is, that the natural feeling or tie that first bound them is broken; and they are educated in a way superior to what that particular class of individuals ought to be educated in, being nursed, if I may use the phrase, in a sort of delicacy, which when they are put out from the schools, either as apprentices or as servants, they do not meet with, and having no prior parental or relative tie to bind them (while the persons that put them out are naturally more attentive to the school than to those that have gone from it), it is natural to foresee, that without any protecting friend, such as a parent or relative to watch over them, and unfitted for the situations they go to, from the education received, they become the victims of the first temptation that falls in their way. Separation from friends seems to be a fundamental error in parochial education, together with the particular system generally pursued in such boarding schools.

Have you been able to observe what effect is produced upon the characters of the women by the system of instruction pursued in day schools, which does not produce the necessity of separating the children from their parents; have you been able to observe whether the number of persons who pass through those institutions that have not been in the boarding school are wholly uneducated, or whether any of them have received the education alluded to?—With respect to day education, it prevails very generally at present; and I have no hesitation whatever in giving my personal opinion that those educated in the day schools are by far the better educated class, and that their moral principles and conduct through life, are infinitely better than those who have passed through boarding schools. There is a school very near where I reside, superintended by young persons, and the conduct of the individual is superior to any thing I have ever been able to trace from those who have been educated in the boarding schools.

Examination of
P. Æ. Singer, Esq.
26 Nov. 1824.

Does it appear that a large proportion of the women that fall under your notice in those institutions have been entirely uneducated?—A great proportion of them, by far the greater proportion. With respect to the Penitentiary I can speak more distinctly, the greater part of them are forced to commence with their letters, to teach them to read—it is the first thing done with them on entering the house.

Of those who have been instructed, and know how to read and write, do you think as great a number come from the boarding schools as from the day schools?—I am not aware that from my own knowledge I can fix my eye upon any individuals from the day schools, so that I am not able to draw a comparison; for those I have mentioned here are from the boarding schools. I am not aware of any that have been educated in the day schools; there may be some.

* * * * *

You have mentioned that 284 persons have passed through the Penitentiary in a given time, and that 38 of those have been educated in charity boarding schools, what is your present impression as to the proportion of the remaining 250 who have been educated at all, and those who have been totally uneducated?—By far the greater proportion were totally uneducated.

Would you say three-fourths or four-fifths of the balance were uneducated?—I should say four-fifths of the 250 were uneducated.

* * * * *

From what class of schools had the greater number of the thirty-eight in the Penitentiary come?—I think certainly from the Foundling Hospital; but there is not so great a proportion from the Foundling Hospital in the Penitentiary as appears upon the eight of the Lock Hospital; for of the number from the Penitentiary that have been in schools, several of them we have not been able to ascertain what schools they were in, not being at present in the institution; they stated upon admission that they had been in schools, but the majority were certainly of the Foundling Hospital, and I think the reason is obvious why it should be the case, if the system I was given to understand was that which prevailed, but in this I am informed a change has lately taken place; the fact was this—the demand upon the hospital was extremely great, and the extent of the establishment in Dublin not at all commensurate to the demand upon it; they were therefore under the necessity of having a vast proportion of the children nursed out of the house, and I understand that the children were allowed to remain with the nurses till they arrived at a tolerably old age; a girl passed before me some short time ago, that told me she was near ten before she was brought in from nurse; when they are brought in from nurse, they are sent, as soon as possible, out as apprentices, having been with their nurses for such a length of time, not doing any thing, but acquiring habits of idleness; upon coming to apprenticeships in town, many of them have left their places, and returned back to their nurses, who not receiving further payment for their support, would not of course receive them, and several of the individuals told me that they had no remedy but to come to Dublin, and try what they could earn upon the streets.

* * * * *

Speaking upon general recollection of the thirty-eight who passed through the Penitentiary, that appeared to have been educated in charity schools, what is your opinion of the age at which they become addicted to vicious pursuits?—All young; we have had an instance in the Penitentiary so young as thirteen; that was a solitary instance.

Mention the next to that?—The average age was from fifteen to sixteen; there are at present in the Penitentiary five who have been educated in different charity boarding schools, and I should apprehend that sixteen or seventeen is the outside age of either of those five.

We have collected from you that of 150 cases at present in the Lock Hospital, there were eight individuals who had passed through charity boarding schools; that would be in the proportion of fifty-three in each thousand that pass through charity boarding schools; in your opinion would that be an exaggerated calculation?—I do not think it would.

Have you any reason to suppose that the actual proportion upon each thousand, that passes through the Lock Hospital, is less than what that calculation would point out?—No; I think the number in the house is the mean number.

* * * * *

Do you consider the instruction that might be dispensed under proper regulations, in well regulated day schools, is more or less likely to lead to subsequent good conduct, than the education administered, under all the circumstances you have described, in a boarding school?—Certainly, I have not a doubt of it; and that the day education will have not merely an influence upon the children, but those connected with them: the education the children get in a boarding school is confined to the children alone, and has no moral effect upon the family; when children are sent to day schools, there is attention paid to their cleanliness, and the children will bring home an influence upon the domestic arrangements that cannot but be ultimately serviceable; the lessons they are forced to get at home, will, to a certain degree, have that effect, and the books they bring home will have a similar result; it will also bring the teacher in contact with the family; if, for example, a child comes to school, and swears an oath, it is very likely he has heard his father swear it before he came to the school; the very fact, therefore, of an individual going to point out the error to the parent, and saying, “do not swear before your child,” must produce good; I am quite satisfied that general day school education is one of the great means that will be productive of the greatest moral results to the country.

Appendix, No. 51.

Examination of the Rev. John Beasley; Tuesday, 7th December 1824.

ARE you chaplain to the Magdalen Asylum in Leeson-street?—I am.

What number of women are supported in that institution?—The numbers vary, the average I may say is between thirty-eight and forty-two, generally about forty.

Is it the largest establishment of the kind in Dublin?—I do not know.

Is it supported by private funds?—By voluntary contributions; the Sunday collections in the chapel are the main support of the institution.

Are the women admitted upon their own applications, or upon recommendations?—Sometimes on their own applications, most generally on recommendation; there are no women received after the age of twenty, and if they present themselves before that age, they are generally received, if they seem to be inclined to turn from a course of vice, on their own application, but most frequently on recommendation.

What is the average length of their stay in the institution?—The regular time prescribed by the rules of the house is two years, but they are seldom dismissed at the end of that period, unless they have situations provided for them; sometimes they are taken by their friends.

Do many of them relapse into the course of life from which they have been taken?—The persons connected with the institution have no means of following them out into the world, generally speaking; but in many instances, where they have been able to do so, they have found many turned out quite well, and others of them not so, but the majority have turned out to our satisfaction.

Are many of them admitted very young?—Some of them very young, at an age it would shock you to see them; I am almost afraid to say what we have had them at; we have had them under fourteen.

Have you any means of knowing whether a large proportion of the unfortunate persons admitted into the Magdalen has been without education?—I think so, a very large proportion without education; when I say that, I would not be understood as meaning that they have not received the common education given in this unfortunate country, the ability to read; but I will say they are uniformly uneducated in that which can alone make education valuable; I think many of them can read and write, but I think few of them, scarcely any I may say, have received a religious education; they have not "the fear of God before their eyes," in Scripture language. A city is a peculiar hotbed of vice.

Have you an opportunity of knowing what description of schools the people have been educated in, who have received any education at all?—There is a very large proportion I think of our inmates, certainly I must say a large proportion, come from parochial schools and the Foundling Hospital. When I say large proportion, I would not be understood to say that the proportion is large according to the numbers that leave those schools, but the numbers that come to us from those schools, I think quite embrace between a third and a fourth; but whether that is an overwhelming majority, considering the numbers that leave those schools, or not, I do not know.

Must not the proportion of a third or fourth to the whole number received, be infinitely greater than the proportion that the girls educated in those schools bear to the lower orders in Dublin?—Yes; but then I should say, that their coming to us may not be a fair mode of ascertaining it, and for this reason, that the education they have received in those schools may possibly, I do not say it does, but may possibly bring the odiousness of vice before them in a shorter time, and those persons so educated may sooner come voluntarily to offer themselves to us, than young women who have received no education.

Does it appear in the communications you have with them, that they are more strongly impressed with the odiousness of vice than others?—Their subsequent conduct may differ widely from the first impression—their first impression, after receiving a moral and religious education, may be that of starting from a course of life in which they have embarked; that may be different from their subsequent conduct, it may not be sufficiently strong to guide their subsequent conduct, although it might be to give them a first impression. I do not think their subsequent conduct would authorize any body to say that they are better, and I think I may say, taking the advantages they have had into consideration, they are worse. I made particular inquiries on that point; my duty is necessarily confined to that of lecturing them; I know of nothing except what I hear from the matrons of the institution, and they do say, that the preponderance of evil is on the side of those persons who have received education, considering their advantages; they are found to be proud, and subject to many other evil passions, that are perhaps more nourished in a school than in the world at large.

When you say schools, you mean those schools in which the children are boarded and educated and separated from their parents?—Yes; such as the Foundling Hospital and the parochial schools. I am not exactly acquainted with the details of the parochial schools in Dublin, but I believe in the majority of instances they are boarded, dieted, and clothed.

Do you know enough of the particulars of each individual, to be able to say what number of those at present in the asylum have been educated at such schools?—No; that was a point I wished to ascertain, but the matron of the institution is alone acquainted with the history of these poor creatures (for it is buried in oblivion when they go, they are known by a number and not by name), and she is at this present moment ill, and could not furnish

Examination of
Rev. John Beasley,
7 Dec. 1824.

Examination of
Rev. John Beasley,
7 Dec. 1824.

me with it. I can send it in a few days. I asked the work mistress to day, and she told me the proportion at present in the asylum from those schools is not so large as it is generally; at present not more than eight. I believe there are two from the charter schools she told me. When I was a minister of a parish within fourteen miles of Dublin, so great was the evil which I saw arising from the children from the Foundling Hospital, I never gave but a single note to bring a child from the Foundling Hospital; there are two particularly that just now cross my mind: one of them died in circumstances the most melancholy from the Foundling Hospital; they are kept by their nurses to such an age that they almost invariably fall into vice.

Appendix, No. 52.

EXTRACT from the Examination of Daniel Kinahan, jun. Esq.;
Wednesday, 1st December 1824.

Examination of
Dan. Kinahan, jun.
Esq.
1 Dec. 1824.

WHAT situation do you hold connected with the Mendicity Association?—I am secretary to that association.

Are your services gratuitous?—They are.

Is there any school connected with that establishment?—There is.

What persons are put to the school?—The children of our mendicants.

What number of children attend it?—The number of boys at present upon our books is sixty-five, and the number of girls fifty-one.

Is there any house in which they live in the nature of a poor house?—In our institution we only give them shelter during the daytime, but their mothers take lodgings for them in the night, and we afford them a sufficient sum of money for their lodgings weekly, which we give them as far as possible in the character of wages.

The children are not separated from their parents, if they have parents living?—No, except at school; they are sent home to their parents at night.

In what way are those children ultimately able to get their livelihood?—Some leave the institution with their parents, others go out as servants to people in a very low class of life, and some have left our schools to support themselves by their earnings as lace makers. In our female schools we teach them the straw plaiting and lace making; some of our lace makers are able to support themselves, but the straw plaiters are not; it only supports them in the summer months. Our chief object is to teach them to read and write, so as to fit them for servants.

What number of persons are there now dependent upon the Mendicity Association?—I have an abstract of the last week; males 111, females 986, these are adults—that makes 1097; male children 127, female children 132—making a total of 259; the grand total is 1356.

Of those what number attends the schools?—There are forty-six females and sixty boys.

Are any persons admitted to receive the benefits of the institution except such as have been found begging in the streets?—Every person is admitted who has been an inhabitant of Dublin; they acquire a sort of residency by being here about six months, and they are all admitted, if they have no other means of support, we do not require them to have been actually begging in the street.

Do they apply personally?—Yes, the police of Dublin send out twelve constables every day to take up beggars, they are brought to the magistrate's office, and he discharges or detains them according to his discretion; if he detains them, he sends them to the house of Industry: he has a power of confining them.

Have you been able at all to ascertain whether the greater proportion of the persons who receive relief have been wholly uneducated?—I think from general observation I would say that two-thirds of those on our books can read and write. In the various questions put to them they are asked, can they read or write, and they give an answer accordingly, whether they can or cannot; I know upon one occasion, two or three years ago, I inspected one class of our institution, the spinners, and I know more than half of them could read and write.

Did you inquire in what school they had received their education?—No, unless they came from a charity school.

Are you able to discriminate those that have been educated in any boarding charity school from those that have not?—If they tell the truth, we have their names down in a book as having been so educated.

If the truth is not told, in which way do you think the falsehood is most frequent, that of those who have been educated in charity schools and say they have not, or those that have not been educated there, and say they have?—Those that have been educated there conceal it.

Can you tell at all from what motive?—Those that come from the Foundling Hospital conceal it, because it would be thrown out against them afterwards by their fellow mendicants as a circumstance of degradation, for even these poor people have their feelings.

Do they retain those feelings when they are receiving relief from you?—Yes, they do.

Would they consider it a disgrace to have been educated in the Foundling Hospital?—Yes, they would; a fellow mendicant sometimes finds it out after their admission, and discloses it; in the Foundling Hospital they are all branded on the arm.

Does the same feeling prevail as to other institutions?—Not so much, I believe.

Appendix, No. 53.

A STATEMENT of the total Number of Children at Nurse, in the Country, on the 10th October 1825, specifying the Number of each Age ; also, the Number of Grown Children sent to the Country for Health.

Appendix,
No. 53.

Infants under 1 year old	-	-	-	287
1 year	-	-	-	257
2	-	-	-	268
3	-	-	-	226
4	-	-	-	416
5	-	-	-	659
6	-	-	-	717
7	-	-	-	547
8	-	-	-	647
9	-	-	-	267
10	-	-	-	360
11	-	-	-	49
Grown Children in the Country for health				333
				5,033

(Errors excepted.)

Foundling Hospital, Dublin, }
January 17th, 1826.

T. Finlay, Registrar.

Appendix, No. 54.

A STATEMENT of the Number of Children transferred from Roman Catholic to Protestant Nurses, in the year 1823.

Appendix,
No. 54.

1823 - - - - - 612

Foundling Hospital, Dublin, }
November 27th, 1826.

T. Finlay, Registrar.

Appendix, No. 55.

A RETURN of the Number of Children transferred from Roman Catholic to Protestant Nurses; the Number sent to the respective Parishes, and the

REMOVED FROM ROMAN CATHOLIC NURSES.				TRANSFERRED TO PROTESTANT NURSES.
Date.	Number.	Date.	Number.	Date.	Number.	Date.	Number.
1824:		1825:		1824:		1825:
June 17 - - 4		Jan. 18 - - 1		June 18 - - 2		Jan. 10 - - 1
		- 20 - - 1		- 21 - - 1		- 27 - - 3
July 12 - - 1		- 29 - - 24		July 2 - - 3		Feb. 5 - - 8
- 14 - - 1				- 7 - - 4		- 17 - - 5
- 19 - - 13		April 13 - - 1		- 9 - - 1		Mar. 26 - - 1
- 20 - - 10		- 20 - - 2		- 13 - - 1		April 5 - - 3
- 21 - - 23		- 26 - - 3		- 15 - - 3		May 4 - - 2
- 22 - - 3		May 5 - - 8		- 17 - - 1		- 13 - - 3
- 23 - - 25		- 10 - - 5		- 19 - - 3		June 16 - - 2
- 26 - - 33		- 28 - - 2		- 20 - - 2		- 21 - - 1
- 27 - - 23		June 8 - - 2		- 21 - - 8		July 19 - - 46
- 28 - - 29		- 29 - - 5		- 23 - - 6		- 20 - - 36
- 29 - - 23				- 24 - - 14		- 21 - - 44
- 30 - - 27		July 18 - - 79		- 26 - - 26		- 22 - - 28
August 2 - - 40		- 19 - - 37		- 27 - - 30		- 23 - - 29
- 3 - - 42		- 20 - - 48		- 28 - - 30		- 25 - - 20
- 4 - - 41		- 21 - - 3		- 29 - - 30		- 26 - - 16
- 5 - - 28		- 22 - - 34		- 30 - - 35		- 27 - - 35
- 6 - - 37		- 23 - - 47		- 31 - - 20		- 28 - - 36
- 9 - - 37		- 25 - - 57		Aug. 4 - - 37		- 29 - - 55
- 10 - - 18		- 26 - - 61		- 5 - - 65		- 30 - - 40
- 11 - - 34		- 27 - - 53		- 6 - - 30		Aug. 1 - - 75
- 12 - - 25		- 29 - - 90		- 7 - - 36		- 2 - - 52
- 13 - - 17		- 30 - - 53		- 11 - - 37		- 3 - - 54
- 16 - - 18		Aug. 1 - - 53		- 12 - - 2		- 4 - - 38
- 17 - - 26		- 2 - - 19		- 13 - - 1		- 5 - - 32
- 18 - - 7		- 3 - - 41		- 14 - - 76		- 6 - - 54
- 19 - - 20		- 5 - - 52		- 16 - - 17		- 8 - - 26
- 20 - - 81		- 6 - - 22		- 18 - - 16		- 9 - - 65
- 21 - - 10		- 8 - - 75		- 19 - - 28		- 10 - - 67
- 23 - - 12		- 9 - - 66		- 20 - - 2		- 11 - - 34
- 24 - - 3		- 10 - - 25		- 21 - - 50		- 12 - - 13
- 25 - - 2		- 12 - - 49		- 23 - - 32		- 13 - - 27
- 26 - - 1		- 13 - - 37		- 24 - - 30		- 15 - - 52
- 30 - - 1		- 15 - - 40		- 25 - - 18		- 16 - - 47
Sept. 7 - - 6		- 16 - - 95		- 26 - - 5		- 17 - - 36
- 25 - - 2		- 17 - - 43		- 31 - - 13		- 18 - - 64
Nov. 1 - - 1		- 18 - - 40		Sept. 9 - - 3		- 19 - - 49
- 10 - - 1		- 19 - - 43		- 20 - - 1		- 20 - - 36
- 11 - - 1		- 22 - - 52		- 30 - - 1		- 22 - - 44
Dec. 6 - - 1		- 23 - - 3		Oct. 5 - - 5		- 23 - - 35
Jan. } 4 - - 12		Sept. 9 - - 7		- 6 - - 8		- 24 - - 29
1825 }		- 28 - - 4		Nov. 11 - - 2		- 25 - - 19
		Oct. 14 - - 5		- 16 - - 1		- 27 - - 17
		Nov. 5 - - 6		Dec. 2 - - 2		- 29 - - 16
		- 21 - - 8		- 13 - - 1		Sept. 6 - - 3
		Dec. 7 - - 10				Oct. 6 - - 4
						Nov. 21 - - 8
						Jan. } 2 - - 1
						1826 }
-	739	-	1,411	-	739	-	1,411

Foundling Hospital, Dublin, }
17th January 1826.

Appendix, No. 55.

the Number removed and transferred each Day in each Year, from the 10th June 1824 to the 5th January 1826;
Names of the Clergymen who recommended the Nurses.

PARISHES.	Num- ber, 1824.	Num- ber, 1825.	CLERGYMEN'S NAMES.	PARISHES.	Num- ber, 1824.	Number, 1825.	CLERGYMEN'S NAMES.
Arklow - - -	29	51	Rev. Henry L. Bayley.	Brought forward	369	858
Aghade - - -	2	6	- Henry St. George.	Kilcomb - - -	4	4	Rev. Roger Owen.
Aghold - - -	50	88	- James M'Ghee.	Kilnehue - - -	2	5	- Edw. Medlicott.
Athy - - -	44	45	- Charles Bristow.	Kilpipe - - -	29	13	- Ralph Cummins.
Blessington - - -	5	19	- Thomas Tucker.	Kilcommon - - -	26	35	- William Barber.
Baltinglass - - -	10	8	- Edward Grogan.	Kilraelagh - - -	-	1	- William Scott.
Ballyadams - - -	-	9	- Jeremiah Marsh.	Kiltennell - - -	5	5	- William Pasley.
Ballysonnon - - -	-	3	- Joseph Wilson.	Kilcock - - -	-	4	- Arch. Douglass.
Barragh - - -	-	4	- Edward Pepper.	Killeigh - - -	1	-	- John Digby.
Ballymore Eustace	-	2	- R. H. Dolier.	Killegan - - -	3	16	- William Scott.
Ballyburley - - -	-	2	- William Wakely.	Killcullen - - -	2	8	- John Hardy.
Braban - - -	-	2	- William Barber.	Killeshee - - -	-	5	- John Harrison.
Carlow - - -	1	7	- Joseph Jameson.	Killaban - - -	2	14	- Arch. Weldon.
Crosspatrick - - -	2	9	- William Barber.	Killeshen - - -	3	-	- John Faulkner.
Carnalaway - - -	1	4	- Archibald Douglas.	Lea - - -	29	55	- John Powell.
Castlepollard - - -	-	2	- John Hare.	Lynally - - -	1	9	- Richard Turpin.
Clonegal - - -	9	10	- John Bredin.	Leighlinbridge	-	2	- R. B. Bernard.
Clonmore - - -	-	18	Hon. & Rev. H. Stopford.	Maryborough - - -	13	22	- Thomas Harpur.
Carah - - -	1	2	Rev. James Slator.	M ^t Mellick - - -	1	8	- Thomas Pigott.
Clane - - -	-	11	- Henry Boyd.	Moyne - - -	10	20	- Thomas Dooly.
Clonsast - - -	10	19	- H. E. Jolly.	Mothill - - -	5	3	- John Robinson.
Castle Dermott - - -	4	7	- Richard Fitzgibbon.	Myshall - - -	1	14	- James Morton.
Castle M'Adam - - -	11	9	- John Overend.	Monasterevan - - -	29	27	- Charles Moore.
Cloydah - - -	10	19	- B. Thomas.	Minart - - -	4	3	- Thomas Harpur.
Coolbanagher - - -	15	88	- Robert Vicars.	Newcastle - - -	-	8	- William Archer.
Carberry - - -	1	11	- Nicholas Lockwood.	Narraghmore - - -	4	1	- Richard Ardell.
Clough - - -	-	1	- Thomas Moore.	Old Leighlin - - -	-	6	- John Fitzgerald.
Carnew - - -	31	38	- Henry Moore.	Old Connell - - -	-	3	- M. Crowley.
Celbridge - - -	-	1	- William Burgh.	Powerscourt - - -	45	32	- Robert Daly.
Clonenagh - - -	1	6	- James Morton.	Rathangan - - -	-	3	- Henry Bayley.
Coolkenno - - -	-	1	- James M'Ghee.	Rathesbuck - - -	2	9	- J. J. C. Saunders.
Cloneyhurk - - -	4	9	- Robert B. Jelly.	Rosenallis - - -	-	26	- Francis Short.
Derralossory - - -	9	13	- L. W. Hempenstall.	Rathmore - - -	1	8	- George C. Baker.
Donadea - - -	29	17	- Newcom ⁿ Whitelaw.	Rathvilly - - -	-	8	- William Whitty.
Delgany - - -	8	79	- William Cleaver.	Rathdrum - - -	46	64	- James Currie.
Donard - - -	5	36	- Paul Dennis.	Staplestown - - -	-	2	- A. St. George.
Dysart - - -	-	9	- Ham ^l Morgan.	Stradbally - - -	-	4	- Hunt Johnston.
Donoghmore - - -	6	31	- Thomas Greene.	Straffan - - -	-	6	- N. Whitelaw.
Dunganstown - - -	-	3	- Thomas Acton.	Stillorgan - - -	1	-	- R. G. Greene.
Downings - - -	-	2	- Arch. Douglass.	Stratford - - -	1	9	- Mark Lysser.
Dunlavan - - -	1	13	- Moore Morgan.	Tullamoy - - -	-	1	- Joseph Cassan.
Edenderry - - -	17	7	- John Jones.	Tallaght - - -	45	-	Mrs. Magee.
Fontstown - - -	2	9	- John Bagott.	Tulow - - -	3	15	Rev. Charles Doyne.
Ferns - - -	1	1	- Mark Charters.	Tomb - - -	1	-	- Roger Owen.
Fenagh - - -	15	25	- Samuel Downing.	Temple Shambo - - -	5	13	- B. Waller.
G ^t Connell - - -	1	3	- M. Crowley.	Timolin - - -	7	3	- L. Coddington.
Geashill - - -	1	1	- John Digby.	Tullamore - - -	1	-	- Pon ^y Gooldsberry.
Gorey - - -	3	4	- Henry Webb.	Tubber - - -	3	7	- John R. Walsh.
Holywood - - -	3	15	- Edward O'Brien.	Wicklow - - -	33	52	- Robert Porter.
Hackelstown - - -	27	79	- James H. Roe.	Wexford - - -	2	-	- Roger Owen.
-	369	858	-	-	739	1,411	-

(Errors excepted.)

N. Madgett,
Regist^r of Infants.

Appendix, No. 56.

Circular LETTER to the Clergy of the Diocese of Dublin, &c.

Foundling Hospital, Dublin, of 1824.

Appendix,
No. 56.

Rev. Sir,

THE Governors of the Foundling Hospital having taken the liberty of submitting to his Grace the Lord Archbishop of Dublin the following Plan, for securing due attention to the Foundling children, both at nurse and during their apprenticeships, humbly presuming that it falls entirely within the range of pastoral superintendence to promote the education and welfare of these poor children, and to further the endeavours of the Institution, to rear them up as useful members of the Protestant community; and his Grace having been pleased to signify that he fully concurs with the Governors in the feeling that it is proper, and an important part of the duty of the parish minister to assist in promoting the welfare, both temporal and spiritual, of such poor children belonging to this valuable institution as are placed within the reach of his superintendence; they have been authorized by his Grace to communicate the following Plan to the clergy, within the Dioceses of Dublin and Glandelagh, expressing his earnest desire that they will afford their cordial co-operation in carrying it into effect.

“ Resolved, 1st. That every clergyman within the Dioceses of Dublin and Glandelagh be requested to seek out in his parish proper Protestant nurses for the Foundling infants, and to recommend the same in writing.

“ 2d. That each clergyman be requested to require, at least once in six months, all the Foundling children at nurse in his parish to be brought to him for inspection, and to report to the Governors, by letter, should he see any cause for blame.

“ 3d. That the children at nurse, of sufficient age, be required to attend the parochial daily and Sunday schools, or such other Protestant schools as may be a substitute, where the children may be taught reading, the Church Catechism, and knowledge of the Scriptures; and, if not at too great a distance, be frequently brought to church.

“ 4th. That the children who are apprenticed shall be made to attend the church, according to the condition of their indentures; and also the Sunday school, if there be one; and that it be seen, upon the whole, that justice is done them by their masters and mistresses.

“ 5th. That upon these two latter points the clergy be requested to favour the Board of Governors with a report, at least once in every year.”

The Governors most earnestly and respectfully entreat your attention to the foregoing Resolutions, and your compliance with the substance of them, as far as your convenience will admit.

(By Order.)

Registrar.

Appendix, No. 57.

EXTRACTS from the Governess's Report Book, Foundling Hospital.

11th December 1823.—Attending Governess, Mrs. Magee.

Appendix,
No. 57.

IT is of great importance that the attention of the Governors should be directed to the existing state of instruction in the female school. With a few exceptions, children who have been three and four years in the house have not made the progress which is generally made in one third of the time in the national schools, the Kildare-street school (as reported), or even in a well superintended Sunday school. The majority of the children who are at present the best taught are the drafts of this year, who have been in schools in in the country. These observations are the result of careful and repeated examinations, and are in unison with the remarks of several of the governesses in their private report book.

Appendix,
No. 57.

That which the children have acquired, they have acquired superficially. Of the meaning of the words in their Scripture lessons, and of the practical application of them, the children are very ignorant. There is apparently a want of discipline and subordination in the conduct of both the under mistresses and the children.

Mrs. Innes acknowledges the justice of the above statement, as it regards the circumstances of the children, and desires it to be understood that she is most willing to adopt any plans which the governess shall order to put the school into a better condition.

January 5, 1824.—Attending Governess, Mrs. Magee.

Observations.

The want of arrangement, the want of discipline, the want of proper instruction, the indolence, and the insubordination which prevails at this period in the female department, cannot be expressed in language too strong; and the plausible surface which the institution is made to assume to the eye of a visitor, is but a system of confirmed dissimulation.

Much of these evils have arisen from the plan of continuing the Foundling children in the house, and placing them in the situation of mistresses, which situations, under the best combination of circumstances, they must be incompetent to fill as they should be filled. But at present the case is still worse, for the majority of these persons now employed have the additional incapacity attached to bodily deformity, or a sickly constitution, so as to be considered unfit to earn their bread elsewhere.

Appendix, No. 58.

AN ACCOUNT of the Number of Dead Certificates claimed and paid for, for Seven Years, ending 5th January 1826.

Appendix,
No. 58.

DATE.	Number paid for.	Amount of Wages paid.
		£. s. d.
Year ending 5th January 1820	503	909 1 1
D° - - 1821	457	807 4 10
D° - - 1822	286	599 5 7
D° - - 1823	254	493 17 1
D° - - 1824	156	243 18 2
D° - - 1825	211	328 13 5
D - - 18 26	158	257 11 6
	2,025	3,639 11 8	Average - - £.1. 10s.

Foundling Hospital, Dublin, }
January 31st, 1826.

T. Finlay, Registrar.

Appendix,
No. 59.

Appendix, No. 59.

AN ACCOUNT of the Expense of the FOUNDLING HOSPITAL at Dublin, for Seven Years, ending the 5th January 1826.

	Year ending 5th January 1820.	Year ending 5th January 1821.	Year ending 5th January 1822.	Year ending 5th January 1823.	Year ending 5th January 1824.	Year ending 5th January 1825.	Year ending 5th January 1826.
	£. s. d.	£. s. d.	£. s. d.	£. s. d.	£. s. d.	£. s. d.	£. s. d.
Provisions - - - - -	7,958 6 8½	6,000 12 5½	5,282 17 7	4,785 10 5	4,984 16 10	6,365 13 6½	7,061 16 3
Clothing and manufactures - - - - -	4,876 13 4½	3,136 9 3	2,578 12 2	2,503 5 7½	2,535 2 4	2,927 18 -½	2,904 2 -
Miscellaneous and house expenses for coals, candles, soap, lamp oil, bibles, stationery, medicines, bedding, ironmongery, &c. - - - - -	2,930 - 9½	2,339 12 8½	2,192 11 8½	2,084 15 7	2,802 17 10	2,470 6 8	2,442 11 1
Salaries, wages and annuities - - - - -	2,575 16 9	2,588 - 10	2,534 14 4	2,644 4 10½	2,679 1 11	2,656 7 8	2,844 13 11
Nursing children in the country - - - - -	28,052 1 7	28,511 13 7	28,931 12 11	28,421 16 5	20,517 - 1	19,015 19 9	15,731 2 1
Repairs of buildings - - - - -	269 11 -	188 - 9	30 12 7	95 17 4	358 18 -	1,011 - 1	1,878 13 11
Apprentice fees - - - - -	1,232 - -	567 10 -	617 - -	1,520 - -	1,291 - -	1,275 5 -	866 10 7½
Collection of the tax - - - - -	377 15 6	340 17 9	331 8 5	331 4 -	297 5 7	93 14 4	- -
Parliamentary expenses for new Act - - - - -	- - -	- - -	184 14 3	244 16 2	- - -	- - -	- -
TOTAL - - - - £.	48,272 5 8½	43,672 17 4	42,684 3 11½	42,631 10 5	35,466 2 7	35,816 5 1	33,729 9 10½

Foundling Hospital, Dublin,
the 21st day of January 1826.

J. Hendrick, Audr.

Appendix, No. 6o.

A General STATEMENT of the Receipts of the FOUNDLING HOSPITAL in Dublin, from the 25th December 1796 to the 5th January 1826.

DATE S.	Grant from Parliament.	House Tax.	Rent of Estate.	Donations and Bequests.	Casual Receipts.	Received with Infants admitted.	Total Receipts.
1 year ending 25th Dec. 1797	£. 4,850	£. 4,964	£. 64 10	-	£. 81	-	£. 9,959	(a) The tax levied upon the inhabitants of Dublin ceased to be chargeable after 4th January 1823, pursuant to the Act of 3d Geo. IV.
1 1/2 24th June 1798	-	2,868	-	-	11 1/2	-	15 2 1/2
1 24th June 1799	-	8,604	89 15	-	25 1	-	5 3 1/2
1 25th Mar. 1800	-	6,878	72 17	-	208 6	-	7 5
1 31st Dec.	-	4,258	142 7	100	131 12	-	13 4 1/2
1 5th Jan. 1802	£. 13,554	7,992	68 7	-	23 6	-	17 -
1 1803	£. 18,571	7,964	212 7	-	857 12	-	6 10
1 1804	£. 16,975	6,049	45 -	-	296 14	-	14 1 1/2
1 1805	£. 21,825	8,343	69 16	-	449 1	-	5 1 1/2
1 1806	£. 21,825	8,569	74 10	-	909 13	-	15 10
1 1807	£. 21,825	7,069	159 6	-	446 1	-	12 9
1 1808	£. 21,825	8,873	122 2	-	360 -	-	16 8
1 1809	£. 21,825	8,242	115 2	-	393 3	-	9 4
1 1810	£. 21,825	8,489	115 2	5 -	243 3	-	18 6 1/2
1 1811	£. 37,575	7,551	115 2	-	249 5	-	8 8
1 1812	£. 38,839	6,179	115 2	-	360 16	-	5 2
1 1813	£. 30,250	8,158	115 2	1 10	161 14	-	3 8 1/2
1 1814	£. 33,175	8,854	115 2	50 -	214 1	-	4 2 1/2
1 1815	£. 28,725	8,412	115 2	-	257 4	-	18 2
1 1816	£. 30,225	8,127	115 2	-	372 -	-	11 11 1/2
1 1817	£. 32,725	7,796	115 2	-	138 2	-	1 3 2 1/2
1 1818	£. 35,225	7,182	115 2	-	129 18	-	13 6 1/2
1 1819	£. 35,224	6,517	113 15	-	8 4	-	5 -
1 1820	£. 32,500	8,139	96 9	-	19 11	-	11 10 1/4
1 1821	£. 32,500	7,538	135 2	-	78 12	-	3 4
1 1822	£. 32,500	7,398	115 2	-	137 8	-	15 3 1/2
1 1823	£. 32,500	7,373	104 10	-	777 15	-	8 10 1/2
1 1824	£. 29,972	6,657	100 15	-	264 15	540 -	18 8
1 1825	£. 29,972	1,492	136 -	-	143 3	2,430 -	10 5
1 1826	£. 37,350	131 15	113 15	-	1,127 16	2,550 -	13 9 1/2
					106 17	2,245 -	5 -
Total - - - £.	753,685 3 4	206,677 18 6 1/2	(a) 3,187 6 -	156 10 -	8,972 5 8 1/2	(b) 7,765 - -	980,444 3 6 1/2

(a) The tax levied upon the inhabitants of Dublin ceased to be chargeable after 4th January 1823, pursuant to the Act of 3d Geo. IV.

(b) The receipt of these funds commenced on the 1st November 1822, pursuant to the Act of 3d Geo. IV.

J. Hendrick, Audr.

Foundling Hospital, Dublin, }
14th January 1826.

Appendix, No. 61.

The NUMBER of CHILDREN admitted into the FOUNDLING HOSPITAL from the different Counties of Ireland,

	YEAR ENDING 24th JUNE								Six Months ending 31st Dec. 1807.	1808.	1809.
	1800.	1801.	1802.	1803.	1804.	1805.	1806.	1807.
County and City of Dublin	696	552	469	590	532	535	577	606	274	676	640
Carlow	29	37	17	40	32	30	44	34	17	28	17
Kilkenny	38	31	15	42	40	31	33	26	15	33	30
Kildare	56	50	33	53	57	62	63	62	25	80	76
King's County	29	37	27	40	31	35	40	39	11	56	36
Queen's County	38	26	22	42	32	32	43	31	16	46	47
Louth	55	44	29	55	52	42	39	51	20	49	30
Longford	12	14	15	23	13	22	24	24	10	26	26
Meath	68	43	42	58	52	56	42	50	32	59	66
Westmeath	30	32	15	24	24	26	26	16	16	25	28
Wexford	46	35	38	50	46	52	60	47	18	39	38
Wicklow	50	53	39	60	58	60	57	61	24	62	52
Antrim	90	72	59	73	81	89	88	89	38	100	106
Armagh	106	65	54	90	70	63	89	90	39	89	98
Cavan	52	63	44	97	70	83	89	109	50	95	81
Down	124	131	85	143	174	122	159	137	89	156	147
Donegal	47	50	35	59	37	52	53	42	21	48	41
Derry	61	48	28	46	37	55	49	62	17	54	46
Fermanagh	68	50	51	53	52	60	45	58	20	75	71
Monaghan	78	88	40	59	71	65	63	64	32	78	71
Tyrone	113	144	57	130	123	113	117	123	55	125	102
Galway	36	30	27	42	46	31	43	36	12	40	68
Leitrim	3	6	9	18	10	17	21	19	5	20	26
Mayo	9	7	4	9	9	8	6	11	8	16	15
Roscommon	12	14	11	25	18	21	24	27	11	32	37
Sligo	3	6	4	6	8	13	23	19	9	13	19
Cork	11	4	3	7	5	6	15	7	4	8	5
Clare	10	7	14	13	19	29	15	12	2	7	7
Limerick	5	19	77	119	58	130	134	104	43	129	102
Tipperary	39	42	42	63	50	48	51	60	36	75	44
Waterford	27	50	27	49	49	32	36	48	27	51	33
Kerry	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Total	2,041	1,850	1,432	2,178	1,956	2,020	2,168	2,164	996	2,390	2,205
Of the above 2,041 children admitted into the hospital there were
Males	970	862	696	1,003	923	949	1,048	972	467	1,081	1,015
Females	1,071	988	736	1,175	1,033	1,071	1,120	1,192	529	1,309	1,190
Total	2,041	1,850	1,432	2,178	1,956	2,020	2,168	2,164	996	2,390	2,205
Of the aforesaid number admitted there were, children left in by their mothers	712	578	475	592	547	614	630	661	307	760	701
Children that were exposed	1,095	985	701	1,267	1,119	1,178	1,269	1,301	574	1,430	1,270
D ^o - sent in by their father	234	287	256	319	290	228	269	202	115	200	234
Total	2,041	1,850	1,432	2,178	1,956	2,020	2,168	2,164	996	2,390	2,205

Foundling Hospital, Dublin, }
 17th January 1826. }

Appendix, No. 61.

distinguishing the Number from each County in each Year, from 25th June 1800 to 31st December 1825.

YEAR ENDING 31st DECEMBER

1810.	1811.	1812.	1813.	1814.	1815.	1816.	1817.	1818.	1819.	1820.	1821.	1822.	1823.	1824.	1825.
661	624	707	626	677	664	696	826	694	682	561	360	312	170	211	208
26	44	29	22	30	14	18	20	16	18	16	13	3	5	5	2
29	25	38	16	23	20	31	18	22	23	23	10	1	6	12	5
53	70	51	52	71	25	43	34	28	33	26	15	3	4	12	11
43	41	61	61	36	34	33	36	86	36	25	17	4	15	6	13
42	34	50	37	46	28	33	34	22	32	31	28	7	10	16	13
50	35	50	56	50	33	28	33	16	20	24	9	4	10	4	4
36	27	25	37	29	23	28	31	15	12	13	5	1	5	5	1
67	72	60	56	64	27	40	48	26	36	20	8	-	5	10	5
20	24	38	27	26	9	17	30	12	10	13	5	-	-	6	1
59	40	53	38	37	25	26	39	30	21	21	13	-	7	7	5
73	80	69	48	60	22	26	31	22	18	19	12	2	6	13	8
110	104	122	118	113	92	64	87	69	92	90	41	20	42	27	21
106	98	117	86	95	85	89	84	49	77	79	36	8	33	13	9
82	83	121	95	94	68	76	80	41	60	68	20	2	11	13	13
160	201	193	164	169	126	147	150	106	137	124	48	10	31	21	14
48	53	70	49	41	42	25	32	22	28	46	27	7	12	12	14
47	55	64	48	47	45	42	63	31	35	49	15	1	12	11	10
68	71	89	68	67	63	52	56	32	33	35	17	2	7	9	4
65	75	81	63	66	58	57	81	29	47	41	10	7	9	14	12
104	126	146	129	108	83	90	105	53	99	92	40	8	21	26	26
50	53	55	36	36	35	18	41	28	27	29	15	-	8	9	5
19	14	26	21	21	25	26	18	10	19	17	5	1	6	4	4
14	15	16	15	18	22	20	13	13	9	6	3	2	2	5	5
35	36	40	38	23	22	14	22	17	12	14	3	-	4	6	6
12	19	22	25	19	14	14	28	13	12	10	3	2	7	9	1
8	5	3	10	5	3	6	12	23	16	14	7	3	6	5	5
13	5	16	6	11	4	8	7	7	10	5	-	-	-	-	-
117	130	114	119	68	54	55	68	46	64	64	49	-	1	-	-
64	61	89	53	56	54	65	61	42	50	55	31	6	20	10	19
45	39	55	38	22	23	25	22	32	20	18	9	2	13	10	4
-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	1	-	2
2,326	2,359	2,670	2,257	2,229	1,842	1,912	2,210	1,602	1,788	1,648	874	418	489	511	450

1,084	1,170	1,217	1,086	1,043	867	868	1,071	747	841	797	399	198	242	234	230
1,242	1,189	1,453	1,171	1,186	975	1,044	1,139	855	947	851	475	220	247	277	220
2,326	2,359	2,670	2,257	2,229	1,842	1,912	2,210	1,602	1,788	1,648	874	418	489	511	450

695	680	744	678	746	460	576	637	596	631	602	184	53	1	-	-
1,390	1,395	1,614	1,316	1,202	1,371	1,336	1,573	1,006	1,157	1,046	690	365	488	511	450
241	284	312	263	281	11	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
2,326	2,359	2,670	2,257	2,229	1,842	1,912	2,210	1,602	1,788	1,648	874	418	489	511	450

(Errors excepted.)

N. Madgett, Registrar of Infants.

Appendix, No. 62.

A STATEMENT showing the Number of Infants admitted into the FOUNDLING HOSPITAL at Dublin, and how disposed of, in each Year; from the INFANT DEPARTMENT.

DATE.	D ^r .				C ^r .								TOTAL.
	Number of Infants remaining in the Nursery commencement of each Year.	Number of Infants admitted into the Hospital each Year.	Number of Children returned from Nurse.	TOTAL.	Died in the Infant Nursery.	Sent to Nurse.	Given to Parents.	Sent to Infirmary.	Eloped from Nursery.	Number of Children returned from Nurse, and drafted into the Grown Department.	Remained in the Nursery.	TOTAL.
From 25th June 1796 to 24th June	1797 - -	45	1,929	30	2,004	1,438	478	45	-	-	-	43	2,004
	1798 - -	43	1,780	60	1,883	934	727	48	-	-	-	174	1,883
	1799 - -	174	1,453	234	1,861	662	1,016	44	-	-	128	11	1,861
	1800 - -	11	2,041	289	2,341	479	1,593	29	-	-	208	32	2,341
From 25th June to 5th January	1801 - -	32	933	76	1,041	296	685	13	-	-	4	43	1,041
	1802 - -	43	1,656	124	1,823	441	1,303	26	-	-	-	53	1,823
	1803 - -	53	1,697	99	1,849	561	1,163	50	-	-	5	70	1,849
	1804 - -	70	2,140	75	2,285	752	1,440	46	-	-	2	45	2,285
	1805 - -	45	1,934	118	2,097	359	1,662	31	-	-	1	44	2,097
	1806 - -	44	2,094	107	2,245	470	1,697	40	-	-	-	38	2,245
	1807 - -	38	2,148	93	2,279	486	1,733	34	-	-	3	23	2,279
	1808 - -	23	2,191	76	2,290	537	1,660	49	-	-	-	44	2,290
	1809 - -	44	2,385	146	2,575	597	1,880	59	-	-	7	32	2,575
	1810 - -	32	2,207	114	2,353	565	1,697	37	15	-	-	39	2,353
	1811 - -	39	2,332	125	2,496	721	1,637	56	-	-	12	70	2,496
	1812 - -	70	2,368	94	2,532	870	1,528	59	-	-	4	71	2,532
	1813 - -	71	2,664	143	2,878	964	1,796	54	-	-	6	58	2,878
	1814 - -	58	2,257	117	2,432	843	1,474	51	-	-	4	60	2,432
	1815 - -	60	2,216	126	2,402	771	1,531	67	-	-	4	29	2,402
	1816 - -	29	1,831	115	1,975	264	1,659	29	-	-	4	19	1,975
	1817 - -	19	1,915	111	2,045	266	1,725	33	-	-	6	15	2,045
	1818 - -	15	2,210	111	2,336	350	1,919	44	-	-	5	18	2,336
	1819 - -	18	1,598	103	1,719	243	1,426	32	-	-	1	17	1,719
	1820 - -	17	1,792	118	1,927	222	1,652	34	-	-	2	17	1,927
	1821 - -	17	1,640	230	1,887	230	1,609	24	-	-	10	14	1,887
	1822 - -	14	873	230	1,117	113	963	21	-	3	4	13	1,117
	1823 - -	13	419	413	845	48	758	14	-	-	18	7	845
	1824 - -	7	486	643	1,136	20	1,092	7	-	-	9	8	1,136
	1825 - -	8	511	1,078	1,597	59	1,241	9	-	-	273	15	1,597
	1826 - -	15	450	1,466	1,931	52	1,825	8	-	-	34	12	1,931
	-	52,150	6,864	-	-	14,613	42,569	1,093	15	3	754	-	-

Appendix, No. 62.

and of Children at Nurse in the Country, and of Grown Children drafted into the Hospital for Education, 25th June 1796 to the 5th January 1826.

COUNTRY ACCOUNT.

COUNTRY ACCOUNT.
Dr.				Cr.
Number of Children at Nurse in the Country at the commencement of each Year.	Sent to Nurse.	Grown Children sent to the Country for Health.	TOTAL.	Children returned from Nurse.	Grown Children in the Country for Health :			Died in the Country.	Drafted into the Hospital.	Re-maining in the Country.	TOTAL.	DATE.
					Re-turned.	Eloped.	Died.
2,865	478	19	3,362	30	92	-	-	253	126	2,861	3,362	- 1797
2,861	727	16	3,604	59	5	-	-	270	302	2,968	3,604	- 1798
2,968	1,016	33	4,017	106	18	-	-	315	133	3,445	4,017	- 1799
3,445	1,593	47	5,085	83	39	-	-	477	210	4,276	5,085	- 1800
4,276	685	12	4,973	72	30	-	-	1,298	180	3,393	4,973	- 1801
3,393	1,303	40	4,736	124	49	-	5	562	34	3,962	4,736	- 1802
3,962	1,163	39	5,164	99	29	-	-	1,524	239	3,273	5,164	- 1803
3,273	1,440	34	4,747	75	29	-	-	727	91	3,825	4,747	- 1804
3,825	1,662	18	5,505	118	43	1	18	923	146	4,256	5,505	- 1805
4,256	1,697	42	5,995	107	11	-	-	1,093	325	4,459	5,995	- 1806
4,459	1,733	136	6,328	93	35	-	5	1,292	380	4,523	6,328	- 1807
4,523	1,660	62	6,245	76	24	-	6	892	13	5,134	6,245	- 1808
5,134	1,880	42	7,056	144	71	-	5	1,286	340	5,210	7,056	- 1809
5,210	1,697	53	6,960	114	5	-	2	1,391	17	5,431	6,960	- 1810
5,431	1,637	67	7,135	125	12	-	21	1,093	421	5,463	7,135	- 1811
5,463	1,528	78	7,069	94	4	-	15	1,063	196	5,697	7,069	- 1812
5,697	1,796	82	7,575	143	57	-	18	1,098	356	5,903	7,575	- 1813
5,903	1,474	85	7,462	116	32	-	10	1,327	204	5,773	7,462	- 1814
5,773	1,531	79	7,383	122	64	-	14	1,075	336	5,772	7,383	- 1815
5,772	1,659	93	7,524	111	45	1	22	1,081	349	5,915	7,524	- 1816
5,915	1,725	99	7,739	105	57	-	26	1,328	206	6,017	7,739	- 1817
6,017	1,919	182	8,118	106	33	8	3	954	237	6,777	8,118	- 1818
6,777	1,426	130	8,333	102	206	-	23	1,108	35	6,859	8,333	- 1819
6,859	1,652	154	8,665	116	92	-	14	816	675	6,952	8,665	- 1820
6,952	1,609	179	8,740	220	132	-	14	823	366	7,185	8,740	- 1821
7,185	963	106	8,254	228	153	-	28	455	206	7,184	8,254	- 1822
7,184	758	37	7,979	413	118	-	10	386	248	6,804	7,979	- 1823
6,804	1,092	93	7,989	640	54	-	6	288	695	6,306	7,989	- 1824
6,306	1,241	172	7,719	805	43	-	29	300	1,016	5,526	7,719	- 1825
5,526	1,825	192	7,543	1,432	116	-	28	361	584	5,022	7,543	- 1826
-	42,569	2,421	-	6,173	1,798	10	322	25,859	8,666	-	-	-
From 25th June 1796 to 24th June
From 25th June to 5th January

From 25th
June 1796 to
24th June

From 25th June to 5th January

Appendix, No. 62.—Statement of the Number of Infants admitted into the DATE.						GROWN DEPARTMENT.

						Dr.					TOTAL.
						Grown Children in the Hospital commencement of each Year.	Returned from the Country, being out for Health.	Drafted.	Returned from Apprenticeship.	Returned from Elopement.
From 25th June 1796 to 24th June	1797	-	-	-	-	500	92	126	-	-	718
	1798	-	-	-	-	437	9	302	-	-	748
	1799	-	-	-	-	559	18	133	-	-	710
	1800	-	-	-	-	496	39	210	-	-	745
From 25th June to 5th January	1801	-	-	-	-	569	30	180	-	-	779
	1802	-	-	-	-	718	49	34	-	-	801
	1803	-	-	-	-	646	33	239	-	-	918
	1804	-	-	-	-	665	32	91	-	-	788
	1805	-	-	-	-	555	43	146	-	-	744
	1806	-	-	-	-	500	22	325	-	-	847
	1807	-	-	-	-	584	52	380	-	-	1,016
	1808	-	-	-	-	676	127	13	-	-	816
	1809	-	-	-	-	659	68	340	-	-	1,067
	1810	-	-	-	-	877	27	17	-	-	921
	1811	-	-	-	-	676	17	421	-	-	1,114
	1812	-	-	-	-	865	11	196	-	-	1,072
	1813	-	-	-	-	799	73	356	-	-	1,228
	1814	-	-	-	-	1,010	38	204	2	-	1,254
	1815	-	-	-	-	997	68	336	1	-	1,402
	1816	-	-	-	-	1,089	48	349	1	-	1,487
	1817	-	-	-	-	1,172	61	206	5	2	1,446
	1818	-	-	-	-	1,190	33	237	7	-	1,467
	1819	-	-	-	-	1,174	211	35	4	-	1,424
	1820	-	-	-	-	1,146	93	675	-	-	1,914
	1821	-	-	-	-	1,072	133	366	2	5	1,578
	1822	-	-	-	-	1,073	152	206	-	-	1,431
	1823	-	-	-	-	1,021	119	248	3	1	1,392
	1824	-	-	-	-	1,023	57	695	4	-	1,779
	1825	-	-	-	-	1,240	43	1,016	10	-	2,309
	1826	-	-	-	-	1,080	116	584	9	1	1,790
						-	1,914	8,666	48	9	-

Foundling Hospital, Dublin, }
January 17th, 1826.

Foundling Hospital at Dublin, and of Children at Nurse in the Country, &c.—continued.

GROWN DEPARTMENT.

Cr.

Appren- ticed.	Died in the Infir- mary.	Sent to the Country for Health.	Eloped.	Put off the Estab- lish- ment as Appren- tices to School Masters and Mis- tresses, &c.	Re- turned to Parents.	Trans- ferred to Charter Schools.	Remaining in the Hospital.	TOTAL.	DATE.
226	8	19	7	19	2	—	437	718	-	-	-	- 1797
68	14	52	45	9	1	—	559	748	-	-	-	- 1798
134	13	33	28	4	2	—	496	710	-	-	-	- 1799
79	26	47	10	11	3	—	569	745	-	-	-	- 1800
37	6	12	2	3	1	—	718	779	-	-	-	- 1801
53	22	41	32	7	—	—	646	801	-	-	-	- 1802
186	17	39	4	6	1	—	665	918	-	-	-	- 1803
191	2	34	2	4	—	—	555	788	-	-	-	- 1804
217	2	18	2	4	1	—	500	744	-	-	-	- 1805
169	21	42	19	10	2	—	584	847	-	-	-	- 1806
103	75	136	7	18	1	—	676	1,016	-	-	-	- 1807
60	15	63	11	8	—	—	659	816	-	-	-	- 1808
79	56	42	5	5	3	—	877	1,067	-	-	-	- 1809
141	33	53	10	8	—	—	676	921	-	-	-	- 1810
132	29	67	10	10	1	—	865	1,114	-	-	-	- 1811
145	31	78	10	7	2	—	799	1,072	-	-	-	- 1812
100	20	82	7	9	—	—	1,010	1,228	-	-	-	- 1813
137	26	85	6	2	1	—	997	1,254	-	-	-	- 1814
211	17	79	3	3	—	—	1,089	1,402	-	-	-	- 1815
182	24	93	11	2	3	—	1,172	1,487	-	-	-	- 1816
133	16	99	1	7	—	—	1,190	1,446	-	-	-	- 1817
74	19	182	8	10	—	—	1,174	1,467	-	-	-	- 1818
93	14	130	34	7	—	—	1,146	1,424	-	-	-	- 1819
632	21	154	30	4	1	—	1,072	1,914	-	-	-	- 1820
264	17	179	39	6	—	—	1,073	1,578	-	-	-	- 1821
272	17	106	12	3	—	—	1,021	1,431	-	-	-	- 1822
289	15	37	22	6	—	—	1,023	1,392	-	-	-	- 1823
387	43	93	7	7	2	—	1,240	1,779	-	-	-	- 1824
470	64	172	19	3	1	500	1,080	2,309	-	-	-	- 1825
202	47	192	10	2	6	26	1,305	1,790	-	-	-	- 1826
5,466	730	2,459	413	204	34	526	—	—	-	-	-	-

From 25th
June 1796 to
24th June

From 25th June to 5th January

(Errors excepted.)

Tho' Finlay, Registrar.

Appendix, No. 63.

Appendix,
No. 63.

A RETURN of the Number of Children who died in the Country, and whose Deaths have been reported to the Hospital; from the 25th June 1796, to the 31st December 1825.

From 25 June } to 31 Dec. }	1796	-	-	166	From 25 June } to 31 Dec. }	1811	-	-	596
-	1797	-	-	187	-	1812	-	-	709
-	1798	-	-	301	-	1813	-	-	667
-	1799	-	-	434	-	1814	-	-	617
-	1800	-	-	524	-	1815	-	-	666
-	1801	-	-	563	-	1816	-	-	819
-	1802	-	-	368	-	1817	-	-	800
-	1803	-	-	576	-	1818	-	-	753
-	1804	-	-	670	-	1819	-	-	646
-	1805	-	-	630	-	1820	-	-	620
-	1806	-	-	758	-	1821	-	-	345
-	1807	-	-	699	-	1822	-	-	273
-	1808	-	-	841	-	1823	-	-	167
-	1809	-	-	803	-	1824	-	-	209
-	1810	-	-	653	-	1825	-	-	177
									16,237

(Errors excepted.)

Foundling Hospital, Dublin, }
17th January 1826.N. Madgett, Reg^r of Infants.

Appendix, No. 64.

Appendix,
No. 64.

A STATEMENT of the Number of Children apprenticed in the Country and in Dublin, respectively, for three Years, ending 5th January 1826.

	Number apprenticed in the Country.	Number apprenticed in Dublin.	TOTAL.	Returned from Buncrana Factory, and apprenticed again.
Quarter ending 5th Jan. 1823	90	9	99	—
- 5th April	120	7	127	—
- 5th July	86	7	93	—
- 10th Oct.	77	11	88	—
- 5th Jan. 1824	79	—	79	—
- 5th April	131	4	135	—
- 5th July	110	5	115	—
- 10th Oct.	158	11	169	—
- 5th Jan. 1825	50	1	51	—
- 5th April	47	5	52	—
- 5th July	67	8	75	28
- 10th Oct.	66	3	69	—
- 5th Jan. 1826	6	—	6	—
	1,087	71	1,158	28

Number of Children Apprenticed to Mr. James Wilson, Buncrana Factory :

27 May 1814	-	-	-	-	-	19
19 D ^o 1815	-	-	-	-	-	21
21 Nov.	-	-	-	-	-	9
8 D ^o 1816	-	-	-	-	-	11
19 May 1819	-	-	-	-	-	51

Total - - 111

(Errors excepted.)

Foundling Hospital, Dublin, }
January 17th, 1826.

T. Finlay, Registrar.

Appendix, No. 65.

WEEKLY REPORT of Children admitted into the Infirmary, of those discharged cured, and of those sent to the Country for Health, and of those that died in the Infirmary; from the 1st January 1823, to 31st December 1825.

GROWN DEPARTMENT:

DATE.	Re- mained in Infir- mary.	Ad- mitted.	Dis- charged cured.	Sent to Country for Health.	Died.	DATE.	Re- mained in Infir- mary.	Ad- mitted.	Dis- charged cured.	Sent to Country for Health.	Died.
1823:						1824:
Jan. 2 - -	59					Jan. 7 - -	86	37	29	-	1
- 8 - -	50	9	18			- 14 - -	98	44	29	1	2
- 15 - -	48	16	16	-	2	- 21 - -	86	33	44	-	1
- 22 - -	49	12	11			- 28 - -	96	35	24	-	1
- 29 - -	61	33	20	-	1
Feb. 5 - -	82	38	16	-	1	Feb. 4 - -	108	49	34	-	3
- 12 - -	92	33	21	-	2	- 11 - -	95	40	46	6	1
- 19 - -	96	39	34	-	1	- 18 - -	87	29	37
- 26 - -	97	38	37			- 25 - -	100	35	13	9
Mar. 5 - -	143	70	24			Mar. 3 - -	90	44	52	1	1
- 12 - -	121	39	58	2	1	- 10 - -	84	29	35
- 19 - -	147	91	64	-	1	- 17 - -	85	28	22	4	1
- 26 - -	121	41	66	-	1	- 24 - -	83	36	38
April 2 - -	103	25	41	-	2	- 31 - -	80	20	21	1	1
- 9 - -	109	38	31	-	1	April 7 - -	85	39	26	5	3
- 16 - -	82	27	32	21	1	- 14 - -	82	40	39	2	2
- 23 - -	79	30	30	-	3	- 21 - -	80	28	21	8	1
- 30 - -	59	20	38	2		- 28 - -	84	37	24	7	2
May 7 - -	50	27	26	10		May 5 - -	89	43	35	2	1
- 14 - -	53	31	25	2	1	- 12 - -	69	22	33	8	1
- 21 - -	43	20	29	-	1	- 19 - -	78	44	30	3	2
- 28 - -	43	11	11			- 26 - -	79	39	36	1	1
June 4 - -	35	17	24	-	1	June 2 - -	78	50	51
- 11 - -	38	18	15			- 9 - -	58	23	43
- 18 - -	45	29	22	-	1	- 16 - -	59	19	17	1
- 25 - -	42	18	20	-	1	- 23 - -	42	16	30	3
July 2 - -	33	18	26	-	1	- 30 - -	42	22	16	5
- 9 - -	41	32	20	3	1	July 7 - -	45	19	12	3	1
- 16 - -	41	28	28			- 14 - -	40	17	18	4	1
- 23 - -	50	25	16			- 21 - -	59	36	16	1
- 30 - -	64	57	43			- 28 - -	83	61	37
Aug. 6 - -	57	33	40			Aug. 4 - -	97	76	54	7	1
- 13 - -	59	60	56	-	2	- 11 - -	161	120	55	1
- 20 - -	57	45	47			- 18 - -	265	190	85	-	1
- 27 - -	66	43	32	2		- 25 - -	290	160	130	4	1
Sept. 3 - -	58	49	45	11	1	Sept. 1 - -	385	157	54	8
- 10 - -	64	34	28			- 8 - -	317	90	156	-	2
- 17 - -	77	48	35			- 15 - -	286	90	119	-	2
- 24 - -	71	31	37			- 22 - -	264	81	100	-	3
Oct. 1 - -	68	29	32			- 29 - -	214	72	113	4	5
- 8 - -	63	51	54	-	2	Oct. 6 - -	196	70	85	-	3
- 15 - -	70	47	39	-	1	- 13 - -	181	68	80	-	3
- 22 - -	72	37	35			- 20 - -	153	54	81	-	1
- 29 - -	72	34	34			- 27 - -	143	44	54
Nov. 5 - -	80	40	31	-	1	Nov. 3 - -	153	46	36
- 12 - -	72	29	34	2	1	- 10 - -	166	54	34	6	1
- 19 - -	70	35	37			- 17 - -	167	35	28	5	1
- 26 - -	71	41	39	-	1	- 24 - -	142	25	48	-	2
Dec. 3 - -	63	30	36	2		Dec. 1 - -	134	41	49
- 10 - -	78	34	19			- 8 - -	110	34	58
- 17 - -	94	44	28			- 15 - -	119	33	23	1
- 24 - -	88	34	36	-	4	- 22 - -	121	47	44	-	1
- 31 - -	79	31	39	-	1	- 29 - -	100	28	48	-	1

Appendix, No. 65.—Weekly Report of Children admitted into the Infirmary, &c.—*continued.*GROWN DEPARTMENT—continued.

DATE.	Re- mained in Infir- mary.	Ad- mitted.	Dis- charged cured.	Sent to Country for Health.	Died.	DATE.	Re- mained in Infir- mary.	Ad- mitted.	Dis- charged cured.	Sent to Country for Health.	Died.
1825:						1825:
Jan. 5 - -	118	31	12	-	1	Aug. 3 - -	123	63	40	-
- 12 - -	103	14	29	-		- 10 - -	184	115	52	-	2
- 19 - -	128	37	9	3		- 17 - -	213	88	56	2	1
- 26 - -	120	49	56	1		- 24 - -	197	56	68	3	1
Feb. 2 - -	128	48	37	-	3	- 31 - -	171	47	56	17
- 9 - -	124	50	49	4	1	Sept. 7 - -	165	53	57	2
- 16 - -	96	35	62	-	1	- 14 - -	149	49	63	-	2
- 23 - -	92	50	53	1		- 21 - -	141	43	47	2	2
Mar. 2 - -	97	31	25	-	1	- 28 - -	109	27	59
- 9 - -	86	23	27	7		Oct. 5 - -	116	49	41	1
- 16 - -	104	43	23	2		- 12 - -	110	40	46
- 23 - -	104	32	29	2	1	- 19 - -	76	23	55	-	2
- 30 - -	82	28	32	14	4	- 26 - -	70	22	27	-	1
April 6 - -	84	27	22	2	1	Nov. 2 - -	68	24	24	-	2
- 13 - -	82	27	27	2		- 9 - -	66	26	27	-	1
- 20 - -	95	36	20	3		- 16 - -	88	36	13	-	1
May 4 - -	86	16	19	-		- 23 - -	94	45	39
- 11 - -	89	20	16	-	1	- 30 - -	90	40	44
- 18 - -	92	32	19	8	2	Dec. 7 - -	87	30	32	-	1
- 25 - -	91	25	24	-	2	- 14 - -	86	28	28	-	1
June 1 - -	80	19	11	17	2	- 21 - -	80	23	26	-	3
- 8 - -	75	21	22	3	1	- 28 - -	80	19	19
- 15 - -	66	22	29	2		1826:
- 22 - -	61	22	26	-	1	Jan. 4 - -	102	45	23
- 29 - -	64	25	19	3		Total - -	-	6,304	5,846	274	131
July 6 - -	81	25	8	-
- 13 - -	66	14	28	-	1
- 20 - -	91	48	18	5
- 27 - -	100	45	36

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT:

DATE.	Re- mained in Infir- mary.	Ad- mitted.	Dis- charged cured.	Sent to Country for Health.	Died.	DATE.	Re- mained in Infir- mary.	Ad- mitted.	Dis- charged cured.	Sent to Country for Health.	Died.
1823:						1823:
Aug. 6 - -	-	40	16			Dec. 3 - -	40	8	21
- 13 - -	24	45	48			- 10 - -	27	3	7
- 20 - -	21	21	23			- 17 - -	23	7	8	-	1
- 27 - -	19	23	19	7		- 24 - -	21	19	9
Sept. 3 - -	16	66	24			- 31 - -	31	34	20	-	1
- 10 - -	58	55	27			1824:
- 17 - -	86	34	24			Jan. 7 - -	44	13	25
- 24 - -	96	28	28			- 14 - -	32	11	13	-	1
Oct. 1 - -	96	20	39	-	2	- 21 - -	29	10	11
- 8 - -	75	9	20			- 28 - -	28	15	11
- 15 - -	64	6	19			Feb. 4 - -	32	9	9
- 22 - -	51	12	13			- 11 - -	32	8	17	2	1
- 29 - -	50	23	13			- 18 - -	20	8	8
Nov. 5 - -	60	10	10	-	1	- 25 - -	20	13	10
- 12 - -	59	11	25	2		Mar. 3 - -	23	10	4
- 19 - -	43	9	15	-	1	- 10 - -	29	19	17
- 26 - -	36	20	15	-	1	- 17 - -	31	10	18
						- 24 - -	23	11	6	7	1
						- 31 - -	20	12	9	2

Appendix, No. 65.—Weekly Report of Children admitted into the Infirmary, &c.—*continued.*PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT—continued.

DATE.	Re- mained in Infir- mary.	Ad- mitted.	Dis- charged cured.	Sent to Country for Health.	Died.	DATE.	Re- mained in Infir- mary.	Ad- mitted.	Dis- charged Cured.	Sent to Country for Health.	Died.
1824:						1825:
April 7 - -	21	5	6	1		Mar. 2 - -	38	14	18
- 14 - -	19	11	9			- 9 - -	34	15	13	3
- 21 - -	21	16	11			- 16 - -	33	12	13	2
- 28 - -	26	21	16	2		- 23 - -	30	9	7
May 5 - -	29	15	17			- 30 - -	32	7	9
- 12 - -	27	11	17			April 6 - -	30	18	5	1	1
- 19 - -	21	16	4	2		- 13 - -	41	3	10
- 26 - -	31	13	17			- 20 - -	34	6	11
June 2 - -	27	12	17			- 27 - -	29	4	8	4	1
- 9 - -	22	12	14	-	1	May 4 - -	20	7	8
- 16 - -	19	5	9	1		- 11 - -	19	2	5
- 23 - -	14	9	14			- 18 - -	16	5
- 30 - -	9	6	4	1		- 25 - -	21	9	6
July 7 - -	10	29	25			June 1 - -	24	15	11	6
- 14 - -	14	10	13	1		- 8 - -	22	11	14	3
- 21 - -	10	9	8			- 15 - -	16	10	8
- 28 - -	11	8	9			- 22 - -	18	3	9
Aug. 4 - -	10	22	6			- 29 - -	12	11	6	1
- 11 - -	26	26	8			July 6 - -	16	9	10
- 18 - -	44	53	20			- 13 - -	15	6	4
- 25 - -	77	30	49	-	1	- 20 - -	17	6	9	1
Sep. 1 - -	57	10	26	5		- 27 - -	13	9	3
- 8 - -	36	10	17	-	1	Aug. 3 - -	19	2	11
- 15 - -	28	13	8	5	1	- 10 - -	10	14	5	1
- 22 - -	27	10	8			- 17 - -	18	8	10
- 29 - -	29	18	10			- 24 - -	16	12	10	1
Oct. 6 - -	37	12	20			- 31 - -	17	7	5	1
- 13 - -	29	19	15			Sep. 7 - -	18	5	6
- 20 - -	33	1	18			- 14 - -	17	9	7
- 27 - -	16	9	6	-	1	- 21 - -	19	4	8
Nov. 3 - -	18	12	6			- 28 - -	15	11	5	-	1
- 10 - -	24	10	4	1		Oct. 5 - -	20	5	13
- 17 - -	29	9	6			- 12 - -	12	8	7
- 24 - -	32	10	10			- 19 - -	16	12	9
Dec. 1 - -	32	8	12			- 26 - -	16	4	7
- 8 - -	28	19	8			Nov. 2 - -	13	13	13
- 15 - -	39	16	6			- 9 - -	13	9	10
- 22 - -	49	11	17	2		- 16 - -	12	5	7	-	1
- 29 - -	41	10	10			- 23 - -	9	7	5
1825:						- 30 - -	11	6	5
Jan. 5 - -	41	17	15			Dec. 7 - -	12	2	4
- 12 - -	43	11	13			- 14 - -	10	3	1
- 19 - -	41	21	13	3		- 21 - -	12	2
- 26 - -	46	7	16			- 28 - -	14	3	7
Feb. 2 - -	37	21	21			1826:
- 9 - -	37	9	13	2		Jan. 4 - -	10	6	1
- 16 - -	31	20	13			Total - -	-	1,661	1,556	71	19
- 23 - -	38	9	8	1

(Errors excepted.)

Foundling Hospital,
18th January 1826.

J. Creighton, Surgeon.

Appendix, No. 66.

EXTRACT from the Minutes of the Board.

Appendix,
No. 66.

“ Foundling Hospital, Dublin, June 10th 1824.

“ Ordered,

“ THAT at the ensuing pay, all the children above the age of four years, and who are now with Roman Catholic nurses, be transferred to Protestant nurses.”

June 17th 1824.

With reference to the Order made last Board-day, respecting the removal of children above four years old from Roman Catholic Nurses, a Return having been made of 4,200 children on the books above the age of four years;—

“ Resolved,

“ That said Order be amended, by adding to it the words, “ so far as may be practicable.”

(By Order.)

Thos^s Finlay, Sec^y,

END OF THIRD REPORT.

157

FOURTH REPORT
FOURTH REPORT

THE COMMISSIONERS
OF THE

COMMISSIONERS

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY

Irish Education Inquiry.

Belfast Academical Institution

Dated Dublin, 27th January 1827.

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be Printed,
26 February 1827.

FOURTH REPORT

THE COMMISSIONERS

OF THE

IRISH COMMISSIONERS

THE REPORT p. 3

THE APPENDIX p. 32

Irish Education Inquiry.

Belfast: Andrew & Co. 1857.

Printed and Sold by Andrew & Co., 27th January 1857. In the words of the Charter, "to be printed by the Stationer to the Commission."

A STATEMENT of the Progress and Proceedings of the Commission.

The Commission of Inquiry into the State of the Education of the People of Ireland, was appointed by the House of Commons, in the month of June 1851, and has since that time been engaged in a most arduous and important task. It has held numerous public and private sittings, and has received the assistance of many able and experienced gentlemen, who have been appointed as members of the Commission. It has also held many public and private sittings, and has received the assistance of many able and experienced gentlemen, who have been appointed as members of the Commission. It has also held many public and private sittings, and has received the assistance of many able and experienced gentlemen, who have been appointed as members of the Commission.

It was the duty of the Commission to inquire into the state of the education of the people of Ireland, and to report thereon to the House of Commons. It has now the honor to present to the House of Commons its report, which contains a full and complete statement of the progress and proceedings of the Commission, and of the results of its inquiries.

139

FOURTH REPORT

OF

THE COMMISSIONERS

OF

IRISH EDUCATION INQUIRY.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY:

WE, the undersigned Commissioners, nominated and appointed by a Commission under the Great Seal, bearing date the Fourteenth day of June, One thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, humbly beg leave further to report, as follows:—

Belfast Academical Institution.

THE Plan and Objects of this Institution cannot be more clearly set forth than in the words of a Circular Address, issued by a Committee of Subscribers in December 1808, entitled—

“ A STATEMENT of the Origin and Proceedings of the BELFAST “ ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION since its commencement.

“ The formation of literary Institutions in various parts of the United “ Kingdom having been found highly conducive to the dissemination of useful “ knowledge, a desire has been for some time very generally expressed, that this “ part of the kingdom should partake of these advantages by means of an Insti“ tution founded on similar principles. The want of such a Seminary has long “ been felt in the north of Ireland, and is still demonstrated by the annual resort
“ of Irish Students to the Scotch Colleges. Notwithstanding the expenses “ attending such a journey, they have been found much less than those attending
“ one to the capital of this part of the kingdom. The children of the wealthier “ classes alone in Ulster have been able to avail themselves of the advantage of “ a liberal education in the Dublin University, while no mode whatsoever has “ been provided for disseminating that species of knowledge so necessary for the “ lower classes, who are engaged in manufactures, mechanics, or agriculture.
“ While the province was thus unprovided with the means of attaining the “ higher branches of science, the increasing population of the country made the “ want of primary Schools be as severely felt.

“ It was therefore thought by the friends of literature, that an Establishment, “ comprising both, would be highly useful, as well to the immediate neighbour“ hood of Belfast, as to the Province at large. By this combination the progress “ of science would be extended among the higher ranks, and a number of “ teachers would also be brought forward at a cheap rate, who would diffuse “ knowledge among the lower classes.

“ In pursuance of these intentions, an application was made by a number of the most respectable inhabitants of Belfast, and its vicinity, to the Marquess of Donegall for his approbation, and a grant in perpetuity of a suitable lot of ground for the necessary buildings. This application was immediately acceded to in the fullest manner, and a lot of more than four acres, in a central and advantageous situation, was assigned by his Lordship to trustees for the uses of the Institution.

“ In consequence, a meeting of its friends was held on the 1st of August 1807, at which a Committee was appointed to draw up a Plan for the future regulation of all its departments. This Plan was laid before a second meeting held on the 22d of September following, and after some discussion adopted and published.

“ In this Plan, it is proposed to form two Schools, one for the Education of Children intended for the learned Professions; the other for those whose future pursuits do not necessarily require a knowledge of the learned languages; also, to found Lectureships, to which young men might be admitted, after having finished the common course of school learning, either in the Seminaries of the Institution, or elsewhere, and in which they might proceed through a regular series of studies, at the termination of which, they might be furnished with a stock of knowledge equal to what is generally deemed necessary for engaging in any of the professions to which they may have been destined. In addition to those lectures that require a previous regular course of studies, it is proposed to have others of a general and popular kind, in the sciences more intimately connected with agriculture, manufactures, and the arts, from which persons wishing to gain information on any of these subjects may derive instruction, though they had not received the rudiments of a liberal education.

“ Although the prospectus takes no notice of the religious part of education, it is the intention of the Institution to admit professors of Divinity, and to afford them suitable accommodations, on an application from any Ecclesiastical Body.

“ With respect to the internal economy of the Society, the amount of the subscription requisite to entitle a subscriber to interfere in the management, or to hold any of the places of trust, was finally fixed, so as to preclude the possibility of the management falling into the hands of a few individuals; and to guard more effectually against this evil, the privileges of subscribers were made hereditary.

“ The government of the Institution is entrusted to a President, four Vice Presidents, twenty Managers, and eight Visitors, the whole chosen by the proprietors at large; one-fourth of the Vice Presidents, Managers and Visitors, vacating their seats annually. The President and Managers, with the assistance of the Visitors, appoint Masters and Professors, and regulate the whole of the internal economy of the Institution.

“ At this meeting, the Marquess of Donegall was chosen President for life, and a Committee appointed for collecting subscriptions. The universal wish for the establishment of such a Seminary now became manifest; upwards of £.10,000 was subscribed in fourteen days, principally in the town and its immediate vicinity. The subscribers, though not including every individual whose circumstances authorized them to devote part of their property to useful public purposes, yet comprised a great majority, and was supported with equal liberality by persons of every rank and description.

“ The Committee at the same time employed themselves in circulating prospectuses, and in endeavouring to procure the patronage of persons of rank and influence through the country. The result has been almost universally favourable.

“ The subscriptions having now amounted to upwards of £.14,000, a sum deemed sufficient to commence the execution of the design, a General Meeting of the Subscribers was held on the 4th of February 1808, for the election of the officers in whom the direction of its affairs was to be invested. As, since the publication of the prospectus, several persons of high rank and literary talents had subscribed, it was then resolved, that the Archbishop of Armagh, and

B1

“ and the Bishops of Dromore and Down, should be elected Honorary Visitors, “ admissible to all the privileges vested in that Board by the rules of the “ Institution.”

The Institution may be considered as having been established from the date of the above-mentioned meeting, 4th February 1808, as the subscribers then invested the officers elected with full power to act as they thought most advantageous. A copy of the proceedings was forwarded to the Irish Government, and to several members of the Legislature, who were locally connected with Ireland, and more particularly with the province of Ulster; and a letter was written by the Vice President to Sir Arthur Wellesley, then Secretary for Ireland, expressing the intention of the Managers to present a petition to the House of Commons, during the next session of Parliament, for a charter of incorporation, and a grant of money in aid of their funds; and calling the attention of Government to the very liberal private contributions, and to the sentiments of many persons of rank and fortune, fully and unequivocally expressed in favour of the Establishment.

The further progress of the Institution was delayed until suitable buildings could be erected, and the Managers and Visitors in the mean time were employed in digesting the arrangements for commencing the course of Education.

In the year 1810, an Act of Parliament was passed for the incorporation and regulation of the Institution, the objects of which were declared to be, to afford to youth a classical and mercantile education, and to teach mathematics, natural philosophy, logic, metaphysics, belles lettres, moral philosophy, chemistry, botany, agriculture, and other branches of science.

Vide Act, sect. 1.

By the provisions of this Act, his Grace the Lord Primate, the Marquess of Donegall, the Marquess of Downshire, the Bishop of Down and Connor, the Bishop of Dromore, and upwards of 70 of the principal subscribers by name, together with all such other persons as had subscribed, and all who should at any time thereafter subscribe 20 guineas for the purposes of the Institution, were made a corporation, capable to take land, not exceeding £. 2,500 per annum, with the usual powers to sue in their corporate name, to use a common seal, and receive subscriptions and donations.

By the same Act, the proprietors for the time being, or any 21 of them, were enabled to make bye-laws for the government of the Institution, subject to the approbation of the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council of Ireland, and for the election of a President, Vice President, Managers, Visitors, Treasurer, Secretary and Auditors. The Act of Parliament nominated the persons who should first hold those respective offices; and it was declared that they and all subsequent officers should continue for such time as might be fixed at the first meeting of the Proprietors; or in case of death, or removal by absence, or impropriety of conduct, that they should be supplied according to the provisions of the Act.

The Statute further provides, that the acts of the Proprietors, duly assembled, or the major part of them, shall be deemed the acts of the Corporation, provided 21 or more be present, and that the election of the officers shall be made in the manner appointed by the Proprietors, and that the officers so to be elected shall not exceed the following numbers, viz. four Vice Presidents, twenty Managers, eight Visitors, and three Auditors, who shall exercise such powers as shall be given them by the bye-laws, and no other.

The officers are to be elected from and by the corporate body only; subscribers of fifty guineas and upwards, to be eligible to the offices of President and Vice President, and of twenty guineas and upwards to the office of Manager.

The Act further provides, that in addition to the aforesaid eight elective Visitors, the Primate of all Ireland for the time being, the Marquess of Donegall, and the Marquesses of Donegall in succession, the Bishop of Dromore and his successors, the Bishop of Down and Connor and his successors, the Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, the Moderator of the General Assembly of the Synod of Ulster, the Representatives in Parliament of the Town of Belfast, and of the Counties of Down and Antrim, and the Sovereign of the said Town of Belfast, all for the time being, shall be Visitors of the Institution, with the same powers, authority and jurisdiction, that should hereafter be given to the eight Visitors to be elected as aforesaid.

By the 11th and 12th sections of the Act, every member of the corporate body, subscribing 100 guineas or upwards, has the privilege of appointing one boy to be educated as a day scholar, or extra student, in the Institution, free of all expense, and every member has the power, during his life, of transferring to any person, (subject to the approbation of the managers,) all the rights and privileges which he may hold and enjoy as a member thereof.

At a general meeting of the Proprietors, held on the 4th September 1810, certain bye-laws were made, which were afterwards ratified by the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council.

These bye-laws will be found in the Appendix to this Report. They relate chiefly to the duties of the respective officers, the mode of their election, and duration in office. The Managers are directed to meet every month, to superintend the economy of the Institution. The Visitors assist and vote with the Managers in the appointment of Masters and Professors. They also are directed to meet at least once a month, and to report annually, either to the Board of Managers, or to a General Court of Proprietors, as they think best; which Court any three Visitors may convene, on giving eight days notice to the Managers. The Board of Managers and Board of Visitors, when summoned for that especial purpose, form a joint Board, with authority to make Rules for the Establishment and Regulation of the College and Schools, in the manner in the bye-law particularly specified.

For the establishment of this Institution upwards of £16,000 was subscribed by the resident inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood of Belfast, liberally aided by the nobility, gentry, and dignified clergy of the province, before the Act of Incorporation was obtained. Subscriptions were also received from other parts of Ireland and from England. Nearly £5,000 was obtained from India, under the patronage of the Marquess of Hastings, and other sums have been since received, amounting together with the former, to upwards of £25,000. A Parliamentary grant of £1,500 was made to the Institution in the years 1814, 1815, and 1816, and was then discontinued. These sums were added to the general account, and the whole has been expended in the buildings, purchase of furniture for the dormitories and school rooms, books, apparatus, and in salaries to the Professors. On the 10th of October, 1825, when we visited it, the Institution was indebted to the Treasurer nearly £300, without possessing any funds from which that sum could be repaid, except £50 deposited in a savings bank, and £200 stock in the new 4 per cents, the interest of which is subject to the payment of a gold medal annually, of about five pounds value.

The Establishment is possessed of an annual income of 43 l. 14 s. 5 d. arising from the rent of houses bequeathed to them during a lease for a term of years, of which about 40 are unexpired. It should also be stated, that the proprietors of the White Linen Hall, in Belfast, have agreed to give to the Institution £100 per annum, on condition that a course of popular lectures should be delivered every Summer in the Institution, for the use of the artizans and mechanics of the town and neighbourhood of Belfast. Owing to the depressed state of the funds of the Establishment, several of the Professors have temporarily relinquished the emoluments of their offices, and the Assistant Secretary has given up half of his annual salary.

The Establishment was opened in February 1814, and, on that occasion, an Address of the joint Boards of Managers and Visitors was read to the Proprietors, explaining "the objects and design of those who first conceived this plan of popular Education." The object of the Academical Institution, to use the words of the Address, was shortly and simply this: "To diffuse as widely as possible throughout the province and population of Ulster, the benefits of Education, both useful and liberal; and by that means, to prevent the hard and disgraceful necessity, in such a great and prosperous community, of sending their children to seek in other countries, with much risk to their health and morals, for that instruction, and those literary qualifications and honours, which might be equally well attained at home, with evident advantage to the public interest as well as to that of individuals."

The Directors also, amongst other things, expressed a wish for the countenance of Government, and for Parliamentary encouragement, and stated, that they wished wished to supply to the youth of Ireland “ the advantages of a complete course of Education, and they doubted not, that the liberality of many public bodies, as well as individuals, would supply a fund for the endowment of different Professors, until the justice of Parliament should extend the same encouragement to literature in the north, as it had already done in the south of Ireland.” They further stated, that the primary object of the Institution was to make learning popular, “ and to diffuse useful knowledge, particularly among the middling orders of society.” And they stated their intention, “ that the rates of tuition and boarding should be as low as possible, and that students should be admitted gratuitously on the recommendation of liberal subscribers.” The Address then proceeds thus: “ The Directors in their choice of Masters, and in their admission of Scholars are perfectly unbiassed by religious distinctions. They have sought for teachers, either in this or the other kingdom, wherever best recommended by their merits and experience in their professional departments, and by their morals and manners in their personal characters. Of nothing are the Boards more desirous, than that pupils of all religious denominations should communicate by frequent and friendly intercourse in the common business of Education, by which means a new turn might be given to the national character and habits, and all the children of Ireland should know and love each other.”

At the period of delivering the above Address, a Lecturer on Natural Philosophy and Chemistry was engaged, and was to commence a course of lectures in the month of May following; and five schools were then open for teaching Classics, English, Mathematics, Writing, and French. Other Professorships have been added from time to time, and additional schools opened.

The Institution is at present divided into two branches, the Collegiate and the School Departments. The Collegiate Department is under the direction of the following Professors, who are appointed by the joint Boards of Managers and Visitors :—

James Thomson, A. M. Mathematics.
 Rev. W^m Cairns, A. M. Logic and Belle Lettres.
 John Young, LL. D. Moral Philosophy.
 Rev. W^m Bruce, A. B. Latin and Greek.
 Rev. Tho^s Dix Hincks, Hebrew.
 James L. Drummond, M. D. Anatomy and Physiology.
 John Stevelly, A. B. Natural Philosophy.

In addition to these, there are two Professors of Divinity and Church History, viz. : The Rev. Samuel Hanna, D. D., appointed by the General Synod of Ulster, and the Rev. Samuel Edgar, D. D., appointed by the Presbyterian Synod of Ireland, distinguished by the name of Seceders.

The Professors appointed by the Institution, and the two Professors of Divinity, form a Board of Faculty, to superintend the literary concerns of the Collegiate department, and each Professor is, in his turn, President for one year.

Appendix,
N^o 36.

This Board is empowered to take cognizance of every thing connected with the literary pursuits and moral discipline of the Collegiate department of the Institution, to regulate the course of studies to be pursued, and to direct the formation of new classes when necessary, with the concurrence of the joint Boards of Managers and Visitors; to appoint the hours for the meeting of the several classes, and the time and order of public examinations; and finally to adjudge premiums, sign the testimonials given to students at the close of the Collegiate course, in the presence of the Managers and Visitors, specially summoned for that purpose; and to enforce discipline, by such fines and punishments as they may deem proper.

The Board meets in the Institution once a week during the College session, and as often during vacation as may be necessary.

The Masters in the School department form a similar Board, called the Board of Masters, with power to make and enforce such regulations as they may deem necessary for maintaining order, discipline, and propriety of conduct among the pupils in the schools; to fix the time and order of their public examinations; and, in general, to take such measures respecting internal management and regulation as they may deem proper.

N^o 36.

In case any difference of opinion should arise, either in the Board of Faculty or Board of Masters, reference is to be made to the joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, specially summoned for that purpose.

The Professors and Masters hold their situations under the following Resolution, adopted by the joint Boards of Managers and Visitors on the 20th of January 1818, and confirmed by a General Court of Proprietors on the 22d of the same month:—

“ Resolved unanimously, That every Professor or Teacher in this Institution, who has been or may be elected to fill those offices, be deemed permanently appointed to his situation, unless he shall forfeit his claim to public confidence by misconduct, neglect of duty, or incapacity; and that his dismissal shall take place only after the charges of misconduct, neglect of duty, or incapacity shall have been fully proved, to the satisfaction of the Board of Managers, assembled for that purpose, agreeably to the tenth section of the bye-laws; and farther, that the investigation shall take place in the presence of the person accused, provided he requires it.”

We will now shortly advert to the general character of the Lectures, as delivered by each of the Professors at present in the Collegiate department, referring to their several examinations for a more detailed statement.

Appendix,
N° 3.

Mr. James Thomson was appointed Professor of Mathematics in 1815. At his appointment, Mr. Thomson received £.50 a year salary as Professor, but in consequence of the low state of the funds of the Institution, he has for the present voluntarily relinquished it, and for the last two years has only received the fees of the students, which in this, as in all other cases in the Institution, are regulated by the Managers and Visitors.

In this class, the fees are two guineas from each student for the winter session, which commences in November and ends in the May following; and if the student attends a second session he only pays half that sum. The number of students attending in the session 1824-5 was sixty-one, and the utmost sum received from students by Mr. Thomson, in any one year, was fifty-three guineas. The students are divided into two classes. The course for the junior class commences with arithmetic, then proceeds with algebra and geometry; the senior class with the arithmetic of sines, spherical trigonometry, conic sections, analytic geometry, and the differential and integral calculus. A considerable portion of the students in the mathematical class are preparing for the Presbyterian ministry; but there are several schoolmasters and others who study for general improvement. Several students attend this course free of expense, under the provision of the 11th section of the Act of Incorporation, before-mentioned.

Appendix,
N° 6.

The Rev. William Cairns, A.M. was appointed Professor of Logic and Belles Lettres, in September 1815. The lectures delivered by him embrace a full account of the elements of modern intellectual Philosophy.

Mr. Cairns receives a salary of £.150, besides the class fees, which have varied from £.70 to £.100. The number of students attending during the session 1824-5 was 42.

In addition to the regular College class, Mr. Cairns has read several courses of lectures of a more popular character, which were attended by the inhabitants of Belfast, as well as by the students of the Institution.

Appendix,
N° 14.

Dr. John Young (LL. D.) Professor of Metaphysics and Moral Philosophy was appointed in September 1815. His course of lectures is occupied in explaining intellectual philosophy, and the general phenomena of the human mind, adverting to the various theories, antient and modern, which have been advanced upon that subject.

The salary is £.150 per annum, and the fee paid by each public student is two guineas, and by each private student one guinea for the session. The number attending this class in the session ended May 1825, was 38.

The

The Rev. William Bruce, A. B. was appointed Professor of the Greek and Latin languages in October 1821. He receives a salary of £. 50 yearly, and the fees of the students. The fee for the Greek class alone is two guineas for the session; for Greek and Latin jointly, three guineas. The average annual amount of fees received during four years has been about £. 70. The number of students attending in the session ended May 1825 was, Latin, 15; Greek, 32. Mr. Bruce is a member of the Presbytery of Antrim, and minister of one of the congregations in Belfast. All students intended for the Presbyterian ministry, are obliged to attend the lectures of this Professor.

The Rev. Thomas Dix Hincks, Professor of Hebrew, was appointed to the situation in June 1822. There is no salary attached to this professorship, as Mr. Hincks holds also the situation of head master of the classical school, from which he derives considerable emolument. On the death of the late Professor, Mr. Bruce was appointed to the Professorship of Hebrew, as well as to that of Greek and Latin, but he subsequently resigned the former to Mr. Hincks, who was peculiarly qualified for that situation, and who, by the appointment, acquired a seat in the Board of Faculty. Mr. Hincks receives two guineas per session from each student; the amount received does not exceed 40 guineas. The number attending the session of 1824-5, was 45, and 48 were entered for the course 1825-6. The divinity students are obliged by order of the Synods to attend the Hebrew lecture. Several of the pupils of Mr. Hincks have obtained the first premium in Trinity College, Dublin, for proficiency in the knowledge of the Hebrew language.

Appendix,
N^o 10.

Dr. James Lawson Drummond, M. D. was appointed Professor of Anatomy and Physiology in December 1818. The salary was £. 50 a year, but for the last two years, owing to the reduced state of the funds, Dr. Drummond has declined receiving it. The admission fee is one guinea. The number of students attending the session 1824-5, was 11, and 15 in the session ended May 1826. The course of lectures is not confined to the course of anatomy taught in medical schools, but embraces a wide field of natural history and of natural theology.

Appendix,
N^o 13.

Mr. John Stevelly, A. B. of Trinity College, Dublin, was appointed Professor of Natural Philosophy in August 1823. The annual salary paid by the Institution is £. 150. The fees are two guineas per session. This Professor is also engaged to give a popular course of lectures in the Summer in Chemistry and Mechanics. The fee for the chemical class is seven shillings and sixpence, and five shillings for the lectures on Mechanics. This latter course was established by the Linen Hall Company. A society called the Mechanics Institute, in Belfast, gave the sum of sixty-five pounds for permission for the members of their body to attend this lecture, and the Professor received about the same sum for tickets. About 400 mechanics attended the introductory lectures for the first fortnight, but they gradually fell off, and the Mechanics Institute itself is very much diminished.

Appendix,
N^o 12.

The want of a Laboratory and sufficient apparatus for lecturing, both in natural philosophy and chemistry, is a great impediment to the advancement of these sciences, and the course of anatomical lectures suffers equally, from the want of preparations and drawings. The funds of the Institution have not been hitherto sufficient to supply the several requisites that are indispensable for these objects.

The seven Professors above mentioned were appointed by the Institution. Several of them were natives of Scotland, or of distant parts of Ireland; and when they offered themselves as candidates, personally unknown to the Managers and Visitors, and were chosen solely on account of the satisfactory testimonials they produced.

The Professors of Divinity and Church History for the Synods of Ulster and the Seceding Synod are, as before stated, respectively appointed by those bodies.

The Presbyterians in Ireland may be considered as consisting of four principal bodies.—1st. The Synod of Ulster, comprising 15 Presbyteries, and about 202 ministers.—2d. The Seceding Synod, which separated from the Synod of Ulster in the year 1726, on a difference as to points of discipline. It comprises 10 Presbyteries and 108 ministers.—3d. The Presbytery of Antrim, which originally was comprised in the Synod of Ulster, but was separated from it in 1726, on account of Arian opinions, which they were supposed to entertain. It comprehends 10 ministers.—4th. The Presbytery, or (as it has latterly been called) the Synod of Munster, comprising 9 or 10 ministers.

There is also in the north of Ireland a small body of Presbyterians, called the Reformed Presbytery, usually known by the name of Covenanters or Cameronians. It comprises about 20 congregations; of which, however, only about half are at present supplied with ministers.

We have already seen, that in the Circular Address issued by the Committee of Management in 1808, it was declared to be the intention of the Institution to admit Professors of Divinity, and to afford them suitable accommodations, on an application from any ecclesiastical body.

It will also be observed, that in the Act of Incorporation, the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster (an annual officer who presides over that body) was appointed one of the official Visitors, and in that character he is invested with the right of voting on all elections of Professors.

With a view to connect the Institution still more closely with the Presbyterian body, a negotiation was for some time carried on between them; and it was resolved in August 1813, at a joint meeting of the Managers and Visitors, "that the General Synod of Ulster could promote the interest of the Belfast Academical Institution, by paying the same respect to its certificates of the attendance and progress of the students in learning, as to the certificates from foreign universities, and by founding a Professorship of Divinity and Hebrew, for which purpose the Institution would afford suitable accommodation within its walls."

A few days after the passing of the above resolution, a deputation from the Synod met the joint Boards, and stated, "that they were disposed to recommend to the Synod that the certificates alluded to should be sustained by them, as soon as adequate Professors should be appointed to lecture on the different branches of science, which the Synod pointed out to students under their care."

A grant of £. 1,500 having been made by Parliament to the Institution in 1814, the Synod of Ulster in 1815, unanimously agreed to establish a Professorship of Divinity and Church History; and it is stated, that the connexion between the Synod and the Institution was not completed until there was a Parliamentary grant; because that circumstance afforded a pledge to the Synod, that the Institution would obtain the countenance of Government.

Appendix,
N^o 7, 8.

Dr. Hanna was appointed Professor by the Synod of Ulster in 1817; he lectures in the Institution, by the direction of the Synod. He receives no salary from the Institution. The Synod attempted to raise a fund for the endowment of the Professorship, but not finding this plan succeed, it was ordered, that each student should pay a fee of two guineas for the session, and the Treasurer of the Synod is directed to supply the sum required to make up the salary £.100 per annum.

Appendix,
N^o 7, 8.

The course of Divinity Lectures occupies two years, and is minutely described by Dr. Hanna in his Evidence, to which we beg to refer. The number of students who attended Dr. Hanna's lecture in the session 1824-5 was 23, and in the session 1825-6 the number in attendance was 25.

A similar application was made by the Managers to the Seceding Synod in 1814, and that Synod resolved to recommend to their students to attend the Belfast Academical Institution, and engaged to pay every respect to the certificates which young men might obtain for their progress and proficiency in literature.

Appendix,
N^o 15.

Dr. Edgar was thereupon appointed Professor of Divinity by the Seceding Synod in 1815. He receives £. 50 yearly, which sum is directed by the Synod to be paid by the students; the annual fee paid by each being more or less in proportion to the number attending each session. No addition is made by the Synod to the fees received from the students. The number attending Dr. Edgar's lectures in the session ended in May 1825 was 32, and 25 students were entered for the session 1825-6.*

The other Presbyterian bodies do not appoint any Professors, but the students intended for the ministries connected with them, resort for their instruction to either of the Professors appointed by the two Synods above mentioned.

We

* Dr. Edgar has died since the period of our examination, and his son has been appointed to succeed him.

107

We have already stated, that this Institution was founded professedly for the Education of all descriptions of students, without distinction of sect or profession, and that in the appointment to Professorships not theological, the selection was to be determined solely by the moral character and literary acquirements of the candidates, without reference to their peculiar religious opinions. The adherence to this principle in the election of Professors, necessarily brought together persons of different religious tenets, and the Board of Faculty thought it expedient that an explicit declaration should be made in their Minutes as to the line of conduct which the Professors had pursued, and were determined to pursue, with respect to the religious opinions of their pupils. On the 8th of February 1822, the following declaration was adopted and signed by the then existing members of the Board of Faculty, and it has also been subscribed by those Professors who have been appointed since that period.

“ Although the Faculty have hitherto confined themselves to the strict and avowed duties of their respective situations, without interfering in the least degree with the peculiar religious opinions of any denomination of Christians, (excepting in so far as the Theological Professors may have found it to be their duty to do so in the professional instructions which they have given to the students of their own communions while attending their own classes), yet considering that the Professors are members of different religious communions, and that there are students of various denominations of Christians attending the College, they deem it an indispensable duty, which, as instructors of youth, they owe to the public, to pledge themselves, as they hereby do, that they will continue to exercise the same strict impartiality which they have hitherto observed, and never interfere, directly or indirectly, with the religious faith of any of their pupils of whatever denomination, and that in particular they will always treat with deference and respect the religious establishments of the empire.”

The object of this declaration, and the feelings in which it originated, are stated in the Evidence of Professor Cairns, and will be found in the Appendix.

Appendix,
N^o 6.

This declaration was communicated in June in the same year to the Synod of Ulster, and the Seceding Synod, by a deputation from the Board; and in the interview which took place with the latter body, it was stated by Dr. Young and Mr. Cairns, as the understood import of the declaration, “ that whilst in teaching the languages, science and literature, the Professors will carefully avoid all interference with the distinguishing peculiarities of the various denominations of Christians, yet in all their instructions, and in conducting the discipline of the College, they will invariably recognise the truth and authority of natural and revealed religion, and will inculcate the general principles of Christian piety and morality.”

In addition to the nine Professors above described, there is a Lecturer on Elocution, the Rev. W. D. H. M'Ewen. He is not a member of the Board of Faculty, and has never received any salary from the Institution, with which in fact he appears to have no other connection than what arises from a permission to give lectures to the students within the College. His sole emolument is derived from the fees of the students who attend his class, which amount to about 60 guineas per annum. His class (including the sons of clergymen who are admitted free of expense) amounted to about 80 students in 1824-5.

The system which has been adopted, with regard to the Lecturer on Elocution, is in all respects similar to that pursued in the Scottish Universities. We think it desirable, however, that any person who has a permanent permission to give lectures in the College, should be subject to the same general regulations, and therefore sign the same declaration as the other Professors. We observe also, that Mr. M'Ewen has, by the proprietors, been appointed one of the Visitors of the Institution, a situation which we think incompatible with any office subject to the authority of a Visitor.

The yearly examination, which, according to the regulations of the College, takes place at the end of each session, appears to have produced considerable effect. These examinations are open to the public at large, and are attended by the parents and connections of the pupils, and by the Moderators of the Synod of Ulster, and of the Seceding Synod, together with a committee deputed for that purpose by each of those bodies. The examination takes place in the common hall, and it relates to the business done during the session; and those who acquit themselves well receive a certificate. Prizes are also voted by the pupils of each class. The classes assemble the day previous to the examination, and the students themselves vote premiums to the most deserving among their number.

At the end of three years, if a student acquits himself respectably at the examination, he receives a general certificate, signed by the Professors. There are also three prizes given at the general certificate examination, for those who answer best;—one in classics; one in moral philosophy, logic, and belles lettres; and the third in mathematics and natural philosophy. These general certificates, when signed by the Moderators of the respective Synods, and when the students have also attended the Divinity Professors, are received on the examination of candidates for the Presbyterian Church, as of equal value with the degree of M.A. conferred by a Scottish University.

The benefit of a three years course of lectures may thus be obtained for about 12 guineas, but a more extended course would cost about 18 guineas, or 6 guineas per annum.

The total number of the students who have entered the Collegiate department since November 1815 is 519. Of this number 118 have obtained the general certificates above referred to.

In order to show how far the Presbyterian Church in Ireland has been supplied with ministers from the Belfast Institution, we have obtained the following statements:—In the Synod of Ulster 23 ministers, wholly or in part educated in the Institution, have been ordained, who are now settled with congregations; of these, 19 are settled in Ulster, 2 in Munster, 1 in America, and 1 in England; and 26 other students have been licensed to preach, though they have not yet obtained congregations. These students were all under the care of Dr. Hanna.

In the Seceding Synod, under the care of Dr. Edgar, 21 ministers, educated wholly or in part in the Institution, have obtained congregations in Ireland, 9 have gone to America, and 21 have been licensed to preach.

Having thus stated the general course pursued in the Collegiate department, we proceed shortly to advert to that of the schools, with respect to which it is to be observed, that though an integral branch of the Institution, held within its walls, and subject to the general controul of the Board of Managers and Visitors, they have in fact no necessary connexion with the Collegiate department, and are under the immediate jurisdiction of the Board of Masters. They are not particularly connected with the education of the Presbyterian ministry, and very few of the persons who have been admitted into that body have passed through the schools; they have at all times been well attended, and have fully supported themselves, without any pecuniary aid from the general funds of the Institution; the use of the buildings, rent-free, being the only advantage which they derive from it. These consist of school-rooms (which, for want of space, are also used as college lecture-rooms) and two dwelling-houses, for the accommodation of the head Masters of the English and classical schools, and their boarders.

The schools are under separate Masters, who are independent of each other. There is a public weekly meeting in the common hall, when various specimens of writing, maps, accounts and drawings are exhibited, and examined by those who attend; and select passages from authors in different languages, with original essays, are read and recited.

All the pupils undergo also a public annual examination previous to the Summer vacation, and those who have been most distinguished for diligence, proficiency, and propriety of conduct, in the different schools, receive medals given by the Managers, which are publicly distributed.

The religious Education of the boys in the schools is left to their parents, or to the clergyman of whose congregation they are members, with every disposition to facilitate the means of attendance at the time which may be appointed. The boarders are regularly conducted to their respective places of worship, and either attend catechetical lectures, or are taught such catechisms as their parents may desire.

169

desire. Under these regulations, the differences which exist in the religious persuasions of the children, who meet together in the schools of the Institution, are not found to lead to any inconvenience, all being educated together in perfect harmony.

The union of so many schools in the same building, under distinct teachers of co-ordinate authority, each responsible for his own department, and paid according to his exertions and his services, has been found highly advantageous. The pupils thus have access to a variety of classes, suited to their degrees of proficiency or capacity, and as each school is conducted in a separate place, under a master devoting himself exclusively to a particular kind of study, a greater security is afforded, that no one part of Education shall be sacrificed to another, and the pupil, while he is instructed in languages or in composition, may also with equal advantage attend to the mathematical or mercantile part of his education.

We shall now briefly describe the several Schools in their order :—

English School.

THE Reverend Henry Montgomery, A. M. was appointed head master in 1817. In this school the pupils are instructed in spelling, reading, grammar, parsing, exercises in composition, recitation, history, chronology, and any other subjects calculated to produce a knowledge and proper application of the English language.

Appendix,
N^o 4.

Mr. Montgomery is a member of the Synod of Ulster; he has a congregation in the neighbourhood of Belfast. On entering upon the duties of his office, he found in the school six boarders and sixty-six day pupils. For the last four years the number has fluctuated from 35 to 45 boarders, and from 150 to 200 day scholars. Of the day pupils several have received gratuitous instruction on the nomination of subscribers of one hundred guineas, agreeably to the provision in the Act of Incorporation; and besides these, the sons of professors and masters, and likewise several others, under peculiar circumstances, have by the liberality of the master been educated free of expense. The number of pupils (including boarders and free scholars) in September 1824, was 186, of whom 5 were free, being on the foundation, and 11 from other causes. Of these 186, 52 were of the Established Church, 117 Presbyterians, 4 Protestants of other denominations, and 13 Roman Catholics. There are seldom more than from 70 to 110 pupils in the school at any one time, the others being divided amongst the different masters, and only coming to the English school at regular intervals. The head master teaches occasionally every class in the school, and also regularly instructs the senior classes in the ordinary routine. He has four assistants, of whom three are resident, and have the superintendence and instruction of the boarders before and after the usual hours of teaching.

The boarders read the New Testament, without note or comment, in the evening school. The senior pupils have the benefit of the Institution library.

In the English department, the terms are two guineas per annum for day scholars, and thirty guineas for boarders.

Classical School.

THE Reverend Thomas Dix Hincks was, in the year 1821, chosen to preside over the classical school. Mr. Hincks was educated in the University of Dublin, and had been engaged for many years in preparing students for their entrance into College; he is also, as before stated, the Professor of Hebrew in the Collegiate department. Mr. Hincks resided in Cork for 25 years, and during that period was minister of a Presbyterian congregation in that city. He is a member of the Presbytery of Antrim, but has no charge of a congregation.

Appendix,
N^o 10.

The object of this school is the preparation of boys in Latin and Greek, either for entering at the Universities, or for becoming members of those professions which require a competent knowledge of these languages. As the Provost and Senior Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin, have appointed a number of books, in which all students who enter are previously examined, those books are always read by such of the scholars as are sufficiently advanced, whilst the elementary books and others read in addition to the above, are selected by the head-master for the time being.

The number of pupils in September, 1824, was 118, 9 of whom were free on nominations, and 6 from other causes. Of these, 43 were members of the Established Church, 64 Presbyterians, 4 Protestants of other denominations, and 7 Roman Catholics. The head master has three and occasionally four assistants, who are appointed by the joint Boards of Managers and Visitors.

The number of boarders in this school has varied from 25 to 33, which latter is the highest number since Mr. Hincks became master. A great proportion of these are from the south of Ireland.

Mathematical and Mercantile School.

THIS School, in which pupils are instructed in arithmetic, geography, and mathematics, was opened in February 1814, under the care of Mr. James Thomson, A.M. of the University of Glasgow, the present master, and who is also, as before stated, Professor of Mathematics in the Collegiate department.

Appendix,
N° 3.

The pupils have access to a library belonging to the mathematical classes of the Institution, containing many of the most valuable English and foreign books on mathematical subjects.

There were 145 pupils in attendance in the different branches of science taught at this school, in September 1824. Two assistants are constantly employed, and sometimes three.

The terms per quarter are, for arithmetic and geography, each half a guinea, and for mathematics one guinea.

The Writing School.

Appendix,
N° 5.

THIS School was opened in February 1814, under the present master, Mr. Thomas Spence.

The master and an assistant attend daily from 10 in the morning till 3 in the afternoon, except on Saturdays, when the school closes at noon. The whole hours of attendance are divided into four equal portions, in each of which, as nearly as the business of the other schools will permit, one-fourth of the writing pupils attend.

The terms are half a guinea per quarter. The number of pupils attending in September 1824 was 160, of whom 4 were free on the foundation, and 6 free from other causes.

The French School.

THE present master, Mr. Adelbert d'Oisy, was appointed to the management of this school on the 26th of January, 1819. The number of pupils in September 1824 was 45. Of the above, one was free on the foundation, and four from other causes.

The terms in this school are one guinea per quarter.

Italian School.

THE Italian School is taught by the same master, and is usually composed of those scholars who have attained considerable proficiency in French. The number of pupils in September 1824 was three.

Terms: By the regulations, one guinea and a half per quarter, reduced to one guinea per quarter by the present master, with the approbation of the managers.

171

The Drawing School.

THE present master is Mr. Ferdinand Besancele.

The number of pupils in September 1824 was 6. The terms one guinea and half per quarter.

The Spanish School.

Mr. Ferdinand Besancele was appointed in January 1821 teacher of the Spanish language.

In September 1824 there were 8 pupils. The terms one guinea and half per quarter.

IN the preceding statements we have detailed the principal circumstances connected with the two branches of the Institution.

The following Lists will show the number of students in the Collegiate department, and the number of pupils in the Schools.

THE total number of students in the Collegiate department attending in the session ending May 1825, was 146. The following summary will show the Counties from which they came, and the several Ecclesiastical bodies to which they belonged.

County of	Synod of Ulster.	Seceding Synod.	Reformed Presbytery, or Covenanters.	Presbytery of Antrim.	Others.	Lay.
ANTRIM - - 31 ; viz.	14	3	3	2	-	9
ARMAGH - - 6 -	1	5	-	-	-	-
CAVAN - - 1 -	1	-	-	-	-	-
DONEGAL - - 7 -	5	2	-	-	-	-
DOWN - - 51 -	21	15	1	-	-	14
LONDONDERRY, 21 -	12	4	1	-	-	4
MONAGHAN - 12 -	2	10	-	-	-	-
TYRONE - - 11 -	5	5	-	-	1	-
LOUTH - - 1 -	1	-	-	-	-	-
CORK - - - 3 -	-	-	-	-	1	2
ENGLAND - - 1 -	-	-	-	-	1	-
JAMAICA - - 1 -	-	-	-	-	-	1
146	62	44	5	2	3	30

The total number of students entered for the session 1825-6, is 160. Of these there are—

Belonging to the Synod of Ulster	-	-	-	-	64
to the Seceding Synod	-	-	-	-	40
to the Presbytery of Antrim	-	-	-	-	4
to the Reformed Presbytery	-	-	-	-	8
Students not intended for the Presbyterian ministry	-	-	-	-	44
					160

Of the 44 students described as not intended for the Presbyterian ministry, the greater number are members of the Established Church. There are, however, in the number several Roman Catholics, and one or two of the Society of Friends.

Although this establishment is open to all classes of the community, without distinction of sect, yet considering the great mass of the population in Belfast and the adjoining districts, the Institution must be viewed as essentially Presbyterian; all the Professors, except one, and the masters of the two boarding schools, are in fact Presbyterians.

THE following Table shows in one view the number of Students attending each lecture for the session 1825-6 :—

	*	Public Pupils.	Private Pupils.
Divinity Lecture, under Dr. Hanna - -	-	25	-
Ditto - - - - Dr. Edgar - -	-	25	-
Hebrew - - - - - - - -	-	48	-
Natural Philosophy - - - -	-	29	5
Moral Philosophy - - - -	-	22	13
Senior Mathematical Class - - - -	-	12	2
Junior - - - D ^o - - - - -	-	59	-
Logic and Belles Lettres - - - -	-	30	18
Greek - - - - - - - -	-	25	7
Latin - - - - - - - -	-	15	7
Anatomy and Physiology - - - -	-	15	-

THE following Table shows the state of Attendance in the Schools on the 10th of October 1825 :—

SCHOOLS.	Entire Number of Pupils.	Day Scholars.	Boarders.	Free Scholars, [included in the preceding Columns.]		OBSERVATIONS.
				On the Foundation.	Free from other Causes.
English School - -	191	150	41	7	12	Besides these, 4 boys board with the Classical Master, who do not learn Classics, but attend the other Schools.
Classical School - -	143	119	24	9	9
Mathematical and Mercantile School - - }	217	-	-	11	11	Of the entire number, 57 learn Mathematics, 167 Arithmetic, 49 Geography, and 11 Book-keeping. The same pupil in many instances attending two or more of these branches. Of the Free Scholars on the Foundation, 3 learn Mathematics, 8 Arithmetic, and 2 Geography; and of the Free Scholars on other accounts, 4 learn Mathematics, 7 Arithmetic, and 1 Geography.
Writing School - -	174	-	-	6	5
French School - -	34	-	-	-	2
Drawing School - -	16	-	-	-	1
Spanish School - -	4	-	-	-	-

The number of distinct Pupils in all the Schools is 302.

* Public Students—are those who not only attend the Lectures delivered by the Professor to all his pupils, but who also attend daily at a separate and additional hour, when they are regularly examined on the substance of the Lectures, &c. They have also to submit to certain public examinations on entering the class, and at the close of the session.

Private Students—are those who attend only the daily Prelections of the Professor, and who are not required to submit to the separate examinations above-mentioned.

Besides

173

Besides the pupils of the town of Belfast and its immediate neighbourhood, who may be reckoned as amounting to about 114, the schools contained during the year ended October 1825, 188 scholars from 19 counties in Ireland, according to the following list:—

Down - - - -	70	Tipperary - - -	1
Antrim - - - -	32	Queen's County - - -	2
Derry - - - -	19	Kilkenny - - - -	1
Armagh - - - -	9	Louth - - - -	1
Tyrone - - - -	8	Wicklow - - - -	1
Clare - - - -	1	Carlow - - - -	1
Sligo - - - -	2	Cork - - - -	9
Donegal - - - -	4	Other places - - -	12
Cavan - - - -	4
Fermanagh - - -	3	Total - - -	188
Monaghan - - -	1
Dublin - - - -	7

This list includes about 20 students of the Collegiate department, who have availed themselves of the opportunity afforded by the connexion of the school and college, of improving themselves in such preparatory studies as they thought necessary. In like manner, several of the scholars not intended for learned professions, have attended one or more of the College classes, to acquire a higher kind of Education than the mere ordinary course of instruction which the schools could supply.

From a statement (which will be found in the Appendix,) containing an account of the number of pupils who have passed through the several schools, it will appear that 1,368 pupils have received, or are in the course of receiving instruction in the mathematical and mercantile school, since the year 1814, when the school was first opened; and it is ascertained, that 189 individuals, who have received instruction from Mr. Thomson, either in his school or in his college classes, have acted as teachers in different schools throughout the kingdom. This number is, however, supposed to fall far short of the actual number of teachers trained up in the schools.

Nº 37.

Under the system of instruction and management which we have attempted to describe, the Institution stands high in public estimation. Those persons, who, from their intelligence, rank and station in society, are best qualified to judge of its merits, express themselves in the strongest terms, as to the benefits which it has conferred upon the north of Ireland. This approbation is not confined to any particular class or party. The Lord Bishop of Down and Connor, the Right Reverend Dr. Crolly, Bishop of the Roman Catholic Church, resident at Belfast, the several persons whom we examined, connected with the Presbyterian body, and the resident nobility and gentry, all agree on this subject. For the words in which their sentiments are recorded, we beg leave to refer to the Appendix.

Appendix,
Nos 28, 29, 26, 27,
30, 31, 32, 33, 34,
35, &c.

We should, perhaps, have been contented to rest upon the weight of these authorities, if, in the course of our investigations we had not been led to perceive, that the Institution had assumed, during its progress, a different and more important character than that which it had obtained at its outset. It had been originally established as a seminary for general instruction; and though a wish appears to have been entertained at its foundation, that it should be connected with the Presbyterian Synods, we found, that it was only of late years that it had become a college for the education of the Presbyterian clergy of Ireland. With reference, therefore, to that important object, we thought it our duty to examine, whether the long established Universities of Scotland might not possess advantages more than sufficient to counterbalance the benefits which, under the most favourable circumstances, could be expected to result from an Institution so recently established as that at Belfast.

The Reverend James Carlile, a native of Scotland, educated in the University of Glasgow, who, at the time of his examination, was Moderator of the Synod of Ulster, gave his opinion, as follows:—" I consider a home education a thing of very great importance. I consider, from what I have seen at Glasgow, and

Appendix,
Nº 19.

“ what I have seen here, of those who have returned from Glasgow, that it is “ highly desirable that our students should be educated in Ireland; and from “ what I have seen of the effects of the Institution, I do conceive it is of great “ importance.”

With respect to the Irish students at Glasgow, Mr. Carlile added,—“ They “ were left with little check or controul over them; they seldom brought letters “ of introduction; they had no acquaintance, and they kept almost entirely by “ themselves; even in the divinity hall they generally sat in a back place
 “ by themselves, and formed little acquaintance among the other students. Be“ sides, what they did there was unknown to their parents or guardians here;
 “ and from what I have heard, I have no doubt many of them fell into practices “ that were very dangerous to them.”—He adds, “ that the characters of the “ students and their education are highly advanced in respectability since he “ came to this country, which he attributes, in a great measure, to their home “ education.”

Appendix,
 N^o 21.

Mr. Porter, clerk of the Synod of Ulster, says,—“ I wish to maintain our con“ nection with the Institution, still more for the moral, than even for the literary “ advantages which it affords to our young men. These moral advantages arise “ from students being placed under the eyes of ministers and other persons, who “ take an interest in their well being. Thoughtless boys are exposed to great “ moral danger, by being sent to a place in which they are utterly unknown, and “ where they may practise every species of folly with comparative secrecy. With “ respect to literary advantages, the students in the Institution are so few, that it “ is in the power of each professor to pay attention to every boy in his class,
 “ and to examine him every day.”

Appendix,
 N^{os} 23, 24, 25.

Mr. Cooke, late Moderator of the Synod of Ulster, thus expresses his opinion on this point:—“ I think Education in Ireland is greatly preferable to Education “ abroad, on account of the young men being nearer the eye of their spiritual “ guardians. Scotland I consider most favourable to discipline for Scotch “ students, Ireland for Irish students.”

Appendix,
 N^{os} 7, 8.

The following Extract from the evidence of Doctor Hanna, the Divinity Professor, will show his opinion of the benefit to be derived from having the candidates for the ministry educated at Belfast:—

“ I am of opinion, that the Irish students in Scotland laboured under consider“ able disadvantages; and from the mode of Education here, I am also of “ opinion, that a great spirit of emulation is excited among the young men.
 “ Even this is not all; it is now impossible for a young man to pass through our “ classes without attending to his business. I would wish not to speak disrespect“ fully of the Scotch colleges; but when I attended, a student might go through “ a class and not know much of the business of the class, and leave it before the “ close of the session. There is one advantage the divinity students have here,
 “ which they have not in Scotland: there are no students that come here to study,
 “ that have not friends who are acquainted with some people at Belfast, and they “ are invited to the houses of private families. I am of opinion, that our young men “ are much improved in their manners and appearance, in consequence of their “ studying here. I believe that will be acknowledged to be a fact, by those who “ knew what the young men were from the Scotch colleges, and what they now
 “ are from our Institution. From my connections through the different parts of “ the town, I can, whenever I choose to do it, make myself intimately acquainted “ with the private conduct of every student belonging to my class.” Other testimony, to the same general effect, will be found in the Appendix.

To the opinions in favour of the Education given at Belfast, there appeared to be a prominent exception, resting upon a point of considerable importance. Mr.
 Cooke, when Moderator of the Synod, had publicly expressed his opinion, in an examination before a Committee of the House of Lords, in 1825, “ That he enter“ tained very great fear, that the Institution, as at present constituted, would finally “ become, as it had already in some degree, a great seminary of Arianism.”

Apprehensions, similar to those expressed by Mr. Cooke, had been manifested by the Synod of Ulster. In the Seceding Synod (which requires from all its clergy subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith) the alarm had been less felt.

The

175

The attention of that body appeared, nevertheless, to have been drawn to the consideration of the subject, as, at their annual general meeting in 1823, a motion was made and unanimously adopted, "That the Synod deeply regretted the introduction of Professors reputed to be of Arian principles into the Institution, and that they strongly detested such principles."

Under these circumstances, we thought it our duty to examine particularly into the origin and ground of these apprehensions. We were informed, that one of the four Vice Presidents, and several of the gentlemen appointed by the Proprietors, as Managers and Visitors of the Institution, professed Arian principles; that, in addition to these, Mr. Bruce, the Professor of Latin and Greek; Mr. Hincks, the Professor of Hebrew, and head Master of the classical school; Mr. M'Ewen, the Lecturer on Elocution; and Mr. Montgomery, the Master of the English school, were also Arians.

It was with reference to their appointments, that Mr. Cooke, who is favourably disposed towards home education, on general grounds, stated to us, that as the Institution is at present constituted, he should, with all its inconveniences, prefer Glasgow to the Belfast Institution, as a resort for the students of the Presbyterian ministry. "There are," he adds, "some of those who exercise considerable influence over the Belfast Institution, of whose religious opinions and practical piety I do not entertain a favourable opinion. These persons become prominent, while better men keep in the back ground. The strain of public preaching is also in Glasgow almost universally evangelical—so is the tone of public conversation. Preaching and conversation of another character hold a public and eminent station in Belfast. Hence I apprehend, ultimately, a dangerous influence and injurious effect, as the Belfast Institution is at present constituted. Were the Institution thoroughly reformed, my scruples concerning the Education for the Ministry in Belfast would be removed."

Though the fears thus expressed pointed to ultimate danger and indirect influence, rather than to the existence of any immediate evil, we proceeded to inquire, whether Arian principles were in fact taught in the Institution, and whether they could be shown to prevail amongst those who had been educated there.

Upon these points we examined a variety of witnesses. By their concurrent testimony we have been led to believe, that whatever may be apprehended from the countenance and support indirectly given to Arian principles in the College, the whole tendency of the instruction, both in the divinity and other classes, is, to use the expression of one of the witnesses, to "lead away from Arianism." We believe also, that whatever may be the religious tenets of the different Professors, they have strictly conformed to the engagement respectively entered into by them, not to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the religious opinions of the students under their charge; and that they have not availed themselves of such opportunities as their situation in the college might be supposed to have afforded them, of inculcating or disseminating their own peculiar opinions.

On this head, the strongest assurances were given to us by all the persons connected with the Institution, whom we examined. It appeared, that as soon as the opinion expressed by Mr. Cooke was known at Belfast, the students had voluntarily assembled, for the purpose of meeting the assertion with a decided contradiction; and they resolved to record their conviction, that "the pledge given by the several Professors, not to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the religious opinions of the students, had been so faithfully adhered to, that there had not occurred to their knowledge a single instance of its being violated."

The Board of Faculty had also on the same occasion declared,—"That if the words used by Mr. Cooke meant to convey the impression, that the doctrines of Arianism had been taught by them in the Institution, (farther than it might have been necessary for the two Professors of Theology, who were avowed Trinitarians, to expound the views of various sectaries), or that any individual of all the Professors had, in the least degree, promulgated those doctrines in the Institution, or had in any way whatever tampered with the peculiar religious opinions of his pupils, that they contained a gross and scandalous libel on the Professors, not only unsupported by facts, but in direct and known opposition to them."

The joint Boards of Managers and Visitors also published a declaration on the same subject, wherein they stated—"that such representation of the present state and future tendency of the Belfast Academical Institution was altogether groundless and imaginary, and that the Boards had full assurance, that no attempt had ever been made by the Professors, to inculcate on the minds of the students, directly or indirectly, the peculiar tenets of any denomination of Christians."

The Proprietors, at their annual meeting in July 1825, passed a vote of thanks to the joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, for their prompt, temperate and firm declaration, that the Belfast Academical Institution never was a seminary of Arianism, nor likely to become so.

These declarations appear to be strictly true, with respect to all the Professors who have subscribed the declaration before alluded to. It must be observed, however, with respect to Mr. M'Ewen, the Lecturer on Elocution, by whom, as we have already noticed, that engagement has never been signed, that an infringement of the principle laid down in it has taken place.

Amongst the prize books distributed by him on one occasion to the pupils of his class, some were included which were decidedly of an Arian character, and which ought not to have been put into the hands of the students. Mr. M'Ewen admits it was an inconsiderate act; he states, that he had no intention of making proselytes; that the moment it became the subject of remark he regretted it, and has since avoided doing any thing of the kind. The Board of Faculty subsequently ordered, that no books shall be distributed as prizes, which have not been previously submitted to inspection, a regulation which it is to be hoped will prevent for the future any similar breach of the rules or principles of the Institution.

It is stated by Mr. Cooke, that "he never knew the Belfast Academical Institution to be so free of anti-evangelical students as at present;" and with respect to the persons who have received their academical instruction there, Dr. Hanna stated, that there were 19 or 20 ordained ministers in the Synod of Ulster, who had been in his class; of these he has no doubt that all but one are orthodox. Of twenty-eight probationers, who had been also in his class, one only had professed Arian opinions, which it is probable he had adopted before he came into the college.

Appendix,
N^o 15,

Appendix,
N^{os} 14, 19, 17, 18,
22.

Appendix,
N^o 19.

Dr. Edgar, who belongs to the Seceding Synod, and whose doctrines are therefore in strict conformity with those of the Church of Scotland, expressed his conviction, that the Institution in its present state is not calculated to promote Arianism. To the evidence of these gentlemen, as well as to that of Dr. Young, Mr. Carlile, Mr. Barnett, and Mr. Heron, the Moderator of the Seceding Synod, we beg leave particularly to refer.

Mr. Carlile informed us generally, with regard to the prevalence of Arian principles in the north of Ireland, that "Arianism when it was introduced, was the fashionable philosophy of the day." He states "that it came into Scotland from Dr. Samuel Clarke and his party in England, and it came from Scotland into Ireland from some of the Professors there; it then became fashionable for a time in this country also, and those who held orthodox sentiments were looked upon as men of little science or talent; but true religion is from its nature, and from the circumstances of the poor, always most acceptable to them; the rich have many temptations to reject it, which the poor have not."

Appendix,
N^{os} 23, 24, 25.

Mr. Cooke also confirmed this view; he states—"that Arianism is very much on the decrease; it was the greatest perhaps about 100 years ago. At the time the Presbytery of Antrim was separated from the Synod of Ulster, it made very considerable progress under the patronage of high names; as Abernethy, the author of a very excellent work upon the attributes, who gave it a great deal of eclat. It afterwards declined for a time, but there was subsequently a revival. Forty or fifty years ago it might be at its height, and remained stationary for a time, or was even upon the increase, but latterly it has decidedly declined."

THE extent to which Arian principles are understood at present to exist in the several Presbyterian bodies in Ireland, may be stated as follows:—

In the Synod of Ulster, in which there are at present 197 congregations, and about 200 ministers, it has been stated to us, that there are 34 or 35 who hold
Arian

Arian doctrines. In the Seceding Synod there is no Minister of Arian principles. The Presbytery of Antrim and Synod of Munster contain altogether about 16 congregations, and 19 or 20 Ministers, of whom 17 are reputed to be Arians.

In all the Presbyteries composing the Synod of Ulster, it was required, in conformity with the practice of the Scotch church, till a period comparatively recent, that every Minister should before ordination, sign the Westminster Confession of Faith, to which it was generally considered that no Arian could sincerely subscribe.

In some Presbyteries of that Synod, however, the practice of insisting on the subscription has been relinquished, and by a late regulation of the Synod, the necessity of signing this test has been dispensed with, and the Presbyteries are left to their own choice in this respect, some requiring the signature, others not.

It is important however to remark, that the circumstance of a particular Presbytery not requiring subscription as indispensable, by no means proves that the Ministers composing that Presbytery dissent from the standard doctrines of the Scotch Church. The candidate for the ministry is in all cases subject to examination on every point of his religious opinions and belief, before receiving his licence. Some of the Presbyteries which dispense with subscription are, according to the evidence of Dr. Hanna, as orthodox as those which require it.

Although by the general tenor of the evidence to which we have alluded, we were led to believe that the Education given at Belfast had not hitherto inculcated or tended to disseminate Arianism;—that out of the number of Ministers admitted of late years into the Synod of Ulster, a diminished rather than an increased proportion held those opinions, and that generally Arian principles had been for many years decreasing, it appeared that the Synod of Ulster regarded the subject with such anxiety, and entertained such lively apprehensions, that an injurious effect would be ultimately produced by the example of those individuals connected with the Institution, whose religious principles we have already alluded to, that they had thought it their duty to suggest to the Proprietors and Managers of the Institution, such an arrangement as would in their view guard against the danger they apprehended.

At a Meeting of the General Synod of Ulster in 1824, it was proposed, and unanimously agreed to, that—"Whenever the Moderator of this Synod shall be called on to vote at the election of a Professor in the Belfast Institution, he shall in due time convene the General Synod's fixed Committee, and cause to be laid before them the names of the several candidates, with their commendatory testimonials, and shall afterwards communicate to the electors the opinion of the Committee."

The proposition of the Synod was taken into consideration by the Managers of the Institution in June 1825, who thereupon expressed their desire to meet as far possible the wishes of the Synod, and resolved as follows:—

"That the names and testimonials of the several candidates for professorships, which may hereafter become vacant in the Institution, shall be submitted to the Moderator of the General Synod of Ulster, on his applying for the same, for the purposes mentioned in said Overture. The original documents, being the property of the candidates, are not to be taken out of the Institution."

This Resolution was communicated by letter to the Synod at their annual meeting in 1825, at which the consideration of the subject was renewed, and the following, among other Overtures or Proposals, were agreed to:—

III. "Overtured and agreed to, That so soon as the Moderator of this Synod shall learn, upon any occasion, that a Professor is to be chosen in the Belfast Academical Institution, he shall immediately advise the several Presbyteries; and that each Presbytery shall thereupon appoint a Minister and Elder to meet the Moderator in Belfast; and after examining testimonials, to give their opinion respecting the qualifications of candidates, which opinion the Moderator shall communicate to the electors, specifying the candidates whom they consider eligible."

IV. "Overtured, and agreed to:—

" 1. That this Synod deeply regret, that, by the appointment of some persons holding Arian sentiments to professorships in the Belfast Academical Institution, a diminution of public confidence in that seminary has been produced.

" 2. This Synod direct their Committee, that in all cases of elections to professorships in the Belfast Academical Institution, they recommend to the attention of the electors none but persons of orthodox sentiments; and do expect and trust, that the Managers and Visitors of the Belfast Academical Institution shall, in all cases of election, hold in view the opinion of the Synod, respecting the necessity of electing such persons to professorships connected with the students of this church.

" 3. That the Synod do now appoint a Committee to negotiate with the Proprietors of the Belfast Academical Institution, respecting the recognition, by a bye-law, of the Overture of Synod, relative to election to professorships connected with the students of this church."

The Committee appointed as above to negotiate with the Proprietors of the Belfast Institution, met on the 29th September, 1825, at Belfast, and communicated the following Resolution to the Court of Proprietors then assembled:—

" That our Moderator be instructed respectfully to request the Proprietors of the Belfast Academical Institution to authorize, by a bye-law, or by such other mode as may be consistent with the Act of Incorporation, the joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, whenever a Professor is about to be chosen, to give notice of the day of election to the Moderator of the Synod, in sufficient time for him to convene a Committee of the Synod in Belfast, and to afford to the said Committee access to the testimonials of the different candidates, for the purpose of forming an opinion respecting the qualifications of such candidates, which opinion the Moderator is directed to communicate to the electors, specifying those candidates whom the Committee consider eligible."

In reply to this Resolution of the Committee of Synod, the assembled body of the Proprietors came to the following Resolution:—"The Proprietors of the Belfast Academical Institution have received the communication from the General Synod of Ulster, with all due respect, and a sincere wish to cultivate a connexion so beneficial to both bodies.

" As to the Education of their students of divinity, they conceive that the Synod are in possession of the influence which they desire, inasmuch as they have the appointment of a Professor of Divinity and Church History, the only branches peculiarly connected with the students of their church. With respect to the other departments, the Proprietors are pledged not to suffer any interference on the part of the Professors with the religious sentiments of their pupils. With their adherence to this pledge, they understand that the Synod are satisfied.

" The Moderator of the Synod, being a visitor and elector, ex officio, has it in his power to consult with the different Presbyteries, and to announce their opinion to the electors assembled; and the Secretary will have orders to afford him copies of the certificates of the candidates.

" This appears to be the substance of what the Synod require, and may be effected without any alteration in the bye-laws, or violation of the principles on which the Institution was founded. Any further extension of the influence of the Synod, in the election of the Professors, would be inconsistent with these, and would give just offence to other denominations of Christians.

" In this opinion they hope that the reverend Synod will concur, being very anxious that no cause of discontent should arise between them and the Institution."

These proceedings of the Committee were reported to the General Annual Meeting of the Synod in June 1826; and at the same time, the Secretary of the Belfast Academical Institution addressed a letter to the Moderator, in the name of the joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, in which, amongst other matters, he states as follows:—"That the Managers and Visitors beg leave to state, that the Synod of Ulster may calculate on continuing to experience every facility, upon the part of the Directors of this national seminary, in carrying into effect the wishes
" of

“ of that reverend body, with respect to the Education of the students under their pastoral jurisdiction.”

The foregoing communications having been received and taken into consideration by the Synod at the same Meeting, it was resolved, after long deliberation and much discussion,—“ That the Synod having received every assurance that the Overture of 1824, relative to the election of Professors in the Belfast Institution, sanctioned as it has been by the joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, and recognized in principle by the Court of Proprietors, on the 29th Sept. 1825, is calculated to afford the same security, and produce the same beneficial effects, that were contemplated by the Overture of 1825, relative to the same subject; and believing that the Resolution of the joint Boards, respecting the Overture of 1824, will at all times be acted on with good faith, and hoping that the Court of Proprietors may yet see the wisdom of securing its permanence by some legal enactment, is now disposed to rest satisfied with it.” The Synod also came to the following Resolution,—“ That it be earnestly recommended to the electors in the Belfast Institution, that in future no Minister of any denomination, holding a pastoral charge, be appointed to any of its Professorships.”

Appendix,
N° 39.

With these Resolutions the long continued discussion between the Synod of Ulster and the Institution has been terminated. By the first it appears, that the Synod are satisfied that the arrangement which they originally proposed to the Institution, and which was acceded to by that body in 1825, will sufficiently secure the object they had in view. By the second Resolution, that in future no Minister, holding a pastoral charge, shall be appointed to a Professorship, the Synod will obtain an additional security. It has been a matter of complaint, that though a Professor might be silent with respect to his peculiar tenets within the walls of the Institution, he has been at liberty openly to maintain them before such of his pupils as might form a part of his congregation; a practice which will, by the operation of this Resolution, be rendered impossible, with respect to any Professor hereafter to be elected.

This Resolution is properly restrained from disturbing any of the existing appointments, none of which ought we think to be affected by it.

It is to be observed, with reference to the Seceding Synod, that although, as we have already stated, they in 1823 expressed their “ detestation of Arian principles,” they were of opinion, that “ as the Professors had come under solemn engagements not to interfere with the religious opinions of the students, and as no fundamental principle of the Institution had been violated, they saw no grounds for dissolving their connection with the Institution.”

By them therefore no further security was sought for. We think it right, however, to point out, that this respectable portion of the Presbyterian body has no immediate representative in the Belfast Academical Institution; and it appears reasonable, that the Moderator of that body (if at any future time the Act of Incorporation should be amended) should be placed in a position, with reference to the Institution, in all respects similar to that of the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster.

In determining, whether it was our duty to recommend this Institution to the protection and support of the Government, we were most seriously impressed by the charge which had been made against it, on the ground of its tendency to disseminate Arianism. We looked therefore with considerable anxiety to the communications which had taken place upon that subject, between the Synod of Ulster, and the Proprietors and Managers of the Institution.

The Synod of Ulster cannot but be considered as the body most interested in preserving the orthodoxy of its own Ministers, and it has been publicly stated by Mr. Cooke, that the mode by which they sought to secure that object was by obtaining an efficient representation of the sentiments of the Synod, in all cases of election of Professors, by which he thought an effectual barrier would be opposed to the admission of Arian candidates.

The Managers and Visitors have agreed to adopt the regulations proposed in the Overture of 1824; and we think it right to state distinctly, what we understand to be the substance and effect of these regulations.

It appears to us, that the joint Boards of Managers and Visitors have agreed to furnish the names and testimonials of the different candidates to the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster, in order that he may submit them to the Synod's fixed Committee.

The Managers and Visitors appear further to have undertaken to receive from the Moderator the opinion of the Committee, as to the different candidates; and the spirit in which that opinion is to be received is clearly defined in a letter which forms a part of the correspondence on this subject, addressed to the Moderator in June 1826, in which the joint Boards assured the Synod, "that they might calculate on continuing to experience every facility upon the part of the Directors of that Seminary, in carrying into effect the wishes of that reverend body, with respect to the Education of the students under their pastoral jurisdiction."

We think it should be further provided, that the names of the several candidates for Professorships, and copies of their testimonials, should be sent at least ten days before the election, to each of the official Visitors named in the Act of Incorporation. These Visitors, being electors, will no doubt attend whenever their presence is required; and when their attention shall have been deliberately called to the qualifications of the different candidates, no apprehension can be entertained, that any Professor will ever be appointed, against whom a reasonable objection can be raised.

That the substance of the Overture of 1824 should receive the solemn sanction of the Proprietors, by being made the subject of a bye-law, is in itself a reasonable request; and we trust that there will be no unwillingness on the part of the Proprietors to comply with it.

The regulation which provides, that no Professor who may be hereafter elected shall hold a pastoral charge, should also, in our opinion, receive the sanction of a bye-law.

It is hardly necessary for us to observe, that as long as the Institution continues to be so closely connected with the Synods, and its Directors are desirous of educating persons destined to the Presbyterian ministry, they cannot fail to be aware, that the interest of the Institution will be best consulted by the election of such Professors only as would be acceptable to those bodies.

In an Institution for educating Presbyterian Ministers, some securities appear to us to be necessary, on the ground on which they were sought for by the Synod of Ulster. We are, at the same time, aware of the difficulty there would have been in providing such securities, without infringing upon the fundamental principles on which the Institution has been founded.

Among the most important of these, is the regulation which not only secures Education to all descriptions of students, without distinction of sect or profession, but which provides also, that in the appointment to Professorships, not theological, the selection shall be determined solely by the moral character and literary acquirements of the candidates, without reference to religious opinions.

We are persuaded, that under the existing situation and circumstances of Ireland, the abandonment of this principle would materially impair the utility of the Institution. We must repeat, therefore, that to have devised such regulations as should have satisfied the apprehensions of the Synod, without subverting the fundamental principle of the Institution, would have imposed a difficulty upon us, which we are willingly relieved from by the arrangement to which we have alluded. We shall content ourselves, therefore, with expressing our sincere hope and confident expectation, that the regulations we have described, and the suggestions we have offered, respecting them, will be scrupulously carried into effect.

Having thus observed upon the principal objection urged against the Institution, it is our duty not to pass, without notice, a charge which formerly attached to it, of a different character. It has been affirmed, that some of the persons connected with the Establishment have entertained opinions subversive of government and civil order. We feel it to be no more than an act of justice to declare our conviction, founded on the unanimous opinions of all the persons with whom we have communicated on the subject, that there exists at present no foundation whatever for such a supposition.

By

By the foregoing account we have, as we trust, sufficiently developed the character of the Institution, and have shown what are the opinions of others, as to its influence and effects. It now becomes our duty to state, that the opinion which we have formed of it, as well from extended inquiries as from our own personal inspection, is highly favourable.

The zeal and efficiency of the several Professors, the comprehensive and useful character of the instruction, the attention and good conduct of the students, entitle the Establishment to an expression of our approbation.

We have been led to consider this Institution as a most important seminary for the Education of the Ministers of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland; and we agree entirely in the opinions which we have already referred to, that under all the circumstances of situation and local connection, the students destined to that ministry will, taken collectively, be upon the whole more carefully and effectively instructed in Belfast, than if they had to encounter the difficulties, and incur the expense of seeking for their education in distant Universities; an alternative, however, which is still open to them, if they wish to resort to it.

If, in the earlier periods of the existence of this Institution, and before the arrangements for instruction in it had obtained a consistent and settled form, and its character had been fully established, doubts upon these points might have been entertained, we think they must altogether cease, when it is considered, that in addition to the approbation of the Institution, so generally expressed by the community at large, the Presbyterian body may be now considered as concurring in an anxious wish for its maintenance and support.

Though it is with a view to its connexion with the Presbyterian ministry chiefly, that we consider the Institution as entitled to the favour and countenance of the Government, it must not be forgotten, that as a place of general Education, it can hardly fail to have a beneficial influence, not only in the Province of Ulster, but throughout the whole of Ireland. The increasing wealth and importance of the district in which it is situated, would entitle it to consideration as a local Institution; its benefits, however, cannot fail to be more widely extended, as it affords at a moderate expense, and to all classes of persons, without distinction or jealousy on the ground of religious opinions, a general and useful Education.

Under these circumstances, we trust we shall be justified in recommending, that the grant, which has now for some years been discontinued, should be restored to the Institution, which would thus be again recognized and upheld by the State.

We are of opinion, however, that the grant should not be made in the same manner, or distributed according to the same rules as it was formerly, but that a certain sum should be placed annually at the disposal of the Lord Lieutenant, for the benefit of the Institution, and that on the election of any Professor, whether appointed by the Managers and Visitors, or by the respective Synods, the Board of Management should transmit to His Excellency, copies of the testimonials both of character and qualification of the individual elected; and that on the inspection of these certificates, the Lord Lieutenant should grant or withhold the salary destined for such Professorship, out of the fund so placed at his disposal.

We beg leave to offer the following Table, in which such Salaries are proposed, as would render the Professors respectable and independent, without tending to abate the exertion necessary to improve their incomes by the amount received from the fees of the students.

					Proposed Salary.
Professor of Natural Philosophy	-	-	-	-	£. 150
Mathematics	-	-	-	-	150
Moral Philosophy	-	-	-	-	150
Logic and Belles Lettres	-	-	-	-	150
Latin and Greek	-	-	-	-	150
Anatomy and Physiology	-	-	-	-	150
Hebrew	-	-	-	-	150
Divinity (Synod of Ulster)	-	-	-	-	150
Ditto - (Seceding Synod)	-	-	-	-	150
					£. 1,350

The Lecturer on Elocution is not included in this List, as no part of his emoluments have at any time been received from the funds of the Institution.

In this List we have assigned to each Professor the salary which in our opinion he ought to receive. We think, however, that the sum of £. 50 may fairly be withheld from the present Mathematical and Hebrew Professors, and from the two present Professors of Divinity. The two former Professors are also Masters of the two Boarding Schools, and thereby derive considerable profit; but as it is intended, that in future no Master of the schools shall fill a Professor's chair, the full salary of £. 150 ought to be paid to all future Professors of Hebrew and Mathematics, as well as to the other Professors.

With respect to the Professors of Divinity, it is to be observed, that both of them at present have congregations in Belfast, which they will no doubt continue to hold, as the recent suggestion of the Synod of Ulster on that head, is intended only to apply to future appointments. We think therefore, that for the lives of each of the present Professors, the sum of £. 100 annually will, in addition to their congregations, be found sufficient, but that their successors ought to receive the same sum as the other Professors. By this arrangement there will be for the present a surplus of £. 350 a year to carry to the general account of the Institution, which we are satisfied may be usefully employed towards repairing the buildings, or furnishing the different Lecturers with the apparatus and other things of which they stand so much in need.

T. FRANKLAND LEWIS. (L. S.)

W. GRANT. (L. S.)

A. R. BLAKE. (L. S.)

Dublin, 27 January 1827.

183

COPY OF A

LETTER from J. LESLIE FOSTER, Esq. and J. GLASSFORD, Esq.

Two of the Commissioners,

To the Right Honourable Robert Peel.

SIR,

Dublin, 1st February, 1827.

THE circumstances which have obliged us to withhold our signatures from the Report made by a majority of the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry, upon the Belfast Institution, are of so peculiar a nature, that we trust we shall be excused for the course which we adopt, of addressing to His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, a letter explanatory of our views.

We are deeply impressed with a sense of the advantages which might be derived from the encouragement of the Belfast Institution, and with a conviction of the strong claims of the Presbyterian Clergy of Ireland to the extension of parliamentary assistance for their Education, upon any terms that should not involve matter of just and necessary objection. We feel it impossible, however, to join in recommending measures to His Majesty, which might eventually cause the bounty of the state to be employed in diffusing principles which we deem inconsistent with the fundamental truths of Christianity.

There is no church which, by its articles of faith, maintains the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and all the important doctrines connected with that truth, more unequivocally than the Church of Scotland, to which the Presbyterians of Ireland belong; and accordingly, we observe, that the appointment of Arians to Professorships in the Belfast Institution, has of late years called forth the strongest expressions of disapprobation, both from the Synod of Ulster and the Seceding Synod.

It is the peculiar feature of the present case, that while only a small proportion of the Irish Presbyterian Ministers hold Arian principles, and while these principles are rejected and condemned by the Presbyterian body in general, a majority among the acting managers of the Belfast Institution are stated by respectable witnesses to be Arians. We farther observe, that while it is a rule of the Institution, that religious opinions are not to be adverted to in elections, it has nevertheless happened, that the present Professor of Greek, the present Professor of Hebrew, who is also classical teacher in the school department, and head of one of the two boarding houses, the present Lecturer on Elocution, and the present English Master in the school department, who is head of the other boarding house, are avowed Arians. For the nature of their views we beg leave to refer generally to the evidence.

We are satisfied, that as yet these appointments have not led to an extension of Arian doctrines amongst the Presbyterian body. But we apprehend, that Professors and Masters, in the performance of the duties which are assigned to their offices, must necessarily be swayed by their own views upon so important a subject, and that a powerful though tacit influence must be continually exercised by them upon the young persons in their classes, and still more upon such as live under their roofs. The pupils must feel a general respect for the judgment of the able persons by whom they are instructed, whose principles are no secret, and who, though silent in respect to such questions within the walls of the Institution, are not so in the pulpits of Belfast, or upon other occasions.

It is obvious, that the danger would be greatly enhanced, if, by a continuation of elections similar in their results to those which we have mentioned, a decided majority of the Teachers and Professors should hereafter entertain these views.

The doctrines in question are as yet rejected by a vast majority of the Presbyterians ; but should they obtain a preponderance in the institution, which is to form the religious opinions of the pastors and instructors of the rising generation, the consequence might be to reverse, at a future day, the proportion which the orthodox members of the Church of Scotland and the Arians now bear to each other, in the Irish Presbyterian body.

Although, therefore, the existing state of things has not as yet produced those effects which might not unreasonably have been expected, we cannot consider this circumstance as affording a sufficient security for the future. We hope and believe, that a large majority of the Presbyterian clergy of Ireland, the great body of the Presbyterian people, and a considerable majority, if not of the Managers, at least of the persons connected with the Belfast Institution, would view with pleasure the adoption of any reasonable regulation for securing that, in future all such, at least of the Professors and Masters as have any share in the formation of religious opinions, should be persons believing in the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ. We need scarcely observe, that the question is not one of toleration towards any who deny that important truth, but whether they are to be endowed by the state as the instructors of youth.

Although it was natural that no provision should have been originally made against an unforeseen danger of this kind, it appears to us, that after it has become manifest, we are no longer at liberty to recommend the Institution to His Majesty, except upon the condition of its affording a practical security upon this subject.

We feel that the Proprietors and Managers have an unquestionable right to maintain their present rules, if they are satisfied to continue dependent exclusively on their own resources ; but when they apply for the assistance of Parliament, it seems to us to follow, that they must be prepared to reconsider any circumstance connected with their Institution, which may prevent its being deemed a proper object for the public aid. The Professorships to which it appears to us, in a more peculiar and necessary manner, that the security should apply, are those which are connected, more or less, with the study of theology, namely, the Professorships of Hebrew, of Greek, and of Moral Philosophy. But we beg leave to add, that, for the same reasons which influence us in this recommendation, and only differing in degree, it would in our view be still more satisfactory, that the security should be extended to all the Professorships in the Institution.

The two Masterships of the boarding schools, which stand in no need of public assistance, may by some be thought to be thereby exempted from any consideration on the present occasion. But in looking to the adoption of regulations for the Institution generally, we cannot exclude the schools from our view, as they appear to us to form the basis on which the future instruction of the pupils is to be raised.

It is evident also, that the Schools must participate in any advantage which may accrue to the Institution at large, and would be necessarily, though less directly, benefited by any support or encouragement which should be granted to the Collegiate department. We cannot therefore propose to exclude the two Masterships of the Boarding Schools from the application of any safeguard which may be deemed advisable with respect to Professorships.

We observe that the Synod of Ulster at their last meeting in 1826, after a debate of two days, came to a Resolution by which they in substance recede from those views on the subject of a permanent security, which they had strongly advanced in their meetings of the years 1824 and 1825, and now deem it expedient, under all the circumstances of the case, to rest satisfied with a Resolution of the Court of Proprietors, which the Synod in 1825 had declared insufficient for the attainment of their object.

If no other principle of decision were to be adopted, than that of satisfying the requisitions of the Synod, the question might thus be set at rest. But we are deeply impressed with the conviction, that an important responsibility is now imposed upon the Legislature, of guarding the fundamental truths of Christianity from being invaded, through means and resources which the State is called on to supply.

It

185

It now remains to consider what mode of security should be adopted. The subscription of a test appears to us open to the various objections stated in the Evidence, nor do we think it desirable that the task of ascertaining the religious opinions either of the candidates, or of the elected, should be thrown upon His Majesty's Government. With respect to the measure originally suggested by the Synod of Ulster, we apprehend that some practical inconvenience might be found to attend the calling together the representatives of the several Presbyteries as therein proposed. Nor do we see any safeguard in the mere expression of the opinion of the Synod, while the Electors should continue at full liberty to disregard it.

We conceive that it would be a more satisfactory arrangement, that on every future Election, each Candidate should be obliged to procure a certificate from at least four of the persons, who during the six preceding years, had held the situation of Moderator, either in the Synod of Ulster or the Seceding Synod, stating, "that after having made due inquiry and examination, they have no reasonable doubt that the Candidate believes in the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ."

There would generally be not fewer than twelve persons to whom application might be thus made; individuals who had been selected by their respective Synods for their peculiar respectability, and to whose judgment such a consideration might with the greatest propriety be entrusted. We think it therefore not unreasonable to expect, that the Candidate should be a person able to obtain this certificate from at least four out of that number.

Whatever course is to be adopted, it seems to us indispensable, that a bye-law should be passed for carrying it into effect, and that nothing should be left undefined or discretionary on a subject of this nature.

We have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most faithful and obedient Servants,

(signed) J. LESLIE FOSTER.
J. GLASSFORD.

LIST OF APPENDIX.

BELFAST ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION.

Appendix.

Nº 1.—THE ACT of Incorporation and Bye-Laws	- - - - -	p. 32
Nº 2.—A List of Officers of the Belfast Academical Institution, October 1825	- - - - -	p. 37
Nº 3.—EXAMINATION of Mr. James Thomson, 11th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 38
Nº 4.—Examination of the Rev. Henry Montgomery, 11th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 43
Nº 5.—Examination of Mr. Thomas Spence, 11th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 52
Nº 6.—Examination of the Rev. William Cairns, 11th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 53
Nº 7.—Examination of the Rev. Dr. Samuel Hanna, 11th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 59
Nº 8.—Further Examination of Dº, 12th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 66
Nº 9.—Examination of the Rev. William Bruce, 12th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 74
Nº 10.—Examination of the Rev. Thomas Dix Hincks, 12th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 82
Nº 11.—Examination of the Rev. W. D. H. McEwen, 13th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 88
Nº 12.—Examination of Mr. John Stevelly, 13th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 98
Nº 13.—Examination of Dr. James Lawson Drummond, 13th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 101
Nº 14.—Examination of Dr. John Young, 14th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 103
Nº 15.—Examination of Dr. Samuel Edgar, 15th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 107
Nº 16.—Examination of Dr. Samuel S. Thomson, 13th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 117
Nº 17.—Examination of Mr. John Barnett, 13th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 119
Nº 18.—Further Examination of Dº, 3d July 1826	- - - - -	p. 124
Nº 19.—Examination of the Rev. James Carlile, 14th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 126
Nº 20.—Examination of Joseph Stevenson, Esq. 14th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 133
Nº 21.—Examination of the Rev. William Porter, 17th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 136
Nº 22.—Examination of the Rev. Thomas Heron, 17th November 1825	- - - - -	p. 140
Nº 23.—Extracts from the Examinations of the Rev. Henry Cooke, 5th and 6th January 1825	- - - - -	p. 146
Nº 24.—Further Examination of Dº, 24th November 1825	- - - - -	p. 150
Nº 25.—Further Examination of Dº, 6th December 1825	- - - - -	p. 164
Nº 26.—Examination of the Marquess of Donegall, 17th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 170
Nº 27.—Examination of the Marquess of Downshire, 12th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 171
Nº 28.—Examination of the Lord Bishop of Down and Connor, 14th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 175
Nº 29.—Examination of Dr. Crolly, Roman Catholic Bishop of Down and Connor, 15th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 180
Nº 30.—Examination of Sir Arthur Chichester, Bart. 14th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 183
Nº 31.—Examination of Sir Robert Bateson, Bart. 14th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 184
Nº 32.—Examination of Sir Stephen May, Bart. 17th October 1825	- - - - -	ibid.
Nº 33.—Examination of Cunningham Greg, Esq. 13th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 185
Nº 34.—Examination of Charles Brownlow, Esq. 14th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 188
Nº 35.—Examination of John Agnew, Esq. 14th October 1825	- - - - -	p. 190

187

Appendix.

- N° 36.—RESOLUTIONS for the Appointment of a Board of Faculty in the Belfast Academical Institution ; also, for the appointment of a Board of Masters - p. 190
- N° 37.—State of the School Department in the Belfast Academical Institution, October 1825 - - - - - p. 192
- N° 38.—Extracts from a work entitled “ The Constitution and Discipline of the Presbyterian Church, published by authority of the General Synod of Ulster,” p. 193
- N° 39.—Extracts from the “ Minutes of a General Synod held at Ballymena, 1826” - p. 195
- N° 40.—Account of Expenses of Buildings, &c. at the Belfast Academical Institution p. 199
- N° 41.—Treasurer’s Account of Receipts and Disbursements, to the 1st July 1825 - p. 200
- N° 42.—Analysis of the Expenditure of the Belfast Academical Institution, for the Year ended 1st July 1825 - - - - - p. 202
- N° 43.—Treasurer’s Account of Receipts and Disbursements, to the 10th of October 1825 - - - - - ibid.

APPENDIX.

BELFAST ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION.

Appendix, No. 1.

THE ACT OF INCORPORATION AND BYE-LAWS OF THE BELFAST ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION; 1810.

AN ACT to incorporate and regulate an Institution, to be called THE BELFAST ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION, for affording to Youth a Classical and Mercantile Education.

Preamble.

WHEREAS very considerable sums of money* have been subscribed by various inhabitants of the town of Belfast, in the county of Antrim, in that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, called Ireland, and by other persons in different parts of the kingdom, for the purpose of establishing and maintaining an Academical Institution, in the said town of Belfast, for affording to youth a classical and mercantile education, and for teaching mathematics, natural philosophy, logic, metaphysics, belles lettres, moral philosophy, chemistry, botany, agriculture, and other branches of science†.

And whereas the purposes of the said Institution would be materially promoted if the subscribers thereto were incorporated and enabled to have and use a common seal and name by which they may be known and distinguished, sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, and also authorized to purchase, take and enjoy messuages, lands or tenements, for the purposes of the said Institution.

May it therefore please Your Majesty,

Section 1. Proprietors incorporated.

That it may be enacted, and be it enacted, by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that his Grace the Lord Primate of all Ireland, the most noble George Augustus Marquis of Donegall, the most noble Arthur Blundell Sandys Trumbull Marquis of Downshire, the right reverend the Lord Bishop of Down and Connor, the right reverend the Lord Bishop of Dromore, the right honourable Lord Arthur Hill, the right honourable Lord Marcus Hill, the honourable John O'Neill, the honourable Edward Ward, William Brownlow, Edward May, Francis Whittle, Gilbert M'Ilveen, John Johnstone, James Douglas, Cunningham Greg, the reverend Edward May, William M'Cance, William Stevenson, Joseph Stevenson, William Tennent, Alexander M'Kay, John Alexander, Thomas Andrews, James Bailie, Nathaniel Callwell, Robert Callwell, Arthur Chichester, William Clarke, Victor Coates, John Cunningham, Benjamin Edwards, Hugh Edwards, Robert Getty, John Getty, Samuel Gibson, John Gregg, William Gregg, Hill Hamilton, the reverend Henry Henry, Henry Augustus Seymour Harvey, Samuel Hewitt, William Hunter, Adam Hunter, William Johnston, George Knox, George Langtry, Thomas Lewis, William Magee, John Martin, John M'Cammon, John M'Cance, Francis M'Cracken, Walter Roberts, John Russel, Alexander Scott, John Stewart, John M'Cance Stoupe, Robert Tennent, John Thompson, Robert Thompson, Samuel Thompson, William Thompson, Thomas Verner, Hugh Wilson, and Hugh Bell, who have severally subscribed any sum or sums of money for the purposes of the said Institution, together with all such other persons as shall have at the time of passing this Act, subscribed to the purposes of the said Institution, and paid to the Treasurer the sum so subscribed, and all such other persons as shall at any time hereafter respectively subscribe and pay the sum of twenty-two pounds fifteen shillings or upwards, for the aforesaid purposes, shall be and they are hereby made one distinct and separate body politic and corporate in deed and name, for the establishing and maintaining an Academical Institution, in the said town of Belfast, and shall have perpetual succession, and be called and distinguished by the name of "The Belfast Academical Institution," and that the said Proprietors shall be enabled to implead and sue, and to be impleaded and sued by that name, in any of his Majesty's

* The sum subscribed amounts to £.16,056. 5. 6. of which £.12,375. 0. 3½. has been collected.

† According to the prospectus published previously to opening the subscription lists, it is proposed to found two schools, one for a classical, and the other for a mercantile education; and also to the following professorships; natural philosophy, chemistry, logic and belles lettres, moral philosophy, mathematics, botany and agriculture, and to increase the number if the funds will permit.

Majesty's courts of justice, and shall and may appoint a common seal and seals for the use of the said Corporation, and that the said Corporation shall have full power and authority to receive subscriptions and donations* to enable them to establish and maintain the said Academical Institution.

And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the Proprietors for the time being, or any twenty-one or more of them, to make bye-laws, rules, regulations and statutes, for the government of the said Academical Institution, and for the education and government of all such persons to be educated therein, and for the election and elections of a President, Vice-President, Managers, Visitors, Treasurer, Secretary, and Auditors of the aforesaid Academical Institution, as to the said Proprietors or the major part of them convened at any general meeting shall seem meet, provided the same be not contrary to the laws of that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, or to the provisions of this Act: nevertheless, the most noble Marquis of Donegall shall be the first President; the most noble Marquis of Downshire, the honourable Edward Ward, the honourable John O'Neill, and the reverend Edward May, the first Vice Presidents; Robert Calwell, the first Treasurer; Joseph Stevenson, the first Secretary; Edward May, William Tennent, Edward Jones Agnew, Hugh Kennedy, James Douglas, John M'Cannon, Robert Getty, James M'Cleery, Robert Bradshaw, John Gregg, William Magee, John Cranston, Samuel Gibson, Robert Tennent, John Stoupe, William Simms, James M'Adam, Andrew M'Clean, James Bailie and William Clarke, the first Managers; Henry Augustus Seymour Harvey, Andrew O'Beirne, William Drennan, doctor of medicine, Samuel Stephenson, doctor of medicine, the reverend William Holmes, John Templeton, the reverend Henry Henry, and the reverend Edward Groves, the first Visitors; John M'Cracken, Robert Simms, and Robert Knox, the first Auditors; and that the said first President, Vice Presidents, Treasurer, Secretary, Managers, Visitors, and Auditors, and all subsequent Presidents, Vice Presidents, Treasurers, Secretaries, Managers, Visitors, and Auditors, shall continue in their respective offices for such time as shall be fixed at the first meeting of the Proprietors as hereinafter mentioned,† and in case of death or removal, to be supplied as hereinafter prescribed.

Sec. II.
Proprietors may make Bye-Laws.

And be it further enacted, That the said Proprietors shall and may assemble within three months after the passing of this Act, at or in the Exchange within the town of Belfast, at such time as shall be by the President, and any five or more of the said Proprietors, be appointed, by writing under their hands, notice of such time of assembling having been previously advertised in the newspapers, or in one of the newspapers published in the said town of Belfast, seven days before the appointed day for the said Proprietors so assembling, and shall make such rules and regulations for their assembling in future as to them shall seem expedient, and that the Acts of the Proprietors so assembling at their said first meeting, or the major part of them, and of the Proprietors to be duly assembled at any future meeting, or the major part of them, shall be binding on and deemed the acts of the said Corporation, provided that at any such meeting twenty-one‡ or more of the said Proprietors be present.

Sec. III.
Meetings of the Proprietors.

And be it further enacted, That the election and elections of the future President, Vice Presidents, Treasurer, Secretary, Managers, Visitors and Auditors, shall be made according to the manner and form which shall be appointed by the said Proprietors, under the power herein before given to the said Proprietors to make rules and regulations respecting such elections: and that the President, Vice Presidents, Treasurer, Secretary, Managers, Visitors and Auditors, shall not continue in office for a longer time than the said Proprietors shall, by any bye-law made for that purpose determine; and that the number of Vice Presidents, Managers, Visitors and Auditors so to be elected, shall not exceed the following numbers, videlicet, four Vice-Presidents, twenty Managers, eight Visitors, and three Auditors.

Sec. IV.
Election of the President and other Officers.

And be it further enacted, That if any President, Vice President, Treasurer, Secretary, Manager, Visitor or Auditor, during the time of his being in office, shall be desirous of being discharged of or from the same, he may send his resignation thereof in writing, addressed to the said Corporation by its corporate name, to be delivered at the place at which the Managers shall most usually meet upon the affairs of the said Corporation; and thereupon his office shall become vacant.

Sec. v.
President and other
Officers may resign.

And be it further enacted, That if, in consequence of absence, impropriety of conduct, or any other circumstance, any general meeting of Proprietors to be held conformable to the regulations hereinbefore contained, shall come to a resolution that any President, Vice President, Treasurer, Secretary, Manager, Visitor or Auditor, should cease to hold or be removed from office, the place he may then hold therein shall thereupon become vacant.

Sec. VI.
President and other Officers may be displaced.

And be it further enacted, That all vacancies, from whatever cause occasioned, shall be filled up according to the manner and form to be appointed by the Proprietors, under the power herein before given to make Rules and Regulations respecting elections of officers.

Sec. VII.
For filling up Vacancies.

And

* The Institution has already received several valuable donations of natural curiosities for the museum, and of books for the library; and a place has been procured for lodging such as are presented, until the buildings intended for the library and museum shall have been erected.

† The above mentioned officers were, at a general meeting held under this Act, on the 3d day of July 1810, continued in their several offices until an adjourned meeting, held on the 6th day of November 1810, when a new election took place agreeably to the bye-laws agreed upon under the same Act, by a general meeting held on the 4th of September 1810, and ratified by the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council.

‡ The number originally fixed upon was forty, but has been reduced to that here named, as it was frequently found difficult to assemble so large a number.

Sec. VIII.
Powers of President, &c.

And be it further enacted, That the President, Vice Presidents, Managers, Visitors and Auditors, shall have and may exercise such power, authority and jurisdiction, as shall be given to them by such bye-laws, rules, regulations and statutes, as shall be hereafter made by the said Proprietors, according to the power herein before given to the said Proprietors, of making bye-laws, rules, regulations and statutes, for the government of the said Academical Institution; and the said President, Vice Presidents, Managers, Visitors and Auditors, shall not have nor exercise any other power, authority and jurisdiction, than such as shall be so given to them; and that the duties of the Treasurer, Secretary and Auditors, shall be such as the said Proprietors, by any bye-law by them made, shall prescribe; and that the said Proprietors shall have full power to prescribe the manner and form according to which bye-laws, rules, regulations and statutes are to be enacted, altered or repealed.

Sec. IX.
Qualification of President, &c.

And be it further enacted, That the President, Vice Presidents, Managers, the aforesaid eight Visitors, the Treasurer, Secretary and Auditors, shall be elected from and be elected by the aforesaid corporate body; but that no member of the said corporate body, unless a member who shall have subscribed and paid the sum of fifty guineas or upwards, shall be eligible to the offices of President and Vice President; and no member of the said corporate body shall be eligible to the office of Manager, unless such member shall have subscribed and paid the sum of twenty guineas or upwards; and that every member of the said corporate body shall have free admission to the Library and Museum of the said Academical Institution, subject to such regulations at the Managers may ordain.

Sec. X.
Visitors.

And be it further enacted, That in addition to the aforesaid eight elective Visitors, the Primate of all Ireland for the time being, the Marquis of Donegall, and the Marquises of Donegall in succession, the Bishop of Dromore and his successors, and the Bishop of Down and Connor and his successors, the Provost of the College of the Holy and Undivided Trinity, near Dublin, the Moderator of the General Assembly of the Synod of Ulster, the Representatives in Parliament of the town of Belfast, the Representatives in Parliament for the counties of Down and Antrim, and the Sovereign of the said town of Belfast, all for the time being, shall be Visitors of the said Academical Institution, with the same powers, authority and jurisdiction, that shall or may hereafter be given to the eight Visitors so to be elected as aforesaid.

Sec. XI.
Subscribers of a certain Sum to have one Boy educated.

And be it further enacted, That for the encouragement of genius in the lower ranks of the people, every member of the said corporate body who shall have subscribed and paid into the hands of the Treasurer the sum of one hundred guineas or upwards, shall have the privilege of appointing one boy to be educated as a day-scholar, or extra student in the said Academical Institution, free of all expence.

Sec. XII.
Subscribers may transfer their Rights during life.

And be it further enacted, That every member of the said corporate body shall have the power during his life, of transferring all the rights and privileges which he may hold and enjoy as a member of the said body corporate, to any person by a notification in writing under his hand to the Managers of the said Academical Institution, to be laid before the said Managers at any meeting of them duly assembled, containing the name, place of residence and situation in life of the person to whom such transfer is intended to be made, for their approbation; and should the Managers disapprove of the person so notified, then the member may proceed to nominate in the manner aforesaid, until some person so notified shall be approved of by the Managers; and on the person so notified being approved of by the Managers, they shall order the name of the person so notified and approved of to be entered together with a memorandum of such transfer by the Secretary, in a book to be kept for that purpose, to be called "The Book of Transfers;" and on such entry being so made, the person so nominated shall be a member of the said corporate body, and shall use, exercise and enjoy all the rights and privileges of a member of the said corporate body, in the place of the person so making such transfer.

Sec. XIII.
Bye-Laws not to be contrary to the Act.

And be it further enacted, That if any bye-law, rule, regulation or statute to be made by the said Proprietors, under the power hereinbefore given to them of making the same, shall contain any thing contrary to the several matters and things by this Act enacted, then such bye-law, rule, regulation and statute, shall be null and void.

Sec. XIV.
Bye-Laws to be approved by Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council of Ireland.

And be it enacted, That no order, rule, regulation or bye-law which shall be hereafter made by the Proprietors, according to the provisions for making the same, hereinbefore mentioned, shall be good, valid or effectual, nor shall any rule, regulation or bye-law be amended, altered or repealed, unless such order, rule, regulation or bye-law, or any amendment, alteration or repeal of such order, rule, regulation or bye-law, shall have been submitted to and allowed and approved of by the Lord Lieutenant or Chief Governor or Governors and Privy Council of Ireland for the time being, who are hereby empowered and required, on request from time to time made by or on behalf of any eight of the Managers for the time being, to peruse and examine all such orders, rules, regulations or bye-laws, as shall from time to time be made, amended, altered or repealed by the Proprietors, in pursuance of this Act, and laid before them the said Lord Lieutenant, or Chief Governor or Governors, and Privy Council of Ireland, for the time being, and to allow and approve of, or to disallow or disapprove of the same or any part thereof, or to allow and approve of, or to disallow and disapprove of the whole or any part thereof, as to them shall from time to time seem proper and expedient; and for doing thereof, no fee or reward shall be paid or taken: provided always, That if within thirty days after such said request in writing, together with the draft of such order or orders, rule or rules, regulation or regulations, bye-law or bye-laws, or any amendment, alteration or repeal of the same, shall have been lodged with the Clerk of the Privy Council of Ireland, and with the Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant or Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland for the time being, the same shall not be returned returned to the Secretary of the said Academical Institution with the disapprobation of such order, rule, regulation or bye-law, or any amendment, alteration or repeal of any such order, regulation, rule or bye-law, that then the same so made by the Proprietors, according to the provisions hereinbefore set forth, shall be good and valid to all intents and purposes, provided it contains nothing contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm; any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall be able and capable in law to purchase, take and enjoy messuages, lands or tenements, not exceeding the value of two thousand five hundred pounds per annum, and by indenture, under their common seal, to demise or lease the messuages, lands or tenements, vested or to be vested in them in pursuance of this Act, or any part or parcel thereof, for any number of years, not exceeding the term of thirty-one years, so as upon every such demise or lease there be reserved and made payable half-yearly to the said Proprietors and their successors during the said term, as much rent as at the time of making such lease or demise can be really had for the same from a solvent tenant, and so as no fine, income or other reservation, be taken for the same, than such rents reserved to the said trustees and their successors, and so as every such lease or demise be made in possession and not in reversion.

And be it further enacted, That in all actions to be sued or commenced against the said corporation, upon any deed, contract or engagement, under the common seal of the said corporation, it shall and may be lawful for the said corporation in such action to plead generally, that they owe nothing to the plaintiff or plaintiffs in such action, and that in all actions of covenant which shall be sued or commenced against the said corporation, it shall and may be lawful for the said corporation in such action to plead generally, that they have not broken the covenants in such deed, contract or engagement contained, or any of them, and if thereupon issue shall be joined, it shall and may be lawful for the jury, if they see cause upon the trial of such issue, to find a verdict for the plaintiff or plaintiffs in such action, and to give so much or such part only of the sum demanded, if it be an action of debt, or so much in damage if it be an action of covenant, as it shall appear to them upon the evidence given upon such trial, such plaintiff or plaintiffs ought in justice to have, or is or are entitled to, any law or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, That this Act shall be deemed and taken to be a public Act, and all judges, justices and others, are hereby required to take notice thereof as such, without the same being specially pleaded.

Sec. xv.
Proprietors may purchase Lands.

Sec. xvi.
Corporation may plead generally.

Sec. xvii.
Public Act.

BYE-LAWS FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF THE BELFAST ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION; 1810.

THE affairs of the Institution shall be conducted by a board, to be denominated the "Board of Managers," which board shall consist of a President, four Vice Presidents, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and twenty Managers.

The President shall be elected for one year, or any longer time, by a general board of Proprietors.

The Vice Presidents and the Managers shall be elected by the same board, to continue in office, after the first election, during four years; the first election to be as follows:—

The Vice President and five Managers having the greatest number of votes to continue in office four years; the Vice President and five Managers having the next greatest number of votes, to continue in office three years; the Vice President and five Managers, having the third greatest number, to continue in office two years; and the Vice President and five Managers having the least number of votes, to vacate their seats at the expiration of one year; afterwards, one fourth of the Vice Presidents and Managers shall vacate their seats annually, according to seniority of election, and be ineligible to the same for one year; but may be elected to other offices of the Institution. The Secretary and Treasurer shall be annually elected.

There shall also be appointed eight Visitors and three Auditors; the Visitors subject to the same rules of election, vacating their offices, and re-election as the Managers. The Auditors to be annually chosen.

In any election, should two or more candidates have an equal number of votes, those whose names are entered first on the balloting list, shall be considered as having the greatest number of votes, and be elected accordingly.

A General Meeting of Proprietors shall be held annually on the first Tuesday in July, for the purpose of electing the Officers of the Institution, filling up the vacancies occasioned by the preceding second and third sections, receiving the report of the Managers, and transacting such other business as may be then laid before them.

All business brought forward at any general meeting of Proprietors shall be decided by a majority present, and no bye-law, alteration or repeal of a bye-law, shall pass or take effect at such meeting, unless at least thirty days notice thereof in writing shall have been given to the Secretary, by fifteen Proprietors or upwards, which notice the Secretary shall publish in the Belfast newspapers; nor shall any bye-law, alteration or repeal, be proposed to the meeting by the Board of Managers, until it shall have been approved of by two-thirds of the Members present at a meeting of their Board, summoned for that special purpose, and notice thereof given to the Secretary, and published by him as above.

The Secretary shall call a special board of Proprietors, on requisition being at any time made to him by fifteen or more Proprietors.

Sec. iii.

Sec. iv.

Sec. v.

Sec. vi.

Sec. vii.

Election

- Sec. VIII. Election to all offices in the Institution, and the adoption of all bye-laws and general regulations, shall be by ballot; the manner and form of which shall be settled by the board of Managers.
- Sec. IX. On election to an office in the Institution, the duties of it shall be made known to the person elected by the Secretary; and if he decline to act, the next on the list shall be appointed in his place, and so on until the office shall have been filled.
- Sec. X. It shall be the duty of the board of Managers to superintend the political economy of the Institution, under which are comprehended the finances and buildings, with all arrangements relating thereto; to engage suitable persons as Masters, Professors, Librarian and Assistants, and to remove them when they see cause; to make rules for admission to the lectures, library and museum, and for preserving order there, and generally throughout the Institution.
- Sec. XI. They shall have power to admit to the library, museum and lectures, strangers who may be distinguished by their rank or literary acquirements.
- Sec. XII. They shall cause fair and accurate accounts to be kept of all receipts, payments and other business transacted by them, their officers and agents respectively, and annually make up the same to the first of July in every year, and lay them with the vouchers before the Auditors, in time to prepare them for being laid before the General Meeting.
- Sec. XIII. They shall also prepare a detailed Report of the actual state of the Institution, in order to be submitted to the Proprietors at their annual meeting in July.
- Sec. XIV. The Managers shall meet at their room in the Institution on the first Tuesday in every month; and no meeting shall be competent to transact business, unless five members be present.
- Sec. XV. The President, or two Vice Presidents, or any three of the Managers, may, by a requisition in writing to the Secretary, call a special meeting of Managers.
- Sec. XVI. The President shall preside at all meetings of the Managers, and in case of his absence, a Vice President, according to seniority; and should neither be present, one of the Managers shall be called to the chair.
- Sec. XVII. In every thing relating to the Institution, and not especially provided for by the bye-laws, the board of Managers shall have a discretionary power to act as they shall judge most for its interests, still subject, nevertheless, to the control and direction of the general meeting of the Proprietors.
- Sec. XVIII. The board of Managers shall at their discretion have all monies belonging to the Institution laid out in the purchase of lands and tenements, or placed at interest on security approved of by them.
- Sec. XIX. They shall also have authority to grant leases, agreeably to the Act of Incorporation, of any lands or tenements belonging to the Institution.
- Sec. XX. The Treasurer shall cause all receipts and payments on account of the Institution, to be entered in a book kept under his direction, which book shall be laid on the Managers table, at their monthly meetings; he shall order payment of such drafts and bills as the Managers shall direct, and have his accounts made up to the first of July in every year, and laid before the Managers, in order that they may be prepared for the inspection of the Auditors.
- Sec. XXI. The Secretary shall attend all the meetings of the Proprietors and Managers, and by himself or Assistant, take minutes of the proceedings; he shall also take care that due notice of the different meetings be given to the Proprietors and Managers.
- Sec. XXII. The Auditors shall examine the accounts of the Institution, made up to the first of July in every year, and report thereon to the next annual meeting; to which they shall also deliver a general statement of the accounts, signed by at least two of them.
- Sec. XXIII. The Visitors shall have authority to inspect at all times every department of the Institution; they shall assist and vote with the Managers in the appointment of Masters and Professors, point out to them for purchase such apparatus, books, &c. as may be wanted for the literary and scientific part of the Institution, and furnish them with lists and estimates of their probable expense; they shall report to the Managers on the best means of promoting the objects of the Institution, by detailing the plans necessary to be pursued, and the abuses which ought to be corrected; appoint and attend examinations for discovering the proficiency of the pupils, and vigilantly observe the whole internal discipline, especially as to its influence on the manners and morals of the students.
- Sec. XXIV. The Visitors shall meet at least once every month, and no meeting shall be competent to transact business unless three or more members be present. They shall report annually on those matters relating to the Institution which are comprehended in their department, either to the board of Managers, or to a general court of Proprietors, as they think best.
- Sec. XXV. Any three Visitors may convene a special meeting of Proprietors on giving eight days notice thereof in writing to the Managers; they may elect a Secretary from among themselves, and make such regulations respecting the mode of transacting their business as shall seem best.
- Sec. XXVI. The board of Managers and board of Visitors when summoned for that especial purpose, shall form a joint board, with authority to make rules for the establishment and regulation of the college and schools: these rules shall prescribe the number of Professorships convenient or necessary at particular periods; the departments of science which shall be taught, or in which lectures shall be delivered; the number of schools, and the mode of conducting them; the authority which shall be exercised by the Professors and Masters, in order to insure the attention, and expedite the progress of the pupils; the manner in which students shall receive testimonials of proficiency in their several studies, so as to secure the public confidence; and finally, the regulations best adapted for a seminary whose object is to infuse the the best moral habits, together with a love for literary acquirements. These rules shall be of force in the Institution after having received the concurrence of a general board of Proprietors.

193

Any three members of the boards of Managers and Visitors, may, by requisition in writing to the Secretary, call a joint board of Visitors and Managers for the above purpose.

On the death of a Proprietor his heir shall be entitled to all the privileges enjoyed by the deceased.

All vacancies occasioned by death, resignation or otherwise, and not already provided for, shall be filled up by a general court of Proprietors, which shall be convened by order of the board of Managers, as soon as may be after the occurrence of the vacancy or vacancies.

Sec. xxvi.

Sec. xxvii.

Sec. xxviii.

Appendix, No. 2.

A LIST of OFFICERS, &c. of the BELFAST ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION,
October 1825.

PRESIDENT:—Marquess of Donegall, appointed for life.

VICE-PRESIDENTS:

C. Greg, esq. vacates in July 1826.

Edward Jones Agnew, esq. vacates in July 1827.

Sir Arthur Chichester, bart. vacates in July 1828.

Charles Brownlow, esq. vacates in July 1829.

VISITORS appointed by Act of Parliament:

The Primate of all Ireland, for the time being.

Marquess of Donegall, and the Marquesses of Donegall in succession.

Bishop of Dromore, and his successors.

Bishop of Down and Connor, and his successors.

Provost of Trinity College, Moderator of the General Assembly of the Synod of Ulster, the Representative in Parliament for the town of Belfast, the Representatives in Parliament for the counties of Down and Antrim, and the Sovereign of the said town of Belfast; all for the time being.

MANAGERS:

Robert Tennent,
William Newsam,
John Murphy,
John M'Adam,
Francis M'Cracken,

} Vacate in July
1826.

Robert Gamble,
William Tennent,
Adam M'Clean,
John M'Cracken,
Thomas Ekenhead,

} Vacate in July
1827.

William Boyd,
Robert Getty,
Robert M'Dowell,
William Simms,
John Vance,

} Vacate in July
1828.

John Barnett,
Thomas How,
Samuel M'Clean,
William Sinclair,
John Dunville,

} Vacate in July
1829.

VISITORS appointed by the Proprietors:

H. A. S. Harvey,
S. S. Thomson, M. D.

} Vacate in July 1826.

Thomas Grimshaw,
Rev. Henry Henry,

} Vacate in July 1827.

C. B. Grimshaw,
Samuel Archer,

} Vacate in July 1828.

Rev. W. D. H. M'Ewen,
James M'Donnell, M. D.

} Vacate in July
1829.

Treasurer, Robert Callwell,
Secretary, Joseph Stevenson,

} Both appointed annually.

PROFESSORS:

John Stevelly, A. B.—Natural Philosophy.

James Thomson, A. M.—Mathematics.

John Young, LL. D.—Moral Philosophy.

Rev. Wm. Cairns, A. M.—Logic and Belles Lettres.

Rev. Wm. Bruce, A. B.—Latin, Greek.

Rev. Thomas Dix Hincks.—Hebrew.

James L. Drummond, M. D.—Anatomy and Physiology.

These Professors are appointed by the Institution, and exclusive of them, there are:—

The Rev. Dr. Hanna.—Divinity and Church History; appointed by the General Synod of Ulster.

The Rev. Dr. Edgar.—Divinity and Church History; appointed by the Presbyterian Synod of Ireland, distinguished by the name "Seceders."

And the Rev. W. D. H. M'Ewen, has an Elocution Class.

The Professors appointed by the Institution, and the two Professors of Divinity, form the Faculty, of which the Rev. Thomas Dix Hincks is President.

MASTERS:

English School:

Rev. Henry Montgomery, A.M.

 Assistants, {

 Pooley Shuldham Henry.

 Bartholomew T. Stannus.

 Rev. Campbell Blakely.

Writing School:

Mr. Thomas Spence.—Assistant, John Irwin.

Mathematical and Arithmetical School:

James Thomson, A.M.

 Assistants, {

 Thomas Houston.

 William Dowlin.

Classical School:

Rev. Thomas Dix Hincks.

 Assistants, {

 Wm. B. Kirkpatrick.

 John Hincks.

 Charles D. Hort.

 John Thom.

French and Italian School:

Mr. Adelbert D'Oisy.

Drawing and Spanish School:

Mr. Ferdinand Besaucele.

The Masters are formed into a Board, of which Mr. James Thomson, is President.

Appendix, No. 3.

Minutes of Evidence taken before the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the State of Education in Ireland, at the Royal Hotel, in Belfast.

Examination of Mr. James Thomson, M. A.; Tuesday, 11th October, 1825.

Examination of
Mr.

J. Thomson, M. A.
11 October 1825.

WHERE were you educated?—In the University of Glasgow.

You are, we believe, at once the Master of the Mathematical School, in the school department, and the Professor of Mathematics in the collegiate department, in the Belfast Institution?—I am.

Were you appointed to both situations at the same time?—No, the collegiate department was not opened so soon as the school department; I was one of the first masters appointed in the Institution; I was appointed to the situation of mathematical master and teacher of arithmetic and geography, and also any few pupils that learn book-keeping learn from me.

How long was it afterwards that you were appointed Professor of Mathematics?—The school department opened in February 1814, and the collegiate classes opened in November 1815.

Was it your expectation, upon being appointed master in the school department, that you would also at a subsequent period be appointed master of the collegiate department?—No, I cannot say it was, as I did not know the views of the managers.

At the period of the election of professor in the collegiate department, was there any competition with you?—No, there was not; I was not at first formally appointed professor, but merely took charge of a class and gave the necessary lectures, and it was afterwards that a formal appointment was made.

What was your original connection with Belfast, or had you any prior to your appointment?—No, I had not any; my native place is twelve or thirteen miles from Belfast.

Were you personally known to many of the electors?—I am sure not to one of them; there was only one person who knew any thing of me, and that was by means of his son, who was a fellow student in the college of Glasgow.

From whom did you procure testimonials?—Chiefly from the professors in Glasgow, and but a small number from persons in this country. I could have had a greater number from persons in Ireland had they seemed to be necessary; the principal testimonial of this kind was from the gentleman under whom I was educated in classics, that of Dr. Edgar.

At the time you were in the University of Glasgow for what line of life did you intend yourself?—To become a Presbyterian clergyman; and I accordingly went through the course of education prescribed by the general Synod of Ulster for that purpose.

You afterwards directed your attention to mathematical subjects more particularly?—Yes; I never took licence, but was upon the point of doing so when I was appointed to the Institution, and I did not proceed further; I preferred the situation in the Institution.

We will now separate the two inquiries as to the nature of your duties in the college and school departments, and talk first of the college department; state what emoluments you have, and whence they arise in that department?—I have no emoluments except the fees paid by the students themselves; I had a salary besides that out of the funds of the Institution of 50*l.* a year, but in consequence of the low state of the funds I voluntarily relinquished it, and have not for some time received any thing but the fees of the students.

Are we to understand that that reduction of the funds arises from the withdrawing of the Parliamentary grant?—It prevents the Institution having the means so well. I might have insisted upon the payment of the sum from the Directors of the Institution; I had the same claim that other gentlemen had, but in consequence of my being connected with the school department, the situation in which is more lucrative, and which enables me to live without the other, I relinquished it, though not finally.

Have you any doubt, if the Parliamentary grant were restored, that one of the first consequences would be the restoration of your salary?—I should hope so, and I do not know any reason why it should not.

Mention

195

Examination of
Mr.J. Thomson, M. A.
11 October 1825.

Mention the nature and extent of your emoluments in the collegiate department, independent of the salary?—It is two guineas a student for the winter session, from the beginning of November till the beginning of May.

About how many students, on the average of the last two years, have you had?—I should mention, that the student often attends a second session if he does not find himself thoroughly qualified; then he is charged only one-half, that is a guinea; then there are free students always in the mathematical class. The largest sum I have received from the students during any year was fifty-three guineas; I cannot say I am perfectly correct, but I think I am.

We should collect from that that the number of the students may vary from twenty to twenty-five?—It was considerably more during the last four or five years; it was considerably increased beyond the average of former years; the number has been upwards of thirty, from thirty to forty; but as some students pay only one guinea, and also in consequence of free students, the sum received is not so large as it would appear at first sight from the number of students. I might also state, that a considerable number, besides those thirty to forty, derive advantages from attending on the class; for as I am connected with the two departments, I find it answers my own views, and is also for the advantage of the scholars in the school department, that I admit some of them to be auditors or private pupils with the students, and I have thus sometimes had in attendance seventy or a little more in my junior class.

Will you describe the nature and extent of the course of lectures given in the collegiate department?—I have two classes, which are taught at distinct hours; the junior class is taught from eight to nine in the morning, and when the mornings become longer I occasionally meet the class earlier. In this class I commence usually with a small portion of arithmetic, perhaps spend eight or ten days in teaching vulgar and decimal fractions and the square root, before I commence the regular course of mathematics, to allow the students to collect properly, for several of them do not come in at the day appointed. After this I commence with Euclid's Elements and with algebra; I make Euclid's Elements generally the principal and most important part at the commencement of the session, but I also intermix with it something of algebra during the session; I carry the students through the principal parts of the first six books of Euclid; I cannot carry them through all of them in that time, but the greater part, and in algebra through the common and fundamental rules, with simple and quadratic equations; then, after they have learnt the portion of Euclid's Elements already mentioned, I instruct them in plane trigonometry, with a considerable number of its practical applications, in the measurement of heights and distances, and sometimes a little land-surveying and other things of a practical nature; I also give them some instruction in mensuration. This is the outline of what is done in the junior class, but as I have students who attend a second time, I vary the less important parts, directing their attention to some of the less important subjects in one year, and to others the next.

Describe the course taken by the senior class?—The senior class, which is much less numerous, commences with what I may call the more general elements of trigonometry, the arithmetic of sines as it is called by some writers; after that I direct their attention to spherical trigonometry, then to conic sections and the theory of curve lines in general, embracing something of the new branch of science generally called analytic geometry by the French writers, then the differential calculus and a small portion of the integral calculus.

About how many pupils may you have had in the last session that were competent to study the differential calculus?—I could give the number exactly if I had access to my list, but I think about twenty.

Do you think you shall have so large a number in the ensuing session?—I have no reason to think the number will be diminished.

For what lines of life do these persons intend themselves who are studying these branches?—The majority belong to some of the religious bodies who are connected with the Institution; they are students going on with their course preparatory to becoming ministers; but there are several schoolmasters and persons who study for their improvement, or from a natural wish to acquire knowledge of that description.

Does your course of lectures embrace any thing of astronomy, or the practical parts of what is called mathematical science, such as optics?—No, those belong to the department of the Professor of Natural Philosophy; I have sometimes in the summer, in the school, given courses of astronomy more peculiarly mathematical than the Professor of Natural Philosophy gives; he gives a course of instruction for those who are studying for clergymen, and his course embraces so many branches that the period allotted to instruction in astronomy is naturally limited. In my class for geography, also, which belongs chiefly to the school department, though the students do occasionally attend it, I give something of astronomy in a lighter and more popular way.

Does the senior class attend you every day in the week?—It meets five days in the week and each fourth Saturday, according to a particular arrangement with the other classes.

Is the portion of time occupied by each class in one day only one hour?—That is generally the time.

Does not it occur to you, that is a very short period of time to allot to it?—For mathematics I believe it is sufficient; it is the same length of time that is given in both Edinburgh and Glasgow, and I believe, indeed, in all the Scotch colleges. I should mention also, that my junior class meets on Saturday, so that in it I have six meetings in a week, while Edinburgh and Glasgow, and I believe all the Scotch colleges, have only five.

Examination of
Mr.
J. Thomson, M.A.
11 October 1825.

Is the nature of your lectures such that it requires a considerable portion of time for study at other parts of the day for those who attend?—It does; I illustrate each day generally, with chalk on a black board, the subject that the student has to study during the ensuing evening, and I examine him upon the same the next day; the students are also obliged to perform a considerable number of written exercises; I prescribe a subject, suppose to day, and one or two days after, according to its difficulty, I require the students to give me a written exercise upon the subject; the preparation of such exercises occupies a very considerable portion of time.

What is the time of the session?—From the beginning of November till the beginning of May.

From that time it is vacation till November again?—Yes, we follow the Scotch colleges in that respect.

The schools continue open all the year?—Yes, they do, with the exception of short vacations at Midsummer and Christmas.

Describe now the nature and extent of the instruction you give in the school department?—In the mathematical part of it, so far as I have described the junior college class, it is much the same; it embraces Euclid's Elements, algebra, and plane trigonometry. I have not generally pupils in the school that go much beyond this course, but occasionally I have.

Do you descend so low as to teach the first four rules of arithmetic?—Yes; pupils are commencing at all times of the year, learning arithmetic without any previous knowledge.

Is a portion of your time necessarily devoted to the duties of the school?—Yes, by far the greater portion of my time.

Have you two hours of lecturing superadded to the ordinary duties of the school during the session?—Yes, but in winter my daily attendance in school is not so great as in summer; besides this, a great deal of extra business arises from the college department.

What number of pupils attend each day in your school upon a fair average?—The number is considerably fluctuating; my number at present is 217; of these 22 are free scholars.

What amount of remuneration do you receive for that number?—I am to find assistants, whom I have to pay myself, and deducting this the school may yield about 400*l*.

It nets that, after paying the assistants?—Yes, but I really cannot say that is exactly the sum.

What are the rates of payment adopted in the school?—For mathematics a guinea a quarter; for arithmetic, half-a-guinea; geography, half-a-guinea; book-keeping, half-a-guinea; but the same pupil, if he attends more than two of these at a time, is only charged two.

What assistants do you employ, and what rates of remuneration do you pay them?—I have two assistants regularly, and in winter I have an additional assistant, not the entire day, but part of the day, in consequence of the attendance of the college students.

Have you apartments in the Institution?—No, I have not; there are only two of the teachers who have, who are at the head of the boarding department.

Do you receive at your own residence, any young men or boys as boarders, connected with the Institution?—Yes.

What number?—The most I have had is five; I could not receive more.

What rates of remuneration do you receive for them?—For a double purpose I made the rate considerably more than it is in the Institution, as I was not bound by any rules of the Institution; in the Institution the rate is thirty guineas, and I made it 50*l*. in the first place, that I might not appear to interfere with the regular boarding masters, and also because the terms would require to be higher, the number being smaller.

Does the 50*l*. include the fees for instruction?—Yes, for any thing they learn with myself, but not with the other masters, they have to pay them also.

It includes those fees you specified just now, as constituting a part of your own emoluments?—Yes, exactly.

Are the persons who are inmates in your own house boys in the school, or young men attending the college course?—They have been both; I am rather disposed to give this business up; I find it interferes with the arrangements of my family; I have now only one, and I would rather be rid of him, but he is the son of a friend; he is a school-boy, not a student; last winter I had two young men attending the college classes; the rest were scholars.

Describe the nature and extent of the instruction in geography you give?—A principal object is to make the students acquainted with the situations of the places on the maps and globes; and I also direct their attention to the manners and customs of the inhabitants, and other subjects usually taught in such classes; then, as they become more advanced, I give them instruction in the elementary parts of astronomy in a popular way; they are generally pupils who are not acquainted with mathematics, and they could not receive it in a mathematical way.

Do you teach them ancient geography?—No, that is taught by the classical master.

Do you oblige the boys to draw maps?—Yes.

To what degree of minuteness does the geographical instruction extend; do for instance, the boys you have instructed in geography know the chief towns of the German empire?—Yes, they are instructed to be able to tell that without a map; if you ask them where such a place is they are instructed to tell, and then to point it out.

Would they know the names and situations of twenty places in India?—Yes, those who have been some time in the class; I make them commence with the countries of Europe.

Would

197
Examination of
Mr.
J. Thomson, M. A.
11 October 1825.

Would they know the British dominions in India from those not under the British dominion; the case is only put for example?—Sometimes the maps, which the pupils have, do not show that correctly; but the more advanced pupils I instruct in it from other sources.

Are the maps provided by the Institution?—No, by individuals.

Would it not be an improvement for the Institution to provide them?—Yes; I have some maps suspended for their use, but they have small atlases of their own.

Would it not be an obvious improvement if the Institution supplied the maps?—Yes, it would.

Who provides the globes?—The Institution.

Are they good ones?—Yes, very good; they are 21 inch globes; but knowing the state of the funds I do not press for the maps.

What numbers attend the geography class?—I have more now than generally attend; the number is 49, it varies from 30 to that number.

Do you in either department enter upon the application of mathematics to navigation?—Yes.

How far do you go in that respect?—I have frequently young men who read a full course of navigation.

With yourself?—Yes.

Is that in the school department?—Yes, but the young men have an opportunity (without additional expence) of attending my own college classes, which I recommend to them if they have time, as it makes them acquainted with Euclid's Elements, and enables them better to understand the principles.

Do you teach the principles of plain sailing to any individuals, to their fullest extent?—Yes, some of the pupils read a full course of navigation in Mackay's, Moore's, or Notie's treatise.

How far do you go in instructing any individuals in the principles of surveying?—A good many individuals have read a course of surveying, such as is contained in Crocker's surveying or Gibson's surveying.

You actually go with such individuals yourself through a course of survey?—Yes; as I have not a regular class I cause them to read by themselves, and examine them upon what they have been reading, and direct them to apply to me for assistance where they feel a difficulty.

You are of course competent yourself to teach the theory and practice?—I understand the instruments; I have never acted as a surveyor; there may be several things in the practical detail which I may not understand when put in comparison with a regular practical surveyor; I teach them how to take angles and other measurements.

Do you teach the principles of mensuration?—Yes.

As applicable to the trades of masons and carpenters?—Yes.

Do you teach the principles of gauging?—Yes, in a few instances, but that is less called for than any other branch.

Is there any library which either the boys in the school department, or the collegiate class, have access to?—Yes, there is a general library belonging to the Institution at large; and besides that, there is a small library of select books belonging to the mathematical department; this was formed by subscription, chiefly of the students themselves, and some who wished to encourage it have given contributions; we have from 150 to 200 volumes in this collection.

Of the 217 boys, whether the number be more or less, will you state the proportion of boys belonging to the Established Church, and the Presbyterian Church, and the Roman Catholic Church?—I might be very far from stating this correctly, as we rather make a point, lest there should appear to be any distinctions, or anything unpleasant to the pupils, or their friends, not to know, unless casually, what the religious principles of the pupils may be; last year when we were obliged to give in returns, which were for this Board, we did take the religions of all our pupils, and that was the only time it was done; I should think of the Established Church and the Presbyterians the number may be nearly equal, but I am not sure; I might err considerably; the number of Roman Catholics is not so considerable as either; there are perhaps not so many Roman Catholics in Belfast and the immediate neighbourhood; and of the Roman Catholic population, there are a greater proportion of the working classes who cannot give their children so good an education, but we have some of every religious denomination in the country.

Do you know of any interference with the religion of any of the pupils under your immediate care?—I know of none, and am persuaded there never was any.

Do you know of any with the pupils of other masters and professors?—There has been a good deal said in public upon the subject; and I have taken some part in it in the newspapers; and I have always maintained, and always will, that there never was any such interference in the Institution in any department, always excepting the divinity classes, in which there are teachers whose business it is, but I am perfectly persuaded there has never been, directly or indirectly, any such thing in the others; there has been much said upon the subject, and a good deal that those who know the Institution best, and are connected with it, have thought has been very injurious to them in the estimation of the public; we think we have been hardly treated in the business; there has been rather a popular clamour raised against us.

Were the discussions to which you refer, as having taken some part in, of a public nature?—Yes, they were in the newspapers.

Examination of
Mr.
J. Thomson, M. A.
11 October 1825.

Are the professors of different religious communions?—They are; there is one professor, the professor of natural philosophy, a member of the Established Church; the other professors, I believe, are all Presbyterians of one denomination or another; some of them members of the General Synod of Ulster, which was originally in connection with the Church of Scotland; there are two who are members of the seceding body; and there are two who are connected with the Presbytery of Antrim, which was once in connection with the Synod of Ulster, but is not now.

Has it ever been understood in the Institution, so far as your knowledge goes, that the professors should be members of any particular church?—No, never. According to the principle upon which I understand the Institution was founded, and upon which I believe it was, (I was not here at the time it was first commenced), but I have always understood that before that time, and I am sure since that time, the idea was, that there should be no restriction respecting the religion of the professors or the scholars; that it should be of a general nature, to afford education generally; there is, however, to prevent any thing arising from this kind of situation of circumstances, a declaration, subscribed by all the professors on obtaining appointments, that they are not to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the exception already mentioned of the professors of divinity, with the religious principles of their students; and with that I believe they have most strictly complied.

Are you a member of the Synod of Ulster?—Yes.

And were on the point of being licensed when you were appointed to the situation you now hold in the Institution?—Yes.

Is there any circumstance, connected either with your own situation in the Institution, or the Institution itself generally, you would wish to have this opportunity of stating to the Commissioners, for their information?—I did not anticipate being allowed to state any thing of the kind, and at the moment I can scarcely recollect any thing; I am not aware that there is any thing; as I took some part in those discussions that have taken place, and that have been so unpleasant, if you should wish any explanation I should be very happy to give it; or if any thing should turn up in the course of the evidence laid before you, I should wish to be allowed an opportunity to give explanation.

What do you mean by saying you are a member of the Synod of Ulster?—Merely that I am in communion with Dr. Hanna's congregation in this town, which is one of the congregations belonging to the Synod of Ulster.

Where do your pupils in the lower class generally come from?—Many of them from different parts of the country, and some of them from a considerable distance.

Do they board in the town?—A considerable number of those who come from a distance board in the Institution, or with the masters; a considerable number board in town, either from having friends in town, or being able to board at less expense.

Are there any boarding-houses besides the masters houses, for the pupils?—No; I believe not regular boarding-houses; frequently I believe they take a lodging and board themselves, and sometimes they get part of what they require from home; those that are at a moderate distance.

LETTER from Professor Thomson to the Secretary of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry; dated Belfast Institution, October 17th, 1825.

Sir,

HAVING been asked at the close of my examination before the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, whether I had any suggestion to make respecting the Belfast Institution, I trust I shall be excused for offering in the present way a suggestion respecting a matter, which though not of primary importance, might still be of some utility.

My plan is, that in case of a Parliamentary grant being given to the Institution; a small sum might be ordered to be appropriated for endowing something resembling the scholarships in Dublin college, but with certain modifications. I have not fully considered the subject; but I am inclined to think, that an annual stipend of from 20*l.* to 40*l.* or 50*l.* each, might be given to three or four students who might excel at an examination in the college course, three or four years after their entrance; this might be continued three or four years, the student being required to reside in the Institution during the college session, and to give satisfaction at an annual examination on prescribed portions of the more advanced parts of literature and science; he might also be required to act as tutor two or three hours daily, under such regulations as the faculty might consider likely to be useful to himself and advantageous to the Institution. To induce the student to hold the situation during the whole term, the sum given the first year might be small, and there might be an annual increase. My reason for proposing such an arrangement is, that the Institution might have what it does not possess at present, a motive to excite students to higher degrees of exertion in the more advanced parts of education than our general course requires, or than would be well suited for the students at large.

I am also of opinion, that a small sum might be advantageously expended in giving, in the way of exhibitions, or bursaries as they are termed in Scotland, a few pounds annually for two or three years, to a small number of students, who at entrance would excel at an examination on the ordinary branches of school education, particularly the classics and the English language. This would be a motive to students to make themselves better scholars before entering, and would throw such credit on the teachers of the successful candidates, as would form a considerable stimulus to the masters of schools through the country.

It

199

Examination of
Mr.
J. Thomson, M. A.
11 October 1825.

It may be thought, that if money were given to the Institution, a part of it might be appropriated in the way I have suggested, without any recommendation from the Commissioners. If distinctly recommended by them, however, it would be carried into effect with more certainty, and would assume, even in the eyes of the students, a greater degree of importance.

I could offer various other remarks respecting the necessity of increasing the library and apparatus, the providing of rooms for their reception, of class-rooms and other apartments, with various other particulars; I shall not trouble the Commissioners, however, with any thing further on these points, as I have reason to think that most of them have already been mentioned by others.

By submitting these remarks to the Commissioners you will much oblige,

Your very obedient humble servant,

To R. Pauncefote, esq.
&c. &c.

James Thomson.

Appendix, No. 4.

Examination of The Rev. Henry Montgomery; Tuesday 11th October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
H. Montgomery,
11 October 1825.

IN what University did you receive your degree?—Glasgow.

Your appointment in the Belfast Institution relates only to the school department?—Entirely.

You are the master of the English school?—Yes.

At what time were you appointed to that situation?—I think it was in September 1817.

Are you a clergyman of the Presbyterian church?—Yes, I am.

Have you any congregation committed to your charge, or a cure of souls?—I had a congregation previously to my appointment, which I retain; I made it a sine quâ non, that I should retain it.

Where is that?—Within three miles and a half of the Institution, in the vicinity of Belfast; and a large body of my people reside between my meeting-house and the town.

Do you officiate upon Sundays in divine service?—Yes, very regularly.

Are you able to pay attention to the cure of souls, on the week days?—I received a recommendation from my congregation when the situation became vacant which I now hold in the Institution, and I was requested by an individual connected with the Institution to apply for it. It was not a thought of my own. I submitted the case to my own congregation; I called the heads of families together and stated the circumstances to them, and they were much pleased (the congregation not being large, although respectable) at any thing which would add to my comfort, and they gave an unanimous recommendation, stating, that they would make all the weekly duties as light as possible to me, and that they would endeavour as much as possible, to have the baptisms and other services reserved till the Lord's day; and they have very rigidly adhered to it. I am occasionally called from my home on the duties of my congregation, but never during school hours, except four days in the course of the year. We have two sacraments, as we term them, in the year; one held in May and the other in October. On these occasions I require to leave the Institution at half past ten the Wednesday preceding, to attend my first preparation and examine the young communicants; on the Saturday the same week I require to attend a similar preparation, and to have further intercourse with my young people. I accepted my present situation with this agreement with my congregation, and in my own mind, that if I found it interfere with my clerical duties, I would give up the situation in the Institution. So far from my congregation having decreased, it has increased considerably, and my school I believe, you will find has also been increasing.

With which of the Synods are you in communion?—The Synod of Ulster.

Will you describe the nature of the duties that attach to your situation as master of the English school?—The English school may be considered as consisting of two parts, the day school and the boarding school; with regard to the day school, I consider it my duty to teach in the morning from a quarter before eight or eight until nine, and to be in the school as much as a person in my situation can be, being occasionally required to see persons calling about boys from ten till three. As to the boarding school, I exercise a general and moral superintendence over the children.

How many boarders are there?—Forty-one boarders at present.

What number of day boys are there upon a general average?—I think about 150, at the present time.

How many boarders and how many day boys did you find at the commencement immediately subsequent to your appointment?—Six boarders in my department, and sixty-six day scholars.

Could you conveniently accommodate any greater number of boarders?—I do not know that I could with great convenience; if a few boys came for a certain time I could, but not very conveniently.

Could you receive more day boys conveniently?—Yes, I could, by taking an additional assistant; at one period I had rather more.

Is there any salary connected with your situation?—Not any.

Examination of
Rev.
H. Montgomery,
11 October 1825.

You have the use of apartments rent free in the Institution?—Yes.
And accommodation for those boys?—Yes.
Are your apartments furnished by the Institution?—They are not, except the bedsteads in the dormitory.

What is the rate charged for each boarder?—Thirty guineas per annum.

What is the charge for the day boys?—Two guineas a year.

Are the rates of payment fixed by the rules of the Institution?—Yes, they are; and I should state in the calculation of the day scholars, of those 150 in my department, nineteen or twenty do not pay. Some of them are free upon the foundation; and some of them are the sons of Presbyterian ministers. I have never charged Presbyterian ministers of any denomination, any thing for the tuition of their children.

Is that your own arrangement, or does the Institution require it?—It is my own arrangement, as to the sons of the ministers.

How many of the masters are at liberty to receive boarders upon the same principle that you do?—Only one, the classical head master, Mr. Hincks.

How many assistants do you employ in your schools?—I have three.

Will you describe the object, the nature and extent of the instruction given in the English school?—The first object is to instruct them in orthography; we connect with that as early as possible, instruction in reading; connected with that we have instruction in grammar, with an advance from that to some little knowledge of history; from that, as soon as they are able to write any thing like a tolerable fair hand, we give them some knowledge of composing letters. A great number of the boys write a letter once a week, and that is corrected by myself. For the more advanced boys, I lay down some general principles as to English composition, upon a very extensive scale, which I think has been of use in preparing them for business, and for the philosophical classes; connected with that is ancient and modern history, Grecian and Roman history, English history, and occasionally Irish history. Those are the principal subjects, and embracing prosody. They are taught recitation without any additional remuneration, at extra hours, and my senior composition class, is likewise taught at extra hours. The whole of my recitation is taught at extra hours. I think about seventy of my boys are attending recitation. In all these subjects, with the exception of composition, my assistants give me aid.

Will you mention all the books connected with the English and Irish history, read in the school?—We read Goldsmith's Abridgment generally, in one volume, as being more convenient for the junior boys; his Abridgment of the History of Greece; his Abridgment of the History of Rome, and his Abridgment of the History of England; subsequently occasionally, I have taught what is called Robinson's Ancient History, a book compiled by a Dr. Robinson, of the north of England. The History of Ireland which I teach, was published by Cumming, of Dublin, without the name of the author; I do not approve of it on account of the defectiveness of the arrangement, not from any thing objectionable in the matter.

Have you ever taught any other History of England, than Goldsmith's?—No.

Do the boys who board with you ever attend the other schools?—Yes, regularly. I believe, I have not more than one child boarding with me, who does not attend some of the other schools.

What other schools do they attend?—Almost uniformly writing and arithmetic; a considerable number of them attend the classical school, and the mathematical school likewise, a large proportion of them.

You have said most of the boarders do; do most of the day scholars?—Yes, a very considerable number. I only found fifteen boys in my school who were not attending some of the other schools in the Institution.

Is that left perfectly open; are the parents at liberty to choose as to the schools which they shall attend?—Perfectly so.

Do you find that the boys select such schools as are connected with their views as to their future pursuits in life?—I think in some instances they do not; there are many ignorant parents who are not the best judges of what would be suitable to their children; but generally speaking no doubt they do.

Of what religious persuasions are your boarders principally?—Pretty much as you would expect from the population of the north of Ireland; about two-thirds Presbyterians, and about one-third Protestants of the Established Church; occasionally a Catholic or two, and occasionally a Quaker.

[The witness delivered in the following Paper, which was read:]

November 1st 1817	-	Boarders	-	-	6}	-	-	157
Entered since	-	-	-	-	151}	-	-
Presbyterians	-	-	-	-	105}	-	-
Established Church	-	-	-	-	47}	-	-	157
Catholics	-	-	-	-	3}	-	-
Quakers	-	-	-	-	2}	-	-
Attended College Classes	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	28
D ^o - last Session	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	10
Present Boarders:—Presbyterians	-	-	-	-	28}	-	-
Established Church	-	-	-	-	12}	-	-	41
Catholics	-	-	-	-	1}	-	-

Day

201

Examination of Rev.H. Montgomery,
11 October 1825.

Day Scholars:

1821: January, till 10th October	-	56	:	-	-	subsequently	21	-	-	77
1822: D° - - - D° - - -	-	98	:	-	-	D° -	27	-	-	125
1823: D° - - - D° - - -	-	90	:	-	-	D° -	8	-	-	98
1824: D° - - - D° - - -	-	78	:	-	-	D° -	15	-	-	93
1825: D° - - - D° - - -	-	91	:	-	-	-	-	-	-	91.

Could you state the proportion of the day scholars?—No, I could not; for it frequently happens I do not know to what religious denomination they belong. As to the boarders, I do know, because they attend the particular place of worship their parents require.

Have you known of any interference with the peculiar religious tenets of the boys, whether in the day school or as boarders?—Not the most distant.

Do the boarders and the day boys meet in the same apartment?—Yes, they do.

You of course except those persons who are attending the divinity class?—Of course I except them.

Are any, or many of your boarders in the habit of attending the collegiate classes as well as the others?—During the last year ten were, and I know that some will this year. Three of my boarders are to enter Trinity College at the latter end of this week; those will not attend, though they would have done so if they had remained.

Is it your desire that your boarders should attend the collegiate classes?—Yes; I find it a great advantage.

Is it your impression that boys who have passed through the Belfast Institution distinguish themselves afterwards as much, upon a fair average, as other boys from other places?—I cannot answer that exactly, as our own pupils have been brought more under our view than those educated in other seminaries. I should say of six or eight young men from Belfast and the vicinity, that they have all in a considerable degree been distinguished, and some of them have uniformly obtained premiums in Trinity College; we flatter ourselves that they are more distinguished than others, but I could not pretend to judge.

You have stated there was no interference with the religion of the children; is there any religious instruction given to the children?—Not to those attending the day school.

Do they not read the Testament?—Not the day scholars. I had at one time spoken to the present very respectable Roman Catholic bishop of this diocese to get a Douay Testament, without note or comment, to which he assented; but upon conversing with several people who knew the irritated state of the public feeling about that time on religious subjects, they thought it better that we should not interfere in it in any way.

As to the Presbyterian boarders under your own care, do they receive any religious instruction?—All the boarders under my care receive this kind of religious instruction. You will perceive it is very difficult to steer clear of party and sect; I endeavour, therefore, to pursue a course which I hope cannot be objected to. I first require them to give proof of the attributes of the Deity; his power, wisdom, goodness and providence, &c. We proceed then to a short outline of the Old Testament history connected with the Jews. After learning the Ten Commandments, and giving them a cursory, but as satisfactory view of their meaning as I can, without offending the Catholics on the subject of the second commandment, I then proceed to the New Testament; I cause them to give a short account of the evidences of Christianity from prophecy, miracles, the purity of the gospel doctrines, the characters of the apostles, and the different circumstances in which they were placed. The junior boarders, and indeed all my boarders, except those who are pressed with business, every evening, in a school set apart for them, read at least two chapters of the New Testament under my own care, or that of my assistants. On sabbath evenings those instructions are conducted by myself, and they generally read seven or eight chapters. I have confined the reading to the New Testament, as there are many things in the Old Testament regarding the mosaical law and ceremonial institutions, that I object to putting into the hands of children.

Do you administer any instruction to the Presbyterian children that you do not teach to the children of the Established Church?—No; I teach no catechism to any Presbyterian child except one boy, whose parent desires it. I have not found Presbyterian parents generally desirous that they should be taught any catechism; many would rather that they should be left to form their opinions for themselves on reading the Scriptures; the one I teach to that boy is the Westminster Shorter Catechism.

Are there any children whose parents have desired you to teach them the catechism?—All those belonging to the Established Church are taught the church catechism.

By whom?—By one of my assistants; they are taught merely the words of the catechism, and go to church for instruction from the curate.

Is the assistant who teaches them a member of the Established Church?—No, he is not; he only takes care to confine them to the accurate learning of the words.

Are all your assistants Presbyterians?—Yes, it is almost impossible to obtain any others in this part of the country.

Are any of them clergymen?—There is one who is a probationer; he is prepared to receive a congregation at any time he may be invited; another will be in that situation in a month, and the other is some time advanced; one is a regular preacher, and the other two are far advanced.

They all look forward to it?—Yes.

What rates of remuneration do you allow to those assistants?—I give to the assistant who has eased me of the burthen of teaching recitation, 40*l.* a year, besides his board; he

Examination of
Rev.

H. Montgomery,
11 October 1825.

has also the advantage of teaching any schoolmaster who may apply to him in the evening. My second resident assistant has thirty guineas, with his board. Those two reside in my own house, with this understanding, that one is to go to bed with the pupils, and rise with them, so that the boys may not at any time be left by themselves; the other assistant receives 16*l.* a year for teaching two hours and three quarters in the day, during the time I have more children in the school.

Are the Roman Catholics taught any catechism?—No; the Roman Catholic boy has a Douay Testament, which he reads in the evening.

Is he sent to any place of worship?—He goes regularly to the Roman Catholic chapel, with a relation or friend who is in town.

You leave his religious education to that person, or the Roman Catholic clergyman?—Yes; his father is an acquaintance of the Roman Catholic bishop of this town, and therefore I consider him quite safe.

Is there any Roman Catholic catechism in the school?—None that I know of.

What are the modes of punishment in your school?—The most general and most efficient mode of punishment is confinement; every boy, unless he should happen to be generally a very good boy, who misses three words, is confined; each lesson said is noted down, and every word missed; and should any boy, in any one lesson, miss three words or more, he is considered liable to confinement, and to say that lesson after three o'clock, when the other boys have retired, and whatever length of time may be necessary, he is detained till he can say it. I have usually a considerable number detained after that time, and it has a good effect, as it informs the parent of the cause of their detention, and it induces the boys to learn their lessons in future, so that they may go home with the others, and either myself or one of my assistants (I cannot say always it is the case, because it would be very hard to confine us constantly for any particular hour, but one of us usually) stops with them. If the boy be generally good, we may be induced to look it over. We have occasionally corporal punishment with a small cane, by giving a pandy, or a few pandies, on the hand, but I never, except for mitching from school, or telling falsehoods, or some very gross offence, have taken down the clothes, and inflicted punishment of that kind. I am happy to say, I have had occasion to inflict much less punishment lately than formerly.

Do you examine and make the boys explain the passages they read?—We often ask them questions connected with the meaning of sentences, or the places in geography referred to in history, and such words as we suppose they do not understand. In reading poetry, for instance, classical or figurative allusions and expressions often occur which they do not understand, and are generally explained to them, but I may not have leisure sometimes to do it.

Do you explain it to them, or require them to explain it?—I generally ask them questions, and if they cannot do it, I explain it to them.

There is a meeting on Saturday of all the boys, and for what purpose is it?—We think it a desirable thing that the public should all assemble together from the different schools, in order that the public may have an opportunity, if they chuse, of seeing what number of pupils we have in the Institution, and how they are getting on. We have some exhibition from two schools; on one Saturday the English and drawing schools give some exhibition of some part of the business done in the preceding week. For instance, a boy from my school will read an essay or a theme, or a piece of recitation or reading will be given by one or more boys; from the drawing school some specimens of drawings. On the following Saturday, from the mathematical school, some maps or mathematical calculations, and from the writing school, some specimens of writing. On the subsequent day, some specimens of translations from the classical school, and also specimens of translations from the French school. The common-hall commences with prayer. Mr. Hincks and myself, who are clergymen, on alternate Saturdays commence the business of the common-hall with a short extempore prayer.

Is this open to the public?—Yes.

And the managers attend?—Yes, they do sometimes; we wish they attended more frequently; all decent persons are admitted.

Are the Roman Catholic children present at this time during the prayer?—Yes, although some of all denominations may escape from us occasionally, or their parents may require them to go home.

Have you ever found that the practice of using extempore prayer has been objected to?—I have never heard it; we always endeavour to confine it to such subjects as would scarcely be objectionable to any class of Christians.

Is it usual in the other schools to open the business with prayer?—In the classical school I believe it is; and in my school I formerly opened it with prayer, but I was so much interrupted by boys coming in, that I did not think it tended to devotion. Among the boarders they all kneel down in the morning on rising and repeat a prayer, and in the evening they assemble for family worship, when I either myself make an extempore prayer, or one of my assistants reads a prayer from a book that may be known to the Board, called Smith's Domestic Altar, by a minister of the church of Scotland, I believe; they afterwards pray separately before going into bed.

Have you ever known any complaints made by the members of any particular religious community, whether Protestants of the Established Church or Roman Catholics, of any interference with the religious principles of their children?—I have never heard of any.

Have you heard any objection made to the system pursued with regard to religion?—I have never heard of it; some persons have objected to the mingling of persons of such different different ranks; the free scholars, for instance, are persons of inferior rank, and some persons have objected to their mingling with the children of the aristocracy.

Have you ever found the harmony of the school disturbed by the mixture of persons of different religious principles?—I never have.

Any quarrels among the boys?—No, not on the ground of religion I have never known it, and I think it very remarkable, but it may be owing to the strict impartiality which the masters endeavour to observe.

Have you many Roman Catholic scholars in the day school?—I should think a considerable number; a small number in comparison with Presbyterians and Protestants. The Roman Catholic population in Belfast and its vicinity are not generally wealthy, and our schools are rather expensive, but I never heard an objection stated by a Roman Catholic.

Do you consider you have as fair a proportion of Roman Catholics, who are able to pay, as of those of the Established Church?—I do not know really, exactly; I should think scarcely, but I could not give a definite answer to the question; I should think it would scarcely be the same, but nearly.

Could you tell the general description of the boys who come to the boarding school, and from what part of the country?—We have children of persons of the greatest respectability in the country, (leaving out the nobility), and some of an humbler rank: I have sons of the high sheriff of the county of Down, who is also one of my own hearers; we have the children of bankers and the most respectable traders, and also the sons of persons in humbler ranks of trade again, as shopkeepers; some of them come from a distance, some from the west and some pretty far south, and even some from the East Indies, and lately I had a boy from the West Indies. My pupils, generally speaking, are from the north of Ireland, from the counties of Down, Antrim, Derry, Tyrone, Donegal, and Armagh, but we have them from different other places.

You are of course acquainted with the thirty-nine articles of the church of England?—I know something of them.

Are there any of those articles connected with doctrines, as distinguished from the mere government and discipline of the church, from which you, as a Presbyterian clergyman, feel obliged to dissent?—I should feel disposed, as an individual, to dissent from some of them, but not simply as a Presbyterian clergyman. As to doctrines, I should dissent from several of the doctrinal articles; I do not profess to be a believer in the doctrine of the Trinity: I wish to state that distinctly, and I should dissent from the articles which inculcate that particular view.

Are you acquainted with any or many Presbyterian clergymen, who, as far as you have the means of forming an opinion, would feel no difficulty in assenting to the doctrines of christianity as stated in the thirty-nine articles of the church of England?—I should think there are several who would not object to the doctrines contained in them, but there are many, on minor shades, who might object, for we have a number of ministers called Orthodox, that maintain different notions on the subject of orthodoxy in the same way as we have many who are called New Light, that entertain different opinions upon that subject.

Do you think there are many who would object to it?—I think there are many.

Do you think there are any considerable number of those Presbyterian clergymen who distinguish themselves by the appellation of Orthodox, who would dissent from the doctrinal articles of the church of England?—I should think a considerable number.

Could you state any doctrines from which they would dissent?—The general opinion of my mind is, that those who are called Orthodox would object to some of those articles. In giving their explanation they might object to a part of an article, while to its general tenor they would not perhaps object: a number of our clergy would object to the subscription who would not object to the doctrines.

Are there many who would object in consequence of the doctrine of the Trinity, as taught in the articles of the Established Church?—Yes, I should suppose a considerable number would object on that account; I should think, but I of course speak very problematically on the subject, that a number might object to the view of the doctrine of the Trinity as specifically laid down. There is a kind of view, technically called the economical subordination of the Son to the Father, which is, I believe, frequently taken by those called Orthodox: they speak of a general subjection of two of the persons in the economy of salvation, and they might object to a strict personal equality. This is my own feeling and view, but I have not had any conversation with any of my Orthodox brethren upon the subject.

We should be much obliged to you for the fullest and best definition you can give of those two leading distinctions that are in common parlance distinguished by the appellation of the Old and New Lights?—With regard to the persons holding Old Light sentiments, they are agreed in admitting the doctrine of the Trinity, with such a definition as I have stated as to the economical subjection; they likewise admit the atonement, some of them considering it to be a vicarious sacrifice, others, I believe, not admitting that it goes so far; they admit the depravity of human nature through the fall of Adam, and they hold the necessity of regeneration through the influence of the Holy Spirit; some of them, I believe, do hold the doctrines of election and predestination, but by far the greater number of those called Orthodox do not, I think, hold that doctrine. Those who are called New Light may be divided into two classes, what are technically called High Arians and Low Arians. The High Arians differ very little perhaps from those of the Orthodox, who speak of the economical subjection: they allege, that the Son existed at such a distance of time previous to all other created beings, as to be very immediately and intimately connected with the Father; they admit the miraculous conception; and, I believe, they admit the propriety of addressing

Examination of
Rev.
H. Montgomery,
11 October 1825.

some kind of worship to Christ; they hold the doctrine of the atonement in a certain sense; they believe, I think, that the death of Christ accomplished something essential to salvation, without stating that it is altogether a vicarious atonement; they hold it to be a doctrine of Scripture, that the salvation of man is accomplished through the death and mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ, without attempting to define the peculiar mode in which it may operate; they reject, I believe, the doctrine of election, and likewise that of original sin, admitting, however, that there is an original weakness or taint conveyed through Adam by ordinary generation, but they do not believe that a child dying unbaptized will necessarily be condemned; they believe there is no salvation through faith alone, except with the superstructure of good works, but they believe that a sound faith should naturally produce good works.

Do they believe that salvation can be accomplished through good works without the aid of faith?—I do not know any of them that hold that opinion, so far as the actions of Christians are concerned. The Westminster divines, whom we look upon as the standard of the Presbyterian church, consider that no person, however he may conform himself to the law of nature, or discharge his duties agreeably to the peculiar station in which the Almighty has placed him, can be saved who is without the pale of the Christian Church. I know of no Arian who holds that doctrine. They believe, so far as I know their views, that a person may be saved out of the pale of the Christian Church, though he may naturally be expected to hold a subordinate situation to virtuous Christians, who have had better opportunities of purifying their hearts and lives, but they believe that through the infinite mercy of God there may be means of salvation for virtuous heathens who have not heard of Christ; with regard to Christians I know of none who do not hold that faith is necessary to their salvation.

Do they hold the doctrine of eternal punishment?—I believe some do, and some do not.

Do the High Arians hold the doctrine of the Trinity in any sense?—I think they approach very nearly to those who hold the doctrine of economical subjection; they hold that our Lord Jesus Christ existed before the foundation of all worlds, and created all things, so that they come very nearly to them, whilst they do not believe in an absolute co-existence.

As to the third person of the Godhead?—I believe that many, both of the High and Low Arians, unite in thinking, that the spirit of God is merely his operating for the good of his creatures, through his omniscience, omnipresence, and providence.

Not as a distinct and separate person?—Some may believe in the personality of the Holy Spirit; I think many seem to sanction, in some degree, the Sabellian doctrine, which maintained that the three persons in the Trinity were only three modes of the manifestation of the Divine Being, the first manifestation as the Father, the second as the Son, and the third as the Holy Ghost; I believe a number of the Arians, both high and low, conceive that the Holy Spirit is merely a mode of the operation of the Deity.

Do you conceive that any persons who hold the economical subjection, would assent to the doctrines as laid down in the Creed of St. Athanasius?—I should think not; I do not think they could.

Will you define what you conceive to be the creed of those persons you have denominated Low Arians?—They believe that Jesus Christ existed as a high spiritual being, as an archangel for instance, or of the highest order of spiritual beings, and that “in the fulness of the time” he came into the world, and took upon him a human form. They believe generally in the miraculous conception; but they do not believe in the propriety of worshipping Jesus Christ. With regard to original sin, they are not believers in that doctrine. They do not think that persons shall be punished for the offence of Adam, but simply for those which they have committed themselves. As to the doctrine of election, they uniformly deny it. Of the doctrine of faith, they admit the great importance in the work of salvation as the foundation of a good and holy life; but not as being capable of leading to salvation independently of good works. As to the atonement, they do not believe in that doctrine as a vicarious sacrifice, or as giving satisfaction to divine justice. They believe that the atonement is produced by the moral efficacy of Christ’s death, through the proof which it gives, for instance, of the divine authority of his religion, and of the interest which he took in the salvation of men. That it afforded likewise a complete proof a future state, and established the clearest evidence of the divine love which induced God to send his Son into the world to die for the benefit of mankind. They do not believe in the doctrine of the atonement as producing any effect upon the Divine Being, by rendering him more placable, but simply as operating upon man as a reasonable and moral agent.

Do either the High or Low Arians hold the necessity of regeneration through the Holy Ghost?—The High Arians I believe do; the Low Arians think they are first to implore the favour of God, and that the Spirit will be afterwards conferred upon them, not that they will be first irresistibly impelled to apply to the Almighty. They believe that only the ordinary means of grace are given to us in the first instance, but that by a proper use of them, farther accessions of divine favour will be graciously communicated by the Holy Spirit.

Will you state what you conceive to be the essential difference between the Low Arian and the Socinian?—The Socinian believes in the simple humanity of our Lord Jesus Christ; that is, as I understand, Socinianism at present; but they deny being Socinians, because the ancient Socinians admitted the miraculous conception and the worship of the Son. So far as I know, this was the opinion of Faustus Socinas, his nephew. At present persons will not take the name of Socinians, because they deny those particular doctrines; perhaps others;

205
Examination of
Rev.
H. Montgomery,
11 October 1825.

others; they believe in the simple humanity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that he was actually the son of Joseph and Mary.

The ancient Socinians would worship our Lord Jesus Christ, but the modern Socinians will not?—Yes.

Will you state the distinction between a modern Socinian and a Unitarian?—I believe they are precisely the same; but at the same time Arians are called sometimes Unitarians, because they believe in one God. Indeed Arians can have no great objection to be called Unitarians, because they believe in the Unity of the Deity; but there is no difference between Unitarians commonly so called, and modern Socinians.

Do not the Unitarians so called and considered as a distinct sect, hold the doctrine of the humanity of Christ?—Yes.

Does not that distinguish them from Arians?—Yes; but with regard to what is called the Unity of God it does not distinguish them, though they have a distinct difference as to the person of Christ.

Which do you conceive the majority of those Presbyterian ministers, who are distinguished by their brethren as belonging to the New Light, to be High Arians or Low Arians?—I should suppose the majority may be High Arians. I could not form a definite opinion upon the point. A number of them are extremely pious good men, and I should think they belong to the class of what are called High Arians. I think there is more strictness as to external forms among them. They are more attentive to those things outwardly tending to increase piety. I do not say they are really more pious, for I cannot judge the heart.

What I wish particularly to know is, whether those ministers who are distinguished as belonging to the New Light, are willing to admit themselves that they are Arians of any description?—A good many of them would not be inclined to admit it, because they do not entertain all the opinions held by ancient Arians, and as they only hold a part, they do not think it fair to give them an obnoxious appellation. I think there are a great many who do not like to be called Arians, that do not believe in the doctrine of the Trinity.

Are there any of the ministers of the New Light who avow the name of Arian?—Yes, I should think many.

And who consider it no imputation?—Yes, when understood as applying to one single point, viz. the non-equality of the persons of the Trinity. Many on this ground consider it no imputation to be called Arians.

Are you a High Arian?—I am rather inclined to High Arianism in some points, and in others not.

Can you express any definite opinion, as to whether the clergy styled Orthodox in the Presbyterian church, and whom we should be disposed to call Evangelical, are more or less acceptable to their congregations as preachers and teachers?—That depends upon the opinions the congregations maintain. In our Old Light congregations they would not hear an Arian at all; in the New Light congregations they would perhaps be as little disposed to hear a Trinitarian; but we have very frequently differences of opinion among members of the same congregation upon the subject, and we generally find that the lower classes are more inclined to the belief of opinions called Orthodox, and the higher class to the belief of opinions called the New Light. There are other congregations again, in which even the most respectable individuals are decidedly Calvinistic and Trinitarian.

Does it follow, that in general the Old Light congregations are more numerous?—I think they are generally more numerous. Much depends upon the situation; but perhaps the hearers are scarcely so numerous in the houses called New Light. Those attending I do think are more numerous in the Old Light; but a great deal depends upon the talents, zeal and exertions of the minister in all congregations.

Do you conceive that the majority of the ministers in the Presbyterian church, who have proceeded out of the Belfast Institution, belong to the New or Old Light?—I have no doubt that the majority are decidedly Old Light, as far as profession goes; and as they are respectable men, I have no reason to doubt of their sincerity. We find in the proportion of those that come out, very considerably more are Orthodox preachers who have been educated in Ireland, than was the case with those educated in Scotland.

To what do you attribute that?—In part to the feeling of the times; there is, I think, what is called a more evangelical feeling in the country. It may be attributed also in some degree, to the very great care with which the different Presbyteries watch over the religious principles of their young men; and Dr. Hanna, though he states fairly the opinions of all parties, never I believe, conceals his own particular views, as to any important point of theology; and a very considerable portion of the effect produced, may arise from the personal influence of the professor, and the respect the students entertain for him as their teacher.

Do you think that it can be attributed to the mode of teaching in the Universities in Scotland?—I cannot form any opinion upon that. Students are left remarkably free regarding religious opinions in the Universities in Scotland. I studied there four years, and there were no particular principles enforced upon me.

Did you attend the divinity lectures?—Yes, I did; I attended the professor, who was very old, so that we could not distinctly hear him.

Are the Old or the New Lights more strict in the observance of the Sabbath?—I am not aware of any very material difference.

Have you observed many instances of persons passing from the Presbyterian to the Established Church?—I have not known of any large number. I have not known, in my own congregation,

Examination of
Rev.

H. Montgomery,
11 October 1825.

congregation, one single family in the last sixteen years. Of course, in a large town like Belfast, there are some changes taking place, from inter-marriages and otherwise.

Can you state generally, whether those who pass over belong to the Old or New Light?—During the last year I have heard that a family left Dr. Bruce, and another left Dr. Hanna, so that they have passed from both.

Do they belong to the higher ranks?—Yes; or those getting forward to the higher ranks.

Have you known of any persons belonging to the Established Church passing over to the Presbyterian communion?—I do not recollect any distinguished instances in my own vicinity; there are a few persons. I have had communicants that came over; but I know of no one who could be mentioned as a person of consequence.

Have you known of any Roman Catholic who has passed over to your communion?—I do not know one. I have known the children of persons, where one parent was a Catholic, and the other a Dissenter, who have gone to the chapel for a time more frequently than to the Presbyterian meeting-house, and I have known them go afterwards to the Presbyterian meeting-house.

Is there any thing you would wish to communicate to the Commissioners regarding your own situation, or the Institution generally, about which they have not inquired?—The schools are not requiring any thing from the Government of the country; we consider them able to support themselves. There may be a few minor changes desirable, but they may be managed among ourselves.

Will you explain the nature of the Board of Masters?—It consists of all the head masters of the different schools in the Institution; six, for instance. They arrange various plans, subject to the control of the joint boards, to promote the discipline of the schools, and regulate the conduct of the pupils; and in the case of any improprieties being committed in any school by the pupils, of sufficient importance, they take cognizance of all such proceedings, and inflict censure, or expulsion, or such punishment as they may think warranted by the offence. They arrange the time of the examinations of the pupils, the distribution of premiums, and many other circumstances of that kind. They also distribute small premiums to the pupils, at the end of each session, for general eminence.

When the Board of Masters meet as such, are they associated with any of the managers?—No, but all their proceedings are open to the managers and visitors at all times, and their books are regularly submitted.

When the Board of Faculty meets, are they associated with the Managers?—No, they are a distinct body, but their proceedings are open to the inspection of the Board of Managers and Visitors. I do not know that they are at the control of those boards.

Have you known any instances of resolutions or regulations of the Board of Masters being rescinded by the Board of Managers?—I am not aware of any instance in which they have been rescinded; they have been sometimes sent back for revision.

How often does the Board of Masters meet?—On Saturday we always meet.

Are there any observations you would wish to submit to the Board, with respect to the connection of the Synod of Ulster with the Belfast Institution?—The Synod of Ulster seemed at all times deeply impressed with the importance of a home education, which they have testified by numerous declarations and resolutions, and until the last meeting of the Synod in Coleraine, the most friendly feeling existed between the two bodies; and although various causes have tended to produce momentary irritation between the Synod of Ulster and the Proprietors of the Institution, there is still, I am convinced, a very affectionate feeling towards that seminary. I am persuaded the Synod would feel very reluctant to give up an object they have so long cherished. Their resolutions will be submitted to you by the clerk, and my conviction is, that though there has been a momentary alienation, there is no unkindly feeling towards the Institution. I conceive the demand the Synod of Ulster made of the Institution is what it could not have granted consistently with the principles upon which it commenced, as supported by all denominations.

What do you conceive to be the extent of the demand made by the Synod of Ulster?—It is to have an influential vote, that might be considered as actually being a controlling vote in the election of professors. I think its object is to give the Synod of Ulster a great control in the election of professors.

Of all professors?—Yes; they have the choice of their own Divinity professor. It would give them a greater influence than any other body possesses, to hold out the terror of giving offence to so influential a body, in case a particular candidate recommended by them should not be elected. This is, in fact, the meaning of their proposal, or it has no meaning. The Moderator had the power of voting before. The object of the present application seems to be to give him the weight of all the Synod of Ulster, and the fear of offending them when he comes forward at an election.

Did they claim any influence in the appointment of Masters?—No.

Do you conceive it to be reasonable that they should have, not merely control over, but the appointment of the Professor of Divinity?—Unquestionably.

On what ground?—That they may have their students taught by a person in whose religious sentiments they have confidence, and who will endeavour to inculcate such views of doctrine and church government as they approve.

Are there not Presbyterian ministers not under their control?—Yes; they have the power of teaching divinity to their own students, and a room would be given to them in the Institution for that purpose. But a very serious objection would arise to the appointing of persons under the control of the Synod of Ulster, or any other body, to the situation

of 207

Examination of
Rev.
H. Montgomery,
11 October 1825.

of literary professors. With regard to my own boarders, for example, some of them are the sons of persons belonging to the Established Church. Those individuals would naturally object to their sons attending the professors who taught the views of particular sects of religion; and it would bar the way to a considerable degree of improvement in the north of Ireland, and prevent a large and respectable class from enjoying a high literary and philosophical education. Were literary professors appointed, who inculcated the tenets of a particular sect, no person would be likely to place his son under them if he entertained a different religious feeling; and it is for that reason chiefly I object to what the Synod claim, as being altogether unsuitable to the state of society in the north of Ireland.

Are there any of the professorships, ostensibly literary, that do in the nature of their courses communicate a considerable portion of religious instruction?—I do not know any, unless it may be the moral philosophy class, which takes a view of natural religion, the being and attributes of God, the doctrine of Providence, and the immortality of the soul; and I am persuaded the professor has so taught those things as not to interfere with the religious tenets of different sects, further than by stating the views entertained by each.

Do you conceive that the effect of the proposal of the Synod would be, that no persons would be chosen as professors, unless they were Presbyterians and approved of by the Synod?—I do not know that that would certainly be the effect, for there might be a re-action on the part of the managers, if they thought there was likely to be a tyrannical control exercised over them; but I am certain the Synod calculated on obtaining a very strong controuling power, by holding out to the Institution the terror of giving them offence, and the consequent removal of their students.

Suppose such a system was established as gave to the Synod of Ulster the right of direct interference, and that no person should be elected except those that were approved of by them, could any persons be elected who were not Presbyterians, or would the Synod approve of any but Presbyterians?—They might; but the great preponderance would naturally be in favour of the Presbyterians.

According to the proposal, the Synod of Ulster was, by delegates from the several Presbyteries, to examine the testimonials of the several candidates?—Yes.

And to signify through its Moderator to the Institution, what candidates it approved of?—Yes.

Do you conceive that it was intended upon this examination, the delegates should have recurrence to religious opinions?—No doubt of it. They are not to recommend any that do not entertain particular views upon religious subjects, and that would be militating against the principle stated to Government by the Institution; viz., That in elections, literary eminence and moral respectability alone should be considered.

Must not the effect be the exclusion of all persons who do not hold the doctrines held by the Synod?—Yes, so far as the Synod's influence extended; but the Synod might consider a person of the Established Church who would subscribe the thirty-nine articles as sufficiently Orthodox, and there might be no objection to him on that single point.

In the breast of those called Orthodox?—Yes.

In the breast of those not called Orthodox, would it not be an objection?—Yes, it certainly might. Supposing a New Light Man were upon this Committee, he might recommend a person of his own creed, and save his conscience by alleging that a New Light Man was truly Orthodox or held the true faith.

Is it not from the nature of the application clear, that the circumstance that would attract the condemnation of the Synod in the election, is Arianism?—Yes, no doubt of it.

That they would consider a member of the Established Church less objectionable than an Arian?—Yes, the majority of them.

Was not the proposition of the Synod agreed to by the Institution in substance, as to testimonials?—It was agreed to by the joint Boards for the sake of peace and conciliation, when it was proposed in 1824, and I have no doubt would have been submitted to by the proprietors at the time; but the Synod coupled it in 1825, with a religious clause, binding the Moderator to recommend none but persons of Orthodox sentiments, which entirely changed the nature of the proposal.

Was it that he should recommend only those who were Orthodox, or those approved of by the delegates?—Those who held Orthodox sentiments only. And it was coupled with this threat; "We expect and trust, that in all future elections, the managers and visitors will hold in view the opinions of the Synod upon this subject." In fact, it holds out a direct threat, as you will perceive by the words. I am satisfied that religious opinions if they have had any influence at all in the appointment of professors in the Institution, have been in favour of the sentiments called Orthodox, rather than in favour of those called New Light. In one or two instances, much of the opposition given to the respectable candidates elected, arose from their being persons holding those sentiments. Therefore, I do not think, the tendency of the Institution is to elect persons of those opinions, all things being equal, but that ceteris paribus, the tendency would be the other way.

Are the majority of the present masters and professors of the New Light or the Old Light?—I should think the majority are decidedly Old Light. I do not know any of the masters or professors that could be called New Light, except three; one a professor only, one a master and professor, and one a master only. There is also a teacher of elocution, who can scarcely be said to be connected with the Institution, not being a member of the Faculty or Board of Masters, but simply having a room to lecture in.

Are all the lay professors of the Old Light?—Yes, I understand so. I know but three individuals among the professors and masters, who hold the sentiments, called New Light.

Examination of
Rev.
H. Montgomery.
11 October 1825.

Were you known to many of the electors prior to your own appointment?—To a very considerable number of them personally; by character I was known to them all.

By whom were they solicited to vote for you?—I do not know; possibly in some cases by my friends.

Did you solicit a vote?—Not a single vote; I could not be guilty of so great an indelicacy.

Did you produce testimonials?—I stated I could produce them if they were thought necessary; but the electors intimate acquaintance with me from my residence in the vicinity, made it unnecessary.

Were there any rival candidates for the office?—I believe a great number of gentlemen were candidates for the situation.

Are you aware whether there was any difference of opinion among the electors?—Very little, I believe; and it arose chiefly, as I learned, from my retaining my congregation. I understood that only two individuals voted against me, and had that circumstance not been in existence, I was led to believe, the election might have been unanimous.

Appendix, No. 5.

Examination of Mr. Thomas Spence; Tuesday, 11th October 1825.

Examination of
Mr. Thomas Spence,
11 October 1825.

WHAT office do you hold in the Belfast Institution?—I am teacher of writing.

Do you teach arithmetic?—I do not.

When were you appointed?—I think I was appointed on the 4th January 1814; I was the first master appointed in my department.

What number of boys usually attend your school at present?—At one period of the year, that is, previous to the month of May, the boys are about 200; at other times of the year not so many. They are frequently down to 160 and to 170.

What is the rate of payment?—Half a guinea per quarter for each.

What is the whole extent of your annual emoluments?—The average of pupils I would take to be between 170 and 180.

Then are we to understand that you receive about 350 guineas per annum?—If the payments were all good it would be very nearly that sum, deducting therefrom the charge for my assistant.

Do you lose any considerable proportion of it?—I do.

Have you 300*l.* or guineas clear for your situation?—Very nearly, I should suppose.

Were you known to many of the electors before you were appointed?—I was.

Are you a native of this town?—No.

Were you living in it at the time?—Yes.

Did you teach a school before that?—A general school.

Do you teach in any other place than the Belfast Institution?—Yes, privately.

To what extent?—An hour in the morning and an hour in the evening.

At home?—Yes, and I also teach an hour in the female boarding school.

How many hours in the day do you devote to teaching in the Institution?—From ten till three.

Did you solicit votes upon the occasion of your election?—I never did.

Were there any competitors for the appointment?—I believe many.

In what manner were the electors apprized of your qualifications?—I dare say by my having taught in the town; I was personally acquainted with most of the gentlemen, not from teaching writing alone, but also from teaching other things.

You are confined strictly to the teaching of writing?—Yes, nothing else in the Institution.

You are a member of the Seceding Synod?—I am.

Is there any circumstance, connected either with your own situation or the Institution at large, you would wish to have this opportunity of stating to the Commissioners?—As I am a native of a town adjacent to this, and lived in this town before my appointment in the Institution, I am acquainted with almost every thing that has happened in the Institution, and perhaps I might state something.

State any thing your experience enables you to lay before the Commissioners?—There is one thing on which I would like to state my sentiments; that this Institution was established for the purpose of giving education to pupils and students of every religious persuasion, without wishing to give a preponderating influence to any sect.

Has that object been in any manner defeated or contravened, so far as has fallen within your observation?—I think there has been an attempt made lately to give an influence to one religious body over the rest, which in my opinion might be prejudicial to the Institution.

What body is it to which it has been sought to give that preponderance?—I allude to the Synod of Ulster.

Are you one of those that disapprove of their possessing that preponderance?—I am; from the long and intimate acquaintance I have had with the object and proceedings of the Institution.

Would you disapprove of the Seceding Synod having the same influence given to them?—I would disapprove of any religious body having a greater influence than another, as it would be in direct opposition to the object of the Institution.

Do

209
Examination of
Mr. Thomas Spence,
11 October 1825.

Do you disapprove of the professorships of divinity being in the appointment of the Synod of Ulster and the Seceding Synod respectively?—No, I do not.

Do you think those Synods ought to have any control in the election of other professors?—I think they ought not, particularly as other professors are under a pledge not to interfere with the religious principles of their students.

Do you think the religion of a candidate has operated in the choice of the different professors, or any of them?—I never thought that in the least; I do not think it has.

Do you think there is any particular sect of Christians that at this moment has in some manner or other obtained a greater share than fairly belongs to them in the several professorships and masterships?—Do you mean a greater share in proportion to the other sects?

Yes.—Yes, I think there is.

Which, for instance?—The Synod of Ulster.

Are there any individuals amongst the professors or masters who entertain religious opinions, that according to your conception, disqualify them for their situations?—Certainly not.

Or that make it in any way improper that they should hold those respective situations?—I do not know of any such person.

Are there persons amongst those professors and masters from whom you differ in religious belief?—Yes.

But you still think they are perfectly fitted, notwithstanding that difference, to execute the duties assigned to them?—So I think; and it was understood, at the first commencement of the Institution, that the persons chosen there should be chosen without regard to their religious sentiments.

Is it your impression that any of those individuals do interfere indirectly, perhaps without intending it themselves, in forming the religious belief of the young men entrusted to their tuition?—I do not know of any thing of the kind.

Are you aware of any strong political opinions being entertained by any professors or masters of the Belfast Institution?—They have never shown themselves to me.

Do you think any advantage would be gained by having lay professors instead of clerical professors?—Yes, I do.

Will you explain the nature of the advantage in your opinion?—As this country is divided into many sects, from the great number of persons who have from time to time come over from England and Scotland and settled here, I think that the appointment of clergymen of any of those particular sects brings them more ostensibly or prominently into the conflict of opinion respecting religious sentiments in this country.

How do you reconcile that with your former answer, that you are not aware of their having exercised any influence, even perhaps without their own knowledge?—The Synod of the Seceding body, or the Synod of Ulster, or the Covenanters or other sects, each of them perhaps think themselves right in religious tenets, and consequently would prefer one of their sect or opinion being chosen, and the successful candidate being an officiating member of one sect, may more likely be accused by opposing sects of influencing his pupils in religious matters.

Would not the same thing apply to a lay man as a minister?—Certainly, but not to the same extent.

Do you mean that you think, in point of public opinion, less prejudice would be entertained if the professors were laymen, than if they were clerical men?—I do not think that laymen come so much in contact with public opinion.

Are any of the professors or masters clergymen of the Seceding Synod?—Yes, Mr. Cairns and Dr. Edgar.

Is there any thing else you wish to add?—I should be very unwilling to volunteer any opinion which might appear invidious, but I do think it would be better if both the situations of professor and master were not held by the same person.

Appendix, No. 6.

Examination of the Rev. William Cairns, A. M.; Tuesday, 11th October, 1825.

IN what University did you receive your degree?—Glasgow.

You are Professor of Logic and Belles Lettres in the Belfast Institution?—Yes.

When were you appointed to that situation?—In September 1815, I believe; I was among the very first who were appointed; I came here when the college classes opened.

Were you a minister in the Presbyterian Church?—In the Secession Church of Scotland; I had a church there for a few years; I have never changed my religious connexions; but since I came to this country I have been asked to officiate both by ministers of the Synod of Ulster and of the Associate Synod. I am still a member of the Secession Church, but am in that pleasant situation that I have intercourse with both bodies.

Do you hold yourself at liberty to officiate in both?—Yes, when asked by ministers.

Are you a native of Scotland?—Yes, of Glasgow.

Were you personally known to many or any of the Managers of the Belfast Institution previous to your appointment?—I may say none; I was never in Belfast till the year I was appointed; I came to offer myself as an entire stranger.

What testimonials did you bring with you?—From professional men and literary friends in Scotland; some of them in Glasgow college.

Examination of
Rev.
W. Cairns, A. M.
11 October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
W. Cairns, A. M.
11 October 1825.

Were there any competitors for the office?—Yes, a number of persons; there were two offices vacant at the same time; the moral philosophy chair as well as the logic.

Were any of those candidates resident in Belfast?—One was a minister in Belfast.

To what do you attribute it that you should have been appointed and other gentlemen rejected?—I cannot say; there could have been no particular influence in my favour; the literary character of the other gentleman was considered unquestionable and highly respectable.

Are you aware whether there was any considerable solicitation of votes amongst the electors?—So far as I experienced myself I met with no encouragement to make personal application.

Will you describe the nature and extent of the lectures you give in the Belfast Institution?—I might perhaps simply refer to the practices in Edinburgh and Glasgow. The subjects illustrated in the class are divided into logic and polite literature; in logic I generally take an opportunity of going over the compend of the syllogistic logic used in Dublin College. The principal objects of the course is to introduce the students to an acquaintance with the elements of modern intellectual philosophy, so far as those apply to reasoning and scientific investigations of different kinds.

You consider Murray's Logic as not attaining that end sufficiently?—Yes; I follow the plan here that the Presbyterian ministers of the north of Ireland have been accustomed to, and that they wish their students to have access to; the class forms a sort of introduction to intellectual philosophy.

Will you state what writers you have recourse to or recommend to your class?—We have no text book; but I regularly refer to Dr. Reid, Mr. Stewart of Edinburgh, and the late Dr. Brown of Edinburgh, Dr. Beattie, and others; Watts' and Duncan's treatises on logic are also referred to, and recommended to the young men.

Do you make any reference to Locke?—Frequently, both in the lectures and examinations. To encourage the reading of Locke regularly, at the commencement of every session, a premium is given for excelling in voluntary examinations on some part of his Essay on Human Understanding, commonly each book in succession; there is every encouragement to the young men to come forward in such examinations; they do not come forward universally.

Do you make any reference to Aristotle's Logic?—A pretty full account is given of the substance of it. The students are generally taught that the compend referred to contains the system of logic that has come down from Aristotle. An account is also given of the Novum Organum of Lord Bacon.

Have you published your course?—No.

Do you refer to the writings of Berkeley and Hume?—Yes, frequently; I confine myself however to subjects of intellectual philosophy that bear upon reasoning.

Will you describe the line of demarkation you conceive to separate your department from that of the professor of moral philosophy?—That is one of our chief practical difficulties. Dr. Young and myself have had frequent conversations on the subject, and we have endeavoured to understand one another so as to avoid going over the same ground. I consider myself as rather called upon to acquaint the students with the elementary principles of intellectual philosophy, and to avoid all subjects connected with moral principles and the passions. These I never refer to except to illustrate the principles of reasoning or of taste.

With regard to the celebrated work of Bishop Berkeley, on the principles of human knowledge, to which of your departments does the subject there treated of belong?—Neither department could be conducted without a reference to it. I am in the habit of referring to it, and pointing out the fallacy of the reasoning in it.

To which department do you conceive it principally belongs to point out those fallacies?—In the moral philosophy class the subject is entered into more fully, but I could not give instruction upon the progress of speculation concerning the human mind without referring to it.

Are the fallacies of Hume, upon the same subject, pointed out by either of the departments?—Yes.

By which principally?—The moral philosophy class affords an opportunity of entering more amply into Hume's principles: I refer to these generally, as I do to Berkeley's.

Is the nature of the human soul, so far as we have faculties to enable us to understand it, treated of in your department, or in the department of moral philosophy?—We commonly set out by stating, that there are certain phenomena connected with the human mind that may be studied without entering into the question of the precise nature of the soul, so that I never have occasion to enter into the question of its materiality or immateriality; but I believe the tendency of all the illustrations is in favour of the immateriality of the soul; I believe that has been the tendency, also, of the course of moral philosophy.

How do you conduct your examinations?—They turn chiefly upon the lectures previously given, and occasionally upon books illustrative of the subjects; we wish to encourage the reading of books upon the different subjects.

Do you examine the class daily?—Every day.

How many lectures do you give in a week?—I lecture every day except Saturday.

Will you describe the course of lectures given in the other department you term belles lettres?—The first thing that strikes one there is the prodigious extent of the subject, and I have always felt a difficulty as to how much of it should be introduced in the short space allotted to it. For that reason, as the class is considered as a philosophical one, I commonly begin by attending to the principles of taste, giving rather a philosophical analysis of

of those principles, conducted upon the plan of Allison upon Taste, and similar writers. The young men are introduced to the most approved writers upon that point, instead of going over the mere general principles of taste and criticism, as applicable to different kinds of composition. I have of late years been induced to confine myself to some particular branches, which I endeavour to illustrate at as great length as the time allows; for instance, eloquence one session, and in another some kinds of poetry. In this way, those students who attend different sessions, as they frequently do, have a considerable variety of subjects brought before them.

Does not it follow from that arrangement, that there may be many students whose attention is directed only to some branches?—It does; and with me it has been a choice between giving mere outlines of all the branches of polite literature, or introducing the students to a more general acquaintance with some of them.

Which of the departments engages the principal part of your attention?—Perhaps there is more time occupied with intellectual philosophy, as being introductory to other subjects; but the session is nearly divided between both departments; I might rather say, the session is divided between both, because I have been of late in the habit of lecturing every Friday upon some practical subject connected with polite literature, for instance, style or figurative language.

Is that independent of the other two?—It is a part of polite literature; but instead of saying any thing at all upon it till we come to the second part of the session, I have taken an opportunity of introducing some practical subjects included in it at an early period.

How many hours do you lecture each day?—One hour.

Do you think that sufficient?—Yes, to afford materials for examination and exercises for the students; I could lecture upon more subjects than the young men would have time to study, but we are most anxious they should have an opportunity of being examined upon the subjects of the lectures.

Is the time you occupy in the examination of the young men, distinct from that of lecturing?—Yes, totally distinct; it is sometimes one hour a day, and sometimes two; I always meet the class once a day for examination, and sometimes twice.

What number of students is your class composed of generally?—Some of the students attend both lecture and examination, whom we commonly call public students; others attend the lectures only; the fees are different.

Speaking of those who attend the lectures?—I think I have lectured to from thirty to fifty-five students.

What is the rate of fee paid?—Two guineas for the whole course, including examinations, and a guinea for the lectures merely.

What may be the whole extent of your remuneration?—There is a fixed salary of 150 l. a year from the Institution.

What may be about the usual amount of the fees?—They have varied from session to session; I think the fees of the class I am now speaking of vary from 70 l. to 100 l.

Does that constitute the whole of your emolument?—It does; I have, however, had some extra courses of lectures. I have been speaking hitherto of the business of what we call the regular college class; but I have had several courses of lectures of a more popular nature upon polite literature, open to ladies and gentlemen, the fees arising from which are distinct.

Do you receive boarders either for the college or school department in your house?—I have for the last two or three years had a few young men living with me; they have commonly attended the schools; I have received forty guineas for them; but that is entirely a private arrangement; I do not live in the Institution; I rent a house in the neighbourhood. As I was formerly asked whether I had ever published a course of lectures, I would now mention, that I have given two or three courses of lectures upon subjects connected with polite literature, and of the last course I gave I published a synopsis. My intention is to go on with similar lectures, taking up different subjects of that kind. My idea is, that it is more useful to go pretty fully into any one branch, than pass slightly over many.

Do you conceive that your course of lectures may have had the practical consequence, however unintentional on your part, of influencing the religious belief of the young persons attending them?—I should think not. The students who attend my class are very mixed, and I have always felt myself called upon by my situation to act most fairly and impartially, and to give such views of philosophical principles as are consistent with the great principles of natural and revealed religion, without entering into the views of particular sects at all.

Do you conceive if there was a professor in your situation at a future day, not so conscientious, who happened to be a Unitarian, that the nature of his lectures would afford him an opportunity, if so disposed, of affecting the religious belief of those who resorted to him?—He would have to go out of his way a good deal; indeed it would not lie in his way at all.

If he was a pure Deist, would he not have abundant opportunity of undermining the principles of their religious belief?—He might introduce sceptical principles upon some of the subjects.

Are you aware of any instance within the range of the Belfast Institution, either in the college or the school department, in which there has been any interference, or any imputation of interference with the religious belief of any of the pupils?—As to actual interference, I am quite satisfied, there has never been any thing of the kind; I might speak on this subject as an individual who has his own partialities in favour of the stricter views of religion, both speculative and practical, that exist in the country, and as a friend of those views, I declare that I have never seen the least tendency that way; I should think evangelical

Examination of
Rev.
W. Cairns, A. M.
11 October 1825.

gelical principles are perfectly and absolutely safe in the Institution, and that all the members of it are feelingly alive to the propriety of abstaining from any thing that would endanger those principles.

Are we to understand your former answer to mean that the views which are called evangelical, and which are known to us, are those that you approve of?—Yes.

Are you aware that there are certain individuals among the professors and masters who do not approve of those sentiments?—I am; and we never attempt to conceal the fact.

Do you offer it as your opinion, that in the hands of those professors such principles are safe and in no danger of being undermined?—I do; referring to the present management of the Institution.

In whatever manner those individuals have been appointed to their situations, it appears possible, that in process of time, other individuals holding those sentiments might be appointed to all the professorships?—Yes.

Is it your opinion that in that state of things those principles you approve of would be safe?—In explanation I would mention, that the Institution of its own accord adopted some precautionary measures, which I think, as an individual, would be sufficient to secure the safety of those principles. The appointments to professorships have been open from the beginning to candidates of all religious connections, and if a preference should be given to one class over another, it would be on the ground of expedience, as probably being more acceptable to the majority of the community. That principle seemed to be recognized and approved of by all the religious bodies in the country who sent young men to us. They were aware of it from the first, and seemed to approve of it. But it occurred to some members of the Institution, myself as well as others, that it would be proper to use precautions against the possibility of such occurrences as have been referred to. As we were admitted to our situations without any security about religious opinions being required, it occurred to us, that as we were a mixed body, and our pupils mixed, we ought to enter into a pledge of impartiality in the discharge of our duty, and an engagement not to interfere with the peculiar religious principles of our pupils, and especially to treat with deference and respect the religious establishments of the country, and their doctrines. This was an arrangement entered into by the professors of the Institution who form the faculty, without any prompting; and it arose from a strong desire to maintain the general principles of the Institution, and to secure at the same time the safety of the prevailing religious opinions of the country. I conceive, that acting under such a pledge, there would be no danger to these opinions, whatever might be the individual sentiments of the professors.

In what year was that?—I think three or four years ago.

The Synod of Ulster and the Seceding Synod have each their respective professors of divinity?—They have.

Is there any difference of doctrine between those two?—I believe not.

What is the difference of their courses?—I believe the two gentlemen hold precisely the same religious opinions; but the one has the charge of the students belonging to his Synod only, and the other the students belonging to the body with which he is connected.

You are not aware of any difference between the two professors, as would make it improper for the one to teach the students of the other?—Not perhaps at present; but there might be a very great difference hereafter. The professor of the Secession Synod is required to conform to the doctrines of the Scottish church. In the Synod of Ulster, I believe, such a pledge is not required, and therefore a professor afterwards appointed by them might teach very different doctrine.

Is such a pledge universal in the Secession church?—Yes, it is.

And it has not been dispensed with?—No.

Are we right in our belief, that the members of the Secession Synod subscribe to the Confession of Westminster?—Yes.

Do they take any oath?—I am not aware that they do; on the day of their ordination they make a solemn declaration of their belief of the doctrines of that confession.

Are they asked any opinion as to the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England?—I believe not.

You have of course read those articles; can you state, whether there are any of those articles that relate merely to doctrine, as contra-distinguished from church discipline and government, that you as an individual, dissent from?—I know of none; I should only say, that the statement in the Westminster Confession was more enlarged than that. I can assent to the statement of the thirty-nine articles.

Have you examined them so as to compare them?—I think I have.

Those that relate to church discipline you do not agree with?—I would prefer the principles of the Presbyterian church, but without having a strong antipathy to the other.

Still confining it to church government, and not extending it to the exposition therein contained of the nature of the Christian religion, and the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel?—Yes.

How many ministers belong to the Secession Synod, in Ireland?—I believe upwards of 100.

Are you aware of any of those ministers who hold the sentiments that are called Arian?—I believe not. The great principle of that body is to confine their religious intercourse to men whose opinions agree with the confession of faith. I should suppose the Synod of Ulster allows a greater extent of communion in matters of religion. That is the objection of the Secession Synod, and their principal reason for not uniting with them. They prefer a more

a more restricted communion, to avoid ecclesiastical intercourse with men of opposite sentiments.

Do you know any member of the Secession Synod who is a High or Low Arian?—I know of none.

Do you believe there is any one?—I do not think there is.

Do you think their subscribing to the Westminster Confession of Faith is a sufficient guard against it?—I think the mere subscription to the Confession of Faith would not secure it; and it is commonly given as one reason for the ministers of the Secession church acting by themselves, that they may better exercise a practical vigilance over the uniformity in doctrine they wish for. This is one great object of their separate association. They think that even in the sacred matter of subscription there may be a little shuffling, and their object is to watch over the practical adherence of the members of their church to the doctrines they profess.

We should wish to know your view of the claim lately advanced by the Synod of Ulster, to interfere in the appointment of the professors?—That is a very intricate subject.

Do you think it would operate to the benefit of the Institution, that matters should be placed upon the footing they would wish?—Their proposals of late have assumed a complicated form. You are perhaps aware of the first shape that the matter assumed, which was simply this: As their moderator has a vote in the election of the professors, instead of allowing him to vote as an individual, they required him to consult with a committee that they appointed. This committee should have access to the testimonials of the different candidates, and express to the moderator their opinion of such as they thought eligible, while he should report it to the other electors. That I believe was the original proposal, and that proposal I always thought might be of advantage. I believe too, that the only proposal that was ever made directly to the Institution, did not go further than this, and for that reason I wish it had been acquiesced in without any more discussion. But unfortunately before the last meeting of the proprietors, some members of the Institution had got into a newspaper discussion with an individual member of the Synod; that produced a good deal of warm feeling, and other matters were mixed up with it. There were also some declarations made in the course of discussion, that the Synod would not be satisfied with the appointment of any but Orthodox men, but that was never directly proposed to the Institution. Something to that effect however, was lately entered on the minutes of the Synod.

Was not that proposed in the present year 1825?—Not to the Institution; there is something on their minutes bearing on the subject, but they are in the habit of reviewing their minutes, and that may also be reviewed and changed.

What is your view as to the expediency of any arrangement that would give to the Synod of Ulster a practical veto upon the appointment of any professor?—I do not know; there is one thing we all feel, viz.; the importance of the appointments here being satisfactory to the public generally, and to the majority of the religious world, and therefore any expression of satisfaction beforehand, concerning the qualifications of any candidates, might be a desirable thing. It did not strike me that what was proposed to the proprietors of the Institution the other day would really give a control over the elections. It would afford an opportunity for a respectable and influential body in the country expressing their opinion upon the qualifications of the candidates.

Is it your opinion that the majority of the religious world you have spoken of would be satisfied with the appointment of Arian professors?—There would be a difference of feeling upon that point, and even now such difference exists; some are more satisfied than others; but the probability is, that men holding the commonly received religious opinions would be more generally acceptable.

In the term you have used, "the majority of the religious world," do you mean to exclude Arians or include them?—I should think the Arians are not the majority of the religious world.

Have you any doubt that Arianism was the circumstance that suggested to the Synod of Ulster the desire of possessing the control in question?—With some individuals I believe it was; that there was a circumstance that gave rise to it that seemed to recommend it more generally to the Synod. At one of the elections the moderator of the Synod recommended an individual as in all probability highly acceptable to the body he represented. Some thought this was going too far, and it was with a view to prevent any other moderator acting in this way that they appointed a committee to be his adviser upon the subject, as a check and guide to their own moderator.

You understand it to be partly as a control over the moderator, as well as a control over the other electors in the Institution?—When it first came before the public it was generally understood in no other way than a control over the moderator.

Will you define what you mean by the term orthodox?—In my own conception I should think it is understood in the same way as the word evangelical.

You mentioned, that you supposed that individuals of certain religious principles would prefer having persons of the same religious feelings (or principles) chosen as professors; now such persons might give a preference to those agreeing with themselves; do you think the friends of the Institution would wish there should be any rule by which the electors should be tied down to chuse persons of certain religious sentiments?—There is a difference of opinion upon the point. I know many individuals of the same opinions with myself, who would wish that there should be no such test, but that professorships should be open to all literary men acting under such a pledge as is now given.

Examination of
Rev.
W. Cairns, A. M.
11 October 1845.

Who, consistently with their opinions, would wish, ceteris paribus, there should be a person of their own sentiments chosen, but would not exclude another if he were better qualified?—Yes, I have heard that sentiment expressed by men of different religious sentiments. They would not like a theoretical exclusion of men of any particular religious connexion, but they would admit that, ceteris paribus, a man whose sentiments agreed with the sentiments of the majority in the country, would be preferable. I should object to the giving the election to one of inferior literary attainments merely on account of his orthodoxy. This is the evil that many wish to guard against.

Do you think the consequence of an acquiescence in the proposition of the Synod of Ulster, would be to exclude Arians from the situation of professors in the Belfast Institution?—Not necessarily by the mere appointment of a committee to regulate the moderator. This opinion is formed upon the admitted fact, that there is a great difference of opinion among the members of the Synod upon the subject of Arianism.

Does not the Synod, in the minute to which you refer, mention the circumstance that Arian professors have been chosen as a ground of objection to the present system, and as a ground to them for desiring a change in the mode of election?—The minute expresses regret that the appointment of men of Arian sentiments has diminished public confidence in the Institution, and that they expect and trust that the Institution will hereafter attend to the wish of the Synod of Ulster, that those appointed should be Orthodox men; but these proposals were never submitted to the consideration of the Institution, nor was the acquiescence of the Institution in them formally required.

Did the Synod ask more than for copies of the different certificates to be submitted to their committee?—I believe not, at least at first, and the Institution have granted that. The only thing that could have been conceded more would have been to have made a bye-law on the subject. This I believe was asked at the last meeting of the proprietors; the common opinion on the proceedings of the proprietors is, that the principal thing asked by the Synod was given, but that they declined making a bye-law upon the subject.

There are two Professors of Divinity belonging to the collegiate part of the Institution; we believe no person has ever imputed Arian principles to either of those gentlemen?—Never.

Of the other seven Professors, will you state what number there are who entertain those sentiments?—I should think there are only two of the professors; I believe there are two who have been spoken of.

Of the Masters what number has there been?—I am not aware whether there is above one, and that one a member of the Synod of Ulster.

Is it your impression that those gentlemen would avow or disclaim Arian principles when interrogated upon the subject?—I am not aware that they would disclaim those opinions as their own as individuals.

The question went to elicit the fact of whether they consider the allegation to be a just or an unjust one?—I should think they would not deny it; but some gentlemen stand a little upon this ground: "How can it be proved that we are Arians?" In churches where there is not a public creed it may be difficult to prove what a man really believes; and in moments of controversy or discussion, some of those gentlemen may say, "How do you know I am an Arian?" although the general belief is that they would not disclaim it.

Do you conceive there would be any difficulty in determining the point of Arianism or non Arianism, where a man has a congregation to whom he preaches?—It might be determined by his preaching, and by that chiefly where there are no articles of faith adopted by the body to which he belongs.

Do you conceive that the peculiar views of Arianism are positively inculcated in the sermons of the ministers who maintain them?—My own knowledge of that subject is very limited; I have heard the sermons of those said to be Arians only occasionally, and I should think that sometimes they do inculcate Arian sentiments, but I should not think it follows that these are uniformly inculcated.

Would not you be disposed to infer the Arianism of the preacher as well from the topics he was constantly silent upon, as those he preached upon?—As an individual I should.

Are you aware of any strong political opinions being held by any professors or teachers of the Belfast Institution?—I may safely say I am not. Among the teachers or professors, I am not aware of any one being a decidedly political character, or having strong political feelings of any description.

That observation, we presume, does not apply to the managers?—No, I speak of my colleagues, and I do not know any one of them that appears to entertain strong political principles; I should think the greater part of them have rather a leaning to the present politics of the country, or a ministerial feeling. I am sure there is no ultraism of any kind, or any approach to what are generally understood as jacobinical or revolutionary principles. I cannot express myself too strongly upon that point.

What is the form of the pledge given by the professors; is it a written pledge?—Yes, and signed.

Do you recollect a political dinner given in this town some six or seven years ago that made a considerable noise?—I recollect one; I have too much reason to recollect it. It happened during our first session when we were beginning our business.

Why do you say you have too much reason to recollect it?—From the consequences that resulted from it; it was the first unpleasant circumstance that occurred.

In what way was that dinner supposed to be connected with the Institution?—The supposition I believe arose from the circumstance that a few of the managers of the Institution tion were there as individuals, and perhaps two of the teachers, but there was not one of the professors present.

213

Were there any of masters?—One or two.

Did the masters take any particular part in the proceedings of that day?—None of them; I have heard some of them lament the proceedings as totally contrary to their wishes.

Were the toasts or speeches, or both, considered as objectionable in the proceedings of the day?—Only the toasts, which were published in the newspapers.

Were the toasts accompanied by speeches?—They were given at a late hour when speechifying was pretty well over.

Was it a mixed meeting?—Yes, very much so; it was on St. Patrick's day, and merely at a dinner in honour of that day.

Was it a dinner that at all suggested itself as being given in some way connected with the Institution?—Not at all; indeed we were all at a loss to conceive how it could be supposed to be connected with the Institution; the only link of connection was the circumstance of one or two of the managers being there, and two of the teachers, and one of them a man whose political bias would be quite on the other side. I have heard individuals say, that the foolish toasts were introduced at a late hour, contrary to the wishes of the majority of the persons present.

You were not there?—No.

Was there not some speech published, if not made, professing to have been made upon that occasion, putting forward the Belfast seminary as one in which the sentiments implied in those boasts were happily gaining ground?—I never heard of it, and my impression is there was not any thing of the kind.

Is there any observation you wish to mention to the Board, upon any matter upon which you have not been examined?—The professors are formed into a faculty and keep regular minutes of their proceedings, and the pledge I refer to, and the explanations of it, will be found in that book. I never as an individual have felt any thing irksome in the management of the Institution. I have always felt the strongest desire that the Institution should be connected with the Government of the country; when I was appointed it enjoyed the sanction of Government, and that was one strong inducement with me in applying for the situation; the withdrawing of the Government countenance was a severe disappointment to those belonging to the Institution; the countenance of Government would produce many more advantages than pecuniary ones; the utility of the Institution, as a literary seminary, would be greatly increased by it.

Do you think any jealousy on the other side would be excited by it?—I think not; I am not prepared to say what sort of connection there should be.

Would you have the goodness to suggest any particular bond of connexion between the Government and the Institution, besides that of receiving aid?—I am not prepared with any specific plan.

Would you think it desirable that the Government should have any controul in the appointment of professors?—I have no fixed opinion on that subject at all.

What are we to understand is meant by a connexion with Government?—Countenance, and all that practical influence that would arise from that circumstance. There is one feeling that has been made upon the minds of the professors from the first, that we have been acting both under the eye of the public and the eye of the Government, and that we were amenable to them.

Would you not consider such connexion as a high testimonial in favor of the Institution?—It would be very strong.

Do you mean more than that you think it would be desirable that the Government should give pecuniary aid to the Institution, and that that should excite a feeling of gratitude in the Institution towards the Government?—That would be one important result.

Do you speak of any thing beyond that?—I think some more specific arrangements might be entered into.

Nothing specific occurs to you?—No.

Were you a candidate for both situations, Professor of Moral Philosophy and Logic and Belles Lettres?—They were both open at the same time.

Appendix, No. 7.

Examination of the Rev. Dr. Samuel Hanna, D. D.; Tuesday, 11th October 1825.

STATE what situation you hold in the Belfast Institution?—I am Professor of Divinity and Church History for the General Synod of Ulster, and I lecture in the Institution, by the direction of the Synod.

In what manner were you appointed?—By the General Synod of Ulster.

In what manner did your election take place?—A business of this kind is generally done in the Synod by motion. One member of Synod moved, and another seconded, that I should be the professor, and it was carried unanimously.

Was there any competitor?—There were competitors at first, but at the time of the election I believe they had declined.

What number may have voted upon that occasion?—I could not exactly say what number of the members of the Synod were present.

About what number?—If I had the minutes I could state it, because the names are mentioned.

Examination of
Rev.
W. Cairns, A. M.
11 October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
Dr. S. Hanna, D. D.
11 October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
Dr. S. Hanna, D. D.
11 October 1825.

Had you made use of any personal exertion to obtain it?—I applied to a number of friends for their support, so far as they deemed it right to give it, but held out no inducements to lead them to give me their support. I may therefore say, I made use of very little exertion to obtain it.

What are the emoluments arising from it?—The Synod have not been able to fix any sum definitively, but in their minutes they allow the treasurer to pay me 100*l.* per annum. During the first two years I only got 36*l.*

Have you any salary from the Institution itself?—None whatever.

Have you any fees from your class?—Yes; the Synod attempted to raise a fund for the endowment of a Professorship of Divinity, and finding that did not succeed, they ordered that the students in the class should pay each a fee of two guineas for the session*.

What may be the amount of your income resulting from the fees?—The fees of the students are included in the 100*l.* a year; the treasurer for the professorship places them in the account, as part of this 100*l.* a year.

Your total emoluments are, at the utmost, 100 guineas a year?—100*l.*, including every thing.

In what manner is the fund raised, out of which the deficiency between the fees of the students and the 100*l.* is supplied?—It was proposed to be raised by congregational collections, and certain sums given by the members of the Synod, but at the time an attempt was made to obtain the sum by congregational collections, the country was in a state not favorable for it; there was a great pressure here.

Do you understand that the other Professor of Divinity, appointed by the Seceding Synod, is remunerated upon the same principle, and to the same or what extent?—He is clerk to his Synod, and he gets 50*l.* a year from Government for that, and I believe his students are ordered by his Synod to make him up 50*l.* so that he has 100*l.* annually.

But half his duty is totally distinct from that of professor?—Yes it is.

Have you the care of a congregation?—Yes.

One of the first importance in extent in the Presbyterian church?—It is a large congregation.

Had you the charge of that congregation antecedent to your appointment?—Yes.

When were you appointed to your professorship?—In 1817.

Will you describe the nature and extent of the course of lectures you deliver as Professor?—The class commences, according to the instructions of the Synod, the 10th of November; I am not confined exactly to that; I may commence a little before. This year my class is advertised to open the 8th; the session must continue until the first of May; the students must attend from the 10th of November till the 1st of May. During that time the students attend the lectures on divinity for three days in the week, and a lecture in church history for a fourth day in the week. On a second hour in each day the students are examined. I examine them upon the subjects that have been discussed in the lectures. On the two remaining days in the week the students either give in discourses, or I put them upon some exercises, such as reading critically portions in the Greek Testament. The students are enjoined to attend two years by the General Synod of Ulster. The students on the junior side of the class deliver each, for the first session, four discourses; in the second session, they are on the senior side of the class, and deliver three discourses. The reason for the difference in the number of discourses in the second year is, that they are then passing through trials in their presbyteries, and it was thought it would be too much for them to give four discourses during that session. The students, at the end of each session, are examined in the presence of the General Synod's Committee, and in the presence of the Faculty. It was not designed, I think, at first, that this examination should be a public one, but latterly it has become public, nor do I, or the people concerned, attend much to the matter, whether it be considered public or private.

Those two years complete the course?—Yes, in divinity and church history. Students cannot enter any class until they have completed their course in philosophy; and according to a late regulation of the Synod, before they enter the theological class they are subjected to an examination by a committee of the Synod.

Describe the course the class pursues?—The manner in which I have conducted my lectures has been this. I consider it necessary to teach divinity as a science, and I divide it into two parts; into that which is connected with what has been generally termed Natural Religion, and that which comes under the denomination of Revealed Religion. In the first part, after a general introductory lecture, I go on to consider the use of reason in matters of religion. After this, to enter on the consideration of the existence and the attributes of the Deity; after that, I take up the subject of Providence, then some other general subjects on Natural Religion. Afterwards I take up the evidences of Christianity, and I have hitherto, in the course of lectures, followed that by taking up the consideration of the genuineness and authenticity of the books of Scripture. After this, I treat on the inspiration and the canonical authority of the Scriptures. Having thus got the Bible into our hands as a book of divine authority, I then enter on what is called Polemic Divinity. I am giving this account of my course very generally, because, under the first head, I have not mentioned the notice I take of Atheism, and the arguments used to refute it; nor have I noticed the view I give of the Deistical writers, and the manner in which they are answered. Under Polemic Divinity, I give the students as accurate a view as I can possibly collect, from the writings themselves of those who maintain different religious systems of the opinions

* Vide Note at the end of this Evidence.

217
Examination of
Rev.
Dr. S. Hanna, D. D.
11 October 1825.

opinions they hold. Here I treat of Unitarianism; what was anciently called Socinianism is now generally called Unitarianism; those who adopt this system have changed their name sometimes in England. After that I give a view of Arianism, of Arminianism, and of Calvinism. I think that the Christian world may be divided, in point of religious doctrines, into those four general classes; they also differ from each other on the subject of Church Government. This difference is the cause of other divisions. I have not entered very minutely into the question of Church Government; I have considered it of more importance to make the students masters of all the points usually discussed in Controversial Divinity.

We presume you reserve what you have to say upon Church Discipline to the time when you come to Church History?—I do refer to it, and if I live to complete the course, I will take in all the controversies respecting Church Government, and the arguments used by the controversialists.

We presume so extensive a course cannot be concluded in one session?—No, in two sessions; the Synod orders the students to attend two sessions, and I so frame my lectures that I may go over a general course in two years.

Do you refer the students to particular books of divinity to prepare themselves for the examination and compilation of the discourses of which you have spoken?—In addition to the lectures, I have always appointed some books to be read during each session; I have varied the books that I have turned the attention of the students to, but my design has been to add to the teaching by lectures, teaching by reading. One of the books I first read was Butler's Analogy. In another session, when I was lecturing upon a part of the course connected with the subject, I turned the attention of the students to Gray's Key to the Bible, and latterly we have read Paley's Evidences of Christianity.

Two descriptions of Arianism have been stated to us, distinguished by the names of High and Low Arianism, are both of them condemned in your course of divinity?—I am not very fond of that distinction of High and Low Arianism; but this is not very material. Formerly the distinction was into Arians and Semi-Arians; latterly, the distinction you have mentioned has been made by some writers.

The question is, whether your course of divinity leads distinctly to the rejection of it in both its forms?—My course of divinity gives all the arguments the Arians give themselves; I give all the arguments I find in the Unitarian writers; and, so far as I have been able to collect them all, the arguments the Arminians are in the habit of using for their system; and then all the arguments the Calvinists are in the habit of using. I teach the student to compare these arguments. I am myself a Calvinist, and if the students would follow me, they would adopt that system. I consider the arguments in favour of the Calvinist system are the strongest.

Do you conceive that many young men who have attended your class as students have eventually become Arians?—It gives me great pleasure that you have put that question to me. I conceive that the whole tendency of the education the young men receive leads to Calvinism, and discourages the other systems; in point of fact, also, I may state, that the greatest number of the young men who have been in my class have been evangelical in their principles, or Calvinists. In addition to that, I trust there is a spirit of piety excited among them to a much greater degree than has been the case in preceding periods of the history of the Synod of Ulster. I would mention, that in addition to the course of divinity, my students every month have a public prayer meeting, in which extracts from some of the missionary societies are read, and an address is made by some of the students. They conduct the services in the meeting. I open the class every Monday morning myself with prayer, but every other meeting is to be opened by the students themselves; they are thus put upon the practice of extempore prayer. A number of them have voluntarily formed among themselves a prayer meeting, which is held in my session room. I state that in my mind there is a conviction, and a deep conviction, that more Calvinists have gone into the ministry in the Synod of Ulster, since the commencement of my lectures, than have formerly gone into it in the same period of time from other Universities, and there have been fewer of other sentiments.

Can you state the number of young men who have gone into the ministry, who have attended your course of lectures from the commencement?—There are at the present time nineteen or twenty ordained ministers in the Synod of Ulster who were in my class; and if I am correct in my calculation, which I take from the last printed minutes of the Synod, there are twenty-eight probationers.

Of the twenty in the ministry how many, if any, do you apprehend have turned out Arians or New Lights?—I do not think that there is more than one an Arian, if there be one. I might have had some doubts that one was an Arian, but for this reason, that he is in an Orthodox Presbytery, and has subscribed, in a very unqualified way, the Westminster Confession of Faith. I had some fears, from the place in which he lived, that he might have been led away to Arianism, but I have been led since to think he has not. All the rest are Orthodox, and the greater number are of them zealous and pious men. I believe I could count them out, and compare them with the same number in any body of men, and think they would not be found inferior to them, either in ability or piety.

Of the twenty-eight probationers are there any who excite your fears as to their orthodoxy?—There was one young man, who, as I believe, entered my class an Arian. Before he entered he was a man advanced in life, and many of his friends were Arians. I believe he continues to be one.

Is he the only one of the twenty-eight you have any apprehension about?—I could not exactly

Examination of
Rev.
Dr. S. Hanna, D. D.
11 October 1825.

exactly say at the present moment: I believe he is. There was a young man, not of these twenty-eight, who, when he entered my class, leaned a little to the New Light. Whether he was an Arian I cannot tell, but while he was in my class he got very zealous for Calvinism. Afterwards a number of his friends got round him, and I believe he went back to his old opinions. He is removed from this country, and is now in England. I believe the English Arians find it very difficult to get young men for their congregations.

Is it consistent with your experience and observation, that any considerable proportion of young men educated in the Scotch Universities for the Irish Presbyteries have turned out Arians?—I would feel very delicate in speaking of other Universities; but allow me to refer to facts. There are Arian ministers in the north of Ireland: the Presbytery of Antrim have the reputation of being Arians. A considerable number of them, and some in the Synod of Ulster, have been taught in other colleges, and not here. The Arianism that is now in the north of Ireland has not originated in this seminary.

Have you any apprehensions upon your own mind, that the young men who are educated under the lectures of the professor appointed by the Seceding Synod, will turn out Arians?—Not the least.

Do you not then, in the circumstances of those who are to be the future ministers of the Irish Presbyteries, necessarily, or almost necessarily, passing through your course of lectures, or through the course of lectures delivered by the other divinity professor, see a well grounded reason for hope on your part, that Arianism must eventually greatly decrease from among the Presbyterian ministers of Ireland?—I think so; and I state it as a matter of decided conviction on my mind, that the whole tendency of the education of the young men in the divinity classes, and I may also say in the other classes, will lead them to Calvinism, and away from Arianism. I can appeal to the minutes of the Synod for proofs, and it is a fact not denied, that Arianism is decreasing.

We have understood, but judging only from public report, that an anxiety has been felt by the Synod of Ulster, lest the Belfast Institution should become the means of producing Arianism; will you explain how that feeling can be reconciled with the fact you have described?—There have been two professors elected lately in the Institution. One of them is known to be an Arian; the other is reputed to lean to Arianism, but what his religious opinions are I cannot say; but I can say, he is a very worthy man. In consequence of the election of these professors, some degree of jealousy arose, and some members of the Synod conceived it their duty to turn the attention of the public to the circumstance, and to guard against the establishment or preponderance of Arianism here.

Do you consider that the appointment of the only two divinity professors, resting with the respective Synods of Ulster and the Seceding Synod, is in itself a sufficient guarantee against any contingent possible mischief that might arise from the appointment of Arians to the other professorships?—I am not sure I would use so strong an expression as “a sufficient guarantee;” I am not sure if all the other professorships were in the hands of Arians, the students might not be tainted; but I have no apprehension that ever that can possibly take place in this Institution, from the manner in which the elections are conducted. At the present moment, while there are two professors, of whom report says, that we may consider they are Arians, or leaning to it, I am quite satisfied that those gentlemen would not interfere, in the least degree, with the opinions of the students, and that they have not interfered with them.

Do you not think, that the known circumstance of an Arian being appointed to that dignified and responsible situation, and thereby evincing a degree of confidence in him, has in itself a tendency to uphold those opinions in the eyes of uninformed young men?—I do not think that the mere circumstance of the appointment of a gentleman who is known to be an Arian, would affect very materially either the principles or the views of the young men, unless it was followed up by some other circumstances; the professors here give a public guarantee to each other and to the public, that they will not interfere with the religious opinions of the young men, except in the divinity classes; the professors confine themselves to the duties of their particular situations, and leave subjects connected with divinity to the Divinity Professors, and I am satisfied that there is no danger of Arianism at the present moment in the Belfast Institution.

Is not teaching the Hebrew language confined almost entirely to the holy Scriptures?—It must be so.

Supposing the Professor of Hebrew were an Arian, should you think there was any or no danger of his having almost necessarily, occasionally, an opportunity of instilling his principles into the minds of the students?—I think there is some danger; but our present Professor of Hebrew guards most cautiously against every thing that would have the appearance of leading to that; he simply teaches the language, and confines himself to this.

The Professor of Greek and Latin teaches the New Testament in Greek?—The Greek Testament is read in my class occasionally; the Professor of Greek leaves that to me.

Is that by any particular arrangement, or by the rules of the Institution?—I cannot say how it is; he leaves it to me. I believe it is not read in the Greek class, but I cannot say but that he may read it occasionally.

Does not the Professor of Moral Philosophy enter pretty much at large upon the subject of natural religion?—He must or should take up some of the subjects of natural religion, in his course.

May not the same thing be said, though in a less degree, of the Professor of Logic?—No, he has very little occasion to touch upon any subjects connected with those questions which are agitated in the religious world.

Do

Do you not consider that modern logic, meaning thereby an inquiry into the operations of the human mind, connects itself a good deal or leads a good deal to considerations connected with religious subjects, materialism and immaterialism for instance?—Yes, it may be considered connected with it.

Do you consider it a matter of indifference, whether the persons filling those professorships are correct in their religious principles, or the contrary?—I do not conceive it a matter of indifference; I can easily conceive a man in the moral philosophy chair might produce a considerable effect, and this has been sometimes the case in other places, but not here.

Might it not become so here?—It might.

Do you not conceive that the Professor of Logic might eventually become quite as dangerous?—No, I do not think, from the nature of the subjects taught in the course of logic, that any professor would have it in his power to do much harm.

Are you completely satisfied with the principles and the religious views of both the Professors of Moral Philosophy and Logic?—Mr. Cairns, the Professor of Logic, is a Seceder, and is a pious, excellent, worthy man; such is the opinion I form of him from all I have had an opportunity of seeing of him. Dr. Young attends my meeting house, and is a very warm supporter of the same system of religious truth which I hold, Calvinism.

Do you feel perfectly certain, that if those chairs had happened to be filled by able persons of very opposite sentiments, that your own success with your divinity class might not have been not quite so great as it has turned out to be?—I admit, I think there is a possibility, that if men of opposite sentiments and great zeal were in those chairs, it would make it much more difficult for a divinity professor to obtain the success he would otherwise have.

Should you consider the pledge you have stated to be given by the professors, on their appointment, to be a sufficient security against the possible improper proceedings of all future professors in those situations?—Yes; and in addition to that, the professors are bound by the strongest of all ties, their own interest; the man who would attempt to make proselytes would banish young men from his class.

If any instance of that kind was represented to the Managers of the Institution, would it not lead to his dismissal from his office?—Certainly, I conceive so.

If persons of any particular religious opinions, as for instance Arians, were excluded from any of the professorships, which professorships are not established with a view to divinity, do you or not think such an exclusion would be prejudicial to the interests of the Institution?—I think there may be professorships, where the rejection of a man, because he was an Arian, provided he was eminent in science and qualified to teach, would be an injury to the Institution. To exclude him merely because he was an Arian would be illiberal; a man of this kind might be established in the mathematical professorship; he could do very little hurt.

Do you or not conceive, that the principle of exclusion would be offensive to Arians in general, and persons of other denominations?—My opinion would be, that the principle of exclusion on account of any religious system, (I would not go so far as to say Atheism, but any Christian system, or any mode of church government,) would be to the detriment of the Institution.

Do you conceive that the respective Synods, the Synod of Ulster and the Seceding Synod, have, respectively, sufficient influence to secure sound principles in the pupils of the Institution, through the two professorships that exist under their own control and appointment?—I conceive they have very considerable influence, provided all they do is taken into account. In our Synod, before a young man enters his college course, according to the regulation of the Synod, the session and congregation he is connected with must know something of his piety; the minister must recommend him as a man of good morals. From the time he enters his presbytery, until the time at which he is licensed to preach, he is under continued inspection; every time he goes home from college, he is to be examined, and is put upon exercises appointed by the presbytery. These things bring young men under the eye of their presbyteries; this must give the Synod a very considerable influence over their young men, and over the formation of their habits. The continued inspection followed up here must have a considerable effect.

And thus afford an adequate guarantee for the soundness of their principles?—Yes, in a very considerable degree.

How many ministers are there in the Synod of Ulster?—Two hundred and two I find on the list.

What proportion of them, speaking generally, should you suppose to be Arians?—I do not think the Arians are very numerous in our Synod; I presume there are Arians; I think the majority are Calvinists.

Should you suppose there is any thing approaching to an equality that are Arians?—No; and then there may be a number that are Arminians.

Would you consider that the number of Arians, at any previous time, was greater than it is now?—My own opinion is, that the Arians are decreasing.

Should you suppose there are more or fewer than a fourth part of the Synod of Ulster, who are Arians at the present moment?—I never made any calculation of this, and I would be afraid to state any number; but among those who are not Calvinists, I would suppose there are a greater number Arminians than Arians.

Will you define what you mean by an Arminian minister, as contra-distinguished from the Calvinists and Arians?—I understand by them those who hold the Arminian doctrines.

Just state them briefly?—They differ in five points from the Calvinists. At the Synod of Dort, the distinction was marked; the Arminian tenets were brought forward at that Synod.

Examination of
Rev.
Dr. S. Hanna, D. D.
11 October 1825.

They respect the Fall of Man and the doctrine of Predestination; they hold what is called Conditional Election. On the doctrine of the Fall of Man, I may mention that they hold generally the depravity of human nature, but deny the imputation of the sin of Adam; another point respects the efficacy of Divine Grace in the conversion of a sinner; they also hold what has generally been called Universal Redemption; they say, that Christ died for all, and they deny the imputation of Christ's righteousness in the justification of believers; they also deny the final perseverance of the Saints. The Arminians make good works, qualifications or terms of acceptance, qualifications in consequence of which we entitle ourselves to the benefits of Christ's redemption, or terms upon which our acceptance depends.

Are we right in supposing that you yourself subscribe to all the doctrines contained in the Westminster Confession of Faith?—Yes.

You are, of course, acquainted with the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England?—Yes.

Are there any of those articles that relate to doctrines as contra-distinguished from Church government and discipline, from which you dissent?—There are none from which I dissent, if I might be allowed to understand them in my own way; but writers put different constructions upon them.

Do you find that any of the writers assign an interpretation to them upon which you are willing to accede to them?—Yes, according to the interpretation of some writers, I conceive the doctrines of the Church of England are the same as the doctrines of the Church of Scotland.

Differing from those who put an Arminian interpretation upon them, and agreeing with those who put a Calvinistic interpretation upon them?—Yes.

Do you conceive the majority of the ministers of the Synod of Ulster to be in opposition to the two classes of Arians and Arminians?—Yes; but I speak in a very general way upon that point, particularly as I am upon my oath. I have never made any calculation on the subject, though I have some means of making it; but there are members of the Synod whose religious opinions I do not know. They are at such a distance from me, I have had no means of knowing, except through friends, what their religious views are.

The Synod gave up subscription last year?—They did not insist upon it, as being absolutely necessary in all cases.

Before that, was it insisted upon?—It was a regulation of the Synod, but it was not followed up. There were Presbyteries that licensed young men without it.

Were there any particular circumstances that led to the alteration last year?—There was a circumstance; we have latterly been engaged for a series of years in preparing a code of discipline, and it was necessary to have a clear defined mode of practice to be followed by all the Presbyteries.

Was there much reluctance to subscription expressed by any of the Presbyteries?—In the Presbyteries that have not asked for subscription, there is a particular mode laid down in the code; that a young man is to give an account of his own religious sentiments to the Presbytery, and if they approve of it, they may license him. If he goes on trial, the people may have an opportunity of knowing what his sentiments are, the people to whom he is about to preach.

Is there not in all cases an examination of his principles and opinions?—In all cases there should be such an examination.

Does that examination refer to the question of Arianism?—It should refer to every thing in religious doctrine. The Presbytery appoint examiners, and they take up whatever subjects they think are of most importance; but they should take up every thing in religious doctrines. They should examine young men upon all religious doctrines, and see that they know the arguments on all sides.

Would the profession of Arianism be deemed a ground of exclusion in many of the Presbyteries?—I think it would in the Presbytery of Belfast, of which I am a member. We would not license any one professing Arianism.

Would it in any other Presbytery be the case?—Yes, it would in others. I will not say there would be none who would license them, but I think they would find a difficulty; they would be reluctant in doing it.

How many Presbyteries are there?—Fifteen now.

Do you conceive that in the majority of those Presbyteries, Arianism would be a ground of exclusion?—Yes, I would think so.

Do you conceive that in more than a majority of them, it would be the case; two-thirds for instance?—Unless I were to make a calculation, I could not say.

Do not some of the Presbyteries retain subscription?—Yes, they do.

How many?—I could not say without a calculation.

Do half the Presbyteries?—I could not exactly say.

You mentioned the Presbytery to which you belong, as one in which Arianism would be deemed a ground of exclusion?—Yes.

Does your Presbytery retain subscription?—We do.

Would it be a ground of exclusion in any Presbytery, in which subscription is not retained?—I do not know what kind of answer to give to that, for this reason, that in some of our Presbyteries where subscription was not enjoined, where I know they do not insist on subscription, they take such care to have the young men sound in principle, that our strongest advocates for Calvinism come out of the Presbyteries where the subscription was not insisted upon. I came from a Presbytery where subscription was not insisted upon.

Are

Are we right in inferring, that the consequence of subscription not being insisted upon in any particular Presbytery, is no ground for inferring that they are favourable to Arianism?—You are.

What is the principle upon which particular Presbyteries have given up subscription, if those Presbyteries mean to exclude persons who do not hold the principles to which the subscription applied?—I do not think that any Presbytery in the habit of insisting upon subscription has given it up, or will give it up; but this plan now adopted in the code is a plan that marks out a certain course when subscription is not insisted upon, that the Synod may have a guarantee that the principles of the young men shall be known to them, and that young men of improper principles may not be licensed.

Do you conceive that Arian principles would be deemed by the Synod a proper cause for exclusion?—I have already said, that some Presbyteries would not license young men of Arian principles. If any Presbyteries would license them, they are now required to have the principles of those young men written out, and ready to be called for.

Is it understood in the Synod, that the profession of Arianism shall be the ground of exclusion in any of the Presbyteries?—In some of the Presbyteries they would not make it a ground of exclusion.

It is one thing to consider the profession of Arianism as the principle of the Presbytery, and another to consider it the ground of exclusion from the Presbytery. Is the question, whether a man be an Arian or not, a question to be considered in those Presbyteries where subscription does not take place?—Yes, it is; there are Presbyteries where subscription does not take place, that I believe would not license Arians.

In many?—I cannot say how many.

Can you say what the reason was that the subscription did not take place?—Because it was not the universal practice, and because there was a conviction on the mind of many ministers, that there were other guarantees for soundness of principle besides mere subscription; and I believe there are those who do think there are other guarantees better than that. That men can swallow subscription, and yet when they were brought to some other test, errors in their principles would be detected.

If it be intended that parties may hold doctrines, which if they conscientiously did hold, they could not conscientiously subscribe, why is such subscription given up in that case except to admit those parties?—There are certain things that young men have scrupled at in subscribing the Westminster Confession of Faith. Very conscientious young men have found great difficulty in certain expressions, when they are exceedingly sound in the faith and excellent young men, and this was designed as a relief to them.

You conceive their objections were rather to the form of the expression, than to the substance of the thing expressed?—Yes, I would think so.

Does the Synod as a superior body, exercise any control over the proceedings of the Presbyteries in the matter of licensing?—Yes, surely; we have now a code of discipline; there is among us a subordination of courts; the Session is inferior to the Presbytery, and the Presbytery to the Synod; the Synod is the superior court, and may take cognizance of what passes in the inferior courts.

And they do exercise that control?—Yes, there are appeals to them, often.

Do you know of any of the present professors or masters in the Belfast Institution, holding strong political feelings tending to what is called Jacobinism?—No, I do not.

Are we to understand, that they are moderate and constitutional in their principles?—Yes, as far as I am acquainted with them; there may be shades of opinion upon some points; for instance, the Catholic Question; but I do not know one that holds any thing like what was called radical principles.

Can you state any well grounded opinion of your own, as to the total number of the Presbyterian population in the north of Ireland?—I have been attempting to make calculations upon that subject, and I have seen some of the calculations made by others. My own opinion is, that often the Presbyterians in the north of Ireland have been under rated, and the reason I think so, is taken from the circumstance that there are a number of the poorer classes seldom brought into view in calculations.

How many Presbyterians should you suppose are in the North of Ireland at the present time?—That is a matter of opinion; I would suppose about 700,000 in Ireland; there are very few out of Ulster.

What proportion do you conceive that bears to the general Protestant population of Ulster?—I think the Presbyterian population preponderates in Ulster among the Protestants.

Taken with reference to what you would conceive to be the general Protestant population of Ireland, which do you think preponderates?—The members of the Presbyterian church; but it is merely a general statement; I have had no means of making a calculation of other Protestants; I would be understood as not giving a very decided opinion.

Presbyterians very decidedly predominate in this neighbourhood?—Yes, and through Ulster.

Do you think that the election of one or more professors in the Institution, who do entertain Arian principles, would be a fair test, that the majority of electors entertain the same principles?—No, I do not think it would, because it may happen that a person of Arian principles may have a great many friends among the members of the Established Church; I know that was the case in a late election; members of this church, I believe, came forward and voted for a certain individual, but I would not say they were Arians.

Would the election of an Arian mark them with Arianism, any more than the election of a Calvinist would mark them with Calvinism?—I do not think it would.

Examination of
Rev.
Dr. S. Hanna, D. D.
11 October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
Dr. S. Hanna, D. D.
11 October 1825.

When you find Arians and Calvinists are elected, does it lead to the conclusion that neither are favoured in particular, but that neither are disfavoured?—Certainly, but there may be professors that are neither Arians nor Calvinists.

You were understood to say there was no difference between the articles of the Church of England and the Westminster Confession of Faith; looking at the twenty-sixth article, as to Baptism, do you agree with that?—I do not think the construction put upon it is the opinion of the greater part of the well informed of the Established Church.

You understand that doctrine in a sense conformable to the doctrines of the Church of Scotland?—Yes.

You also recollect the thirty-seventh article; as to the power of the civil magistrate, would the same observation apply to that?—That is not doctrinal.

Did we understand you aright, as expressing an opinion, that all professing Christians are either Unitarians, Arians, Calvinists or Arminians?—No, but I mentioned those were the points on which professing Christians formed different opinions, and by which the leading classes may be distinguished; so that while the different classes into which the religious world may be divided, may come under those four, there may be other shades that may not come under these.

Under which of those four classes should you think Martin Luther?—Under the denomination of Calvinists, taking the division in a general way.

Do you not think Arians may be ranked under the head of Unitarians?—No, there is a marked difference; they would not wish to be ranked as Unitarians.

Would you give Roman Catholics to either of the classes?—They have differed among themselves; I do not conceive there has been that unity of sentiment in the Roman Catholic Church which has been said.

As between Calvinism and Arminianism, to which would you assign Roman Catholics?—I think a number of Roman Catholics have been inclined to Arminianism, and others to Calvinism, and there have been very warm disputes in the Catholic Church upon some of the doctrines by which those are distinguished.

You would consider a Roman Catholic Jansenist as a Calvinist?—Yes.

Is there any matter, either as affecting your own situation, or the general interests of the Institution, you would wish to take this opportunity of stating to the Commissioners?—As it affects my own situation, I know of very little I would wish to state; but I would mention, the General Synod of Ulster have for a long time had a wish to have their young men educated at home, and their desire to have this is not a thing arising merely from the circumstance of the Belfast Institution having been formed here. So long ago as the reign of Charles the Second, Mr. Thomas Gowan, said to be a man of great learning and talent, taught philosophy and divinity at Antrim, and with considerable success, for many years. A Mr. John Hutchinson taught philosophy at Newtownards; and the Reverend James McAlpin taught philosophy at Killileagh; lectures were delivered on divinity at Belfast by the Reverend Mr. McBride, it is said with considerable celebrity in his day; latterly there was a seminary under Dr. Crawford at Strabane, in which some of the present Ministers of Synod received their education. I just state this to show, that the Synod of Ulster have had a wish to have home education for their young men, and that the thing is not an idea taken up by them on account of the establishment of the Belfast Institution.

The following STATEMENT shows the Number of Students attending Dr. Hanna's Lecture in each Session since his Appointment.

1st Session	1817-18	-	-	-	-	-	-	9	Students.
2d	— 1818-19	-	-	-	-	-	-	17	d°
3d	— 1819-20	-	-	-	-	-	-	11	d°
4th	— 1820-21	-	-	-	-	-	-	26	d°
5th	— 1821-22	-	-	-	-	-	-	29	d°
6th	— 1822-23	-	-	-	-	-	-	21	d°
7th	— 1823-24	-	-	-	-	-	-	20	d°
8th	— 1824-25	-	-	-	-	-	-	23	d°
9th, present Session.	1825-26	-	-	-	-	-	-	25	d°

Appendix, No. 8.

Further Examination of the Reverend Dr. Samuel Hanna, D. D.;
Wednesday, 12th October, 1825.

12 October 1825.

DO not the lectures delivered by the Professor of Moral Philosophy, necessarily embrace that range of subjects which were written on by David Hume, in his metaphysical disquisitions, and made by him the means of his attack on Christianity?—Yes, they do; they are taken up here, and in a moral philosophy course they are generally taken up. They were included in the course of moral philosophy, I heard from Mr. Arthur, of Glasgow.

Should you feel perfectly satisfied as professor of theology, if a person of precisely the same views upon religious subjects, and of equal talent to David Hume, now filled the chair of moral philosophy in the Belfast Institution?—I would not. I dislike Hume's opinions very very much, and differ from him very widely; I would be extremely sorry to know, that any person holding such sentiments as David Hume, did hold that office here or any where else.

223

Do you not think he might make that course of lectures subservient to the propagation of his own particular views, nay more, that he could hardly avoid it?—He might make his course of lectures subservient to his disseminating his own particular opinions.

Would you not prefer seeing that chair filled by an Orthodox professor?—Most certainly.

Should you consider it a matter of indifference, whether the professor of moral philosophy were an Orthodox Presbyterian or an Arian?—I think that the religious controversies between Arians and Calvinists, though they would come in some particulars in contact with the course of lectures upon moral philosophy, are distinct from it. They depend upon the views taken of the nature of the Son of God, and that does not come into a moral philosophy course.

Then are we to understand, you would wish for some safeguard against seeing a Deist in that situation, but not for an Arian?—I would prefer, as a matter of feeling, that the chairs of logic and moral philosophy should be filled, as they now are here, by persons of my own sentiments.

Are there any occasions upon which any professors, masters, or teachers of the Belfast Institution, employ extempore prayer in the hearing of the young men and boys?—Yes.

State those occasions particularly?—I am not acquainted with what is done in the schools; I cannot distinctly state, whether all the college classes may be opened by prayer, but I suppose that they are; my class is always opened with prayer. We have a meeting of all the students on Saturdays in the Common Hall, in which the professors who have been clergymen, generally pray as they are appointed, or in succession; sometimes they may pray in succession, or if some of them are not present, some other persons may take their place.

Are we to understand, that all the prayers referred to by you are extempore?—They are.

Do you consider, as a professor of theology, that the extempore prayers of an Arian will always be such as an Orthodox clergyman would like to join in?—I have gone myself to a place of worship, where I considered the clergyman to be an Arian, on charity sermon occasions. I have heard his prayers, and all his services, and sometimes with very considerable pleasure. In the religious body to which I belong, I have heard prayers from those members who were not reputed Calvinists, and I could join in them, both with pleasure and profit; and whether I would say, I would dislike to hear a prayer from an Arian, would be matter of great doubt with me.

The question is not, whether there is any abstract objection to joining in prayer with an Arian, but whether you think it probable, that the matter and words employed in the extempore prayers of an Arian, would be such as could be conscientiously employed in prayer by a person of Orthodox sentiments?—The Arian uses language that a Calvinist might use, but does not go the same length in introducing religious truths into his prayers. Very often he uses the same Scripture phrases which the Calvinist uses, but puts his own construction upon them; while he uses Scripture phrases Calvinists must approve of what is from Scripture, but there is no doubt that Arians do not go the length in prayers the Calvinists do.

Have you ever heard, that Arian prayers have, in point of fact, been delivered in the hearing of considerable numbers of persons attending the Belfast Institution, in which a conscientious Calvinist could not join?—I have heard a prayer from an Arian in the Institution, and I have heard that some of my brethren in the ministry made remarks on that prayer afterwards; but for my own part, I must say at the time the prayer was uttered, there was nothing in it I could consider as being in a marked manner offensive; it might not come up to what a Calvinist might wish.

Was there any thing in it inconsistent with the doctrines of a Calvinist?—Not that I observed; at the same time I could perceive it did not come up exactly to what a Calvinist would use, but there was nothing inconsistent or contradictory in it to Calvinism, which I could mark.

Would an Arian feel at liberty to address any sort of worship to our Saviour Jesus Christ?—Arians differ among themselves in that; as I observe you have heard of the distinction of High Arians and Low Arians, though I am not fond of it, I may mention, that Dr. Samuel Clarke, a High Arian, says Christ may be worshipped. The ancient Arians said there was a subordinate worship to be rendered to Christ, but they make a marked distinction between the worship to be given to Christ and that given to the Father. Arius said Christ might be worshipped.

Are you acquainted with the books or works given as premiums to the students at the Institution in general?—Yes, I am, generally.

Have you ever known any works that particularly favour Arianism, given as premiums by any of the professors and masters?—Yes; and there has been a great deal of discussion upon that subject. Premiums of that kind were given by Mr. McEwen. I was at the time from home, for the purpose of preaching a sermon for the London Missionary Society. I was not present when those premiums were given. I understood afterwards, that Mr. McEwen, (who is not a professor, he is a non-descript in the Institution,) I understood, he had given as premiums Dr. Price's sermons, and some other works; I believe some book of prayers. The thing made a great deal of noise. I certainly felt, when I came home, very much disobliged that he should give those books, and the thing was mentioned in our Synod. He made such an explanation, and said the thing would not be done again, that I considered the Synod was satisfied. But the matter has been referred to afterwards.

Examination of
Rev.
Dr. S. Hanna, D. D.
12 October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
Dr. S. Hanna, D. D.
12 October 1825.

How long ago is it that the thing occurred?—I cannot exactly state the year I preached for the London Missionary Society; it is about three years ago, about the year 1822.

Was it soon after Mr. Snelhurst came round?—I believe it was.

Have you heard of any similar occurrence since?—No; I am satisfied no such thing would take place again, because the Faculty have taken measures to prevent it.

Was there any censure passed upon the person who distributed those works?—I am not aware that any body had the power of censuring him. He is not a member of the Faculty, nor a member of the Synod; but the matter was brought forward in the Synod, and he gave an explanation that appeared quite satisfactory.

Mr. M^c Ewen is not a member of the Faculty of this Institution?—No.

Nor a permanent member of the Institution in any sense?—He is a non-descript; he neither belongs to the Faculty nor the board of Teachers.

Is he merely a lecturer?—The boards give him leave to lecture on elocution in the Institution.

Does he receive any stipend?—No.

Does not he, in point of fact, teach in the Institution?—Yes, he teaches elocution; but there are certain teachers appointed by the board of managers. He is not one of them.

Is he not a visitor of the Institution at this moment?—Yes, I believe he is.

Do you think it a good principle, that persons not clothed with the character of teachers, should nevertheless teach in the Institution, who are entirely exempted from all control, whether from Managers, Visitors, or Members of the Faculty?—No, I do not think it a good principle.

Did the Institution express any opinion upon the act referred to in a former question, that is the act of giving those works as a premium?—I do not think it ever came before them; I do not know in what shape it could come before them as a body, nor do I know that they ever did take it up.

Suppose you thought proper so to do, might you not bring the subject under the consideration of the Faculty, and might not the Faculty, upon being made acquainted with the circumstance, refuse to permit that person to continue his lectures?—The Faculty have not the rooms in their power.

What power or authority exists in the Institution, which could refuse the continuance of those rooms?—The joint boards.

If the act were brought under the consideration of those boards, and the boards did not receive a satisfactory explanation, might they not refuse the permission to lecture in the Institution?—Most certainly, as I think.

But, in point of fact, this occurrence never was brought under the cognizance of the boards?—I never heard of its being brought under their cognizance.

You mention that some precaution was taken to prevent the repetition of a similar occurrence; what was the nature of that precaution?—It will be seen in the minutes of the Faculty, which will be submitted to you; there was an understanding, I believe, among the members of the Faculty upon the subject, but I could not state exactly what it was. I believe it was, that the books to be distributed as premiums should be submitted to the examination of the members of the Faculty, that we should know what kind of books were about to be given.

Has that been put in practice?—I believe it has very much; I believe there has been an attention to the books to be given out since that time.

Do you know whether any of the professors make it a practice to declare that they are themselves Arians, in the presence of their pupils?—I believe not; I state this to you on the firm conviction of my own mind, that none of the professors would tamper with the religious opinions of the pupils. I consider Mr. Hincks a very worthy man; what his religious sentiments are I presume not to know; I am sure he would never interfere with the religious principles of the pupils, and I may say the same thing of Mr. Bruce. Besides the agreement we enter into, there is the self-interest of every individual to bind him.

Mr. Hincks is Professor of Hebrew?—He is.

Do you think that the Arian and Orthodox Presbyterian would explain the same words "Adonai" and "Elohim" in a manner reconcileable with each other?—I have stated that I do not think the Professor of Hebrew has much occasion to interfere with religious opinions; and as to "Adonai" there is very little stress to be laid upon that, but on "Elohim" there is. I am satisfied that Mr. Hincks chuses to keep clear of expressing any thing like a religious opinion; he states the different opinions held respecting the words.

In point of fact does not the translation of the word "Elohim," whatever it may be, involve the whole dispute between the Arians and their opponents?—I would not rest the whole dispute upon that; it may bear upon it; but I think too great stress has been laid upon it by some writers. I conceive, in the general argument, we have such a concatenation of proofs, that I think it weakens the argument to fly to a thing of that kind, and rest upon it.

The question is this, whether a true and conscientious Arian Professor of Hebrew, could assign to the word "Elohim" such a translation as the Orthodox Presbyterian could receive as genuine?—My opinion is, that a Professor of Hebrew that might be of Arian principles, might explain the meaning of the word "Elohim," and at the same time not interfere with the religious principles of his pupils, as he could make them understand the word without interfering with their principles.

Would it not give him an opportunity of doing so if he were disposed?—Yes; and he might take such an opportunity, not from that word only, but many other words that he

he might lay hold on, for the purpose of making proselytes in explaining the Hebrew language.

Do you think it right that a possibility should be left open of a zealous Arian being a teacher of Hebrew?—I would say as I did before, that I would rather see a Calvinist or an Orthodox man Professor of Hebrew; but I have no fears from the present professor.

We beg distinctly to be understood, as not alluding to the present professors, but the possibility of any future ones?—I would rather see such chairs filled by Orthodox men.

Is there not something in the character of the lectures that ought to be delivered by the Hebrew Professor, that makes it dangerous for a conscientious Arian to deliver them?—I would much rather see an Orthodox Professor in the Hebrew chair and the Greek chair; but I do not think that there are great opportunities afforded in teaching the Hebrew language, even for a man that might wish to give Arian constructions; and though I mention my wish that they should be filled with Orthodox men, I do not think they would have such opportunities as a person not acquainted with the languages would suppose. I know there is a difference of opinion existing upon those points. I heard Mr. Young, Professor of Greek, in Glasgow, and I can now state, that I did not know what his religious principles were when I left his class.

Have not the peculiar controversies between the Arians and their opponents been rested in a considerable degree, upon what may be the true meaning of certain prepositions in the Greek language?—Yes, the meanings of certain prepositions have been brought forward in the arguments; but as I mentioned before, I do not think that those who support the Orthodox system rest upon any one class of arguments; they take in the whole concatenation of proofs together, and I am always sorry when I find too much stress laid upon any one class.

You do not mean to say, that the meaning of Greek words is indifferent in the argument between the two parties?—No, by no means; I am quite aware of this, that a number of religious controversies must be determined by the construction which is put upon certain Scripture phrases.

We need hardly ask, whether you consider it as a matter of indifference, whether the Professor of Greek assigns to those words the interpretation the Arians assign, or the interpretation which the Orthodox have assigned?—No, by no means.

Must he not necessarily assign one meaning or the other?—If he does not lecture upon the Greek Testament, he will have very little opportunity of bringing forward the meaning of words from other Greek authors, so as to affect religious opinions.

Is not the Greek Testament used in the class?—I believe not in the Greek class; it is for that reason I take it up.

Why is it excluded from the Greek class?—You will hear that from Mr. Bruce himself, I suppose; probably one of the reasons may be, he feels the delicacy of his situation. He is known not to entertain the same religious opinions I do, and he would wish to avoid every occasion of persons alleging he was interfering with the opinions of his students. That may be one reason; but I apprehend he does not consider it the most suitable book to be put into the hands of pupils of that class, and he may have reasons why he thinks other books are better.

Which of the two systems would you think the preferable one, that an Orthodox Professor of Greek should, in his lectures, advert to the Greek Testament, or that there should be an Arian Professor of Greek, avoiding the Greek Testament?—I would prefer seeing all the chairs filled by Orthodox professors.

You referred to the late Professor of Greek at Glasgow; had you any reason to suppose afterwards he entertained Arian opinions?—No, but I heard it alleged by sound members of our Synod, that he did bring forward a certain explanation of some of the prepositions that were in favour of Calvinistic principles.

If giving lectures upon the Greek Testament would afford the Arian an opportunity of propagating his doctrines, would it not equally afford a person whom you considered Orthodox an opportunity of propagating his doctrine against the Arian?—Yes, and I use it in this way to strengthen my arguments. I put the students upon different exercises, in addition to the course of theology, as we can get opportunities of doing them. I put them upon reading portions in the Greek Testament occasionally.

Would it be consistent with the character of an Institution, in which persons of all religious principles are to be educated, putting aside the theological branch of the Institution, that any professor should take advantage of his situation to inculcate in the mind of his pupils his own religious sentiments?—He would be very unworthy of his office if he did.

Would it not be as improper for an Orthodox professor to counteract the Arian, through the means of his chair, as for an Arian to counteract an Orthodox, through the means of his chair?—If an Orthodox man was in the chair, and he was taking advantage of bringing forward his doctrines at all times, he would be departing from the line of his duty.

Then, upon the same principle upon which an Arian may be willing that an Orthodox person should fill the chair, should not an Orthodox person be willing that an Arian should fill the chair, in order to preserve a spirit of neutrality?—That would be what would appear fair, but all Orthodox men have a great leaning to their own sentiments.

The question is not put as to the feeling in your own breast, but as to your opinion of what ought to be done in an Institution the principle of which is equality?—I do not think the chair should be made a place in which the Professors should introduce controversies that do not come before them. Every chair should confine itself to the particular duties incumbent upon it.

Examination of
Rev.
Dr. S. Hanna, D. D.
12 October 1825.

Do you not think, that confining the chairs to persons of particular religious principles would imply, that those religious principles were to be inculcated from those chairs?—Yes, I would think so, understanding by the chairs, all the chairs; and will you give me leave to mention, that the view I take of Calvinism or Orthodoxy is not that it should be tremblingly afraid of every discussion that may take place. I am disposed to court discussion, because I think the establishment of truth would arise from it. I would also think, that in a liberal institution, where there would be a terror displayed, of allowing men to come in who would differ a little from the known standards of the Churches at the time, that it would not be consistent with the duties which the Governors of such an Institution would owe to the public, the seminary, and the pupils.

Will you state succinctly the rise and the progress of the connection that at present subsists between the Synods and the Belfast Institution?—I shall not be able to give you an account of the connection between the Seceding Synod and the Institution. I will attempt to lay before you such particulars as will enable you to have the subject of the connection between our Synod and the Institution entirely before your view. By referring to what is upon the Minutes of the Synod, and the Minutes of the Boards, and the Minutes of the Faculty, you will find there the original documents, or copies of them.

We would be obliged to you to state shortly, in the way of evidence, the substance of those Minutes?—I find, in looking into the Minutes of the Synod, that in the year 1809, a letter had been received by the Synod from the Managers of the Belfast Academical Institution, which Mr. Thomson and I were appointed to answer. I find in the Minutes of 1810, that Mr. Thomson and I read our answer to the above letter, and Mr. Henry was instructed to inform the Managers, that the Synod will be happy to take any plan into their consideration which may be submitted to them, whereby they can promote the interests of the Institution. I find again, in the Minutes of the Synod, that in 1811 a letter was presented to the Synod from the Chairman of the Board of Visitors, accompanied by the Act of Incorporation. In the Minutes of this meeting, Messrs. Hanna and Henry are instructed to express the satisfaction of the Synod at the progress the Institution has made. In 1813 Mr. Thomson presented a letter from the Managers and Visitors, and a Committee was then appointed by the Synod, to confer with the Managers and Visitors of the Institution, on the best means of promoting the interest of the Belfast Academical Institution. In 1814, at a meeting of the Synod, there was a Report from this Committee, and certain Resolutions were entered into by the Synod, in consequence of their recommendation. I consider this for my own part as the basis, or opening at least, of the connection between the Institution and the Synod, for they at that time recommended the Synod to consider the expediency of establishing a Professorship of Divinity. At that meeting, Dr. Ure's appointment to the chair of Moral Philosophy was announced to the Synod. It was also mentioned to the Synod, that the Board had the expectation of obtaining the Government grant. The grant was given shortly after the meeting of the Synod in 1814; then in 1815, the Synod unanimously agreed to establish a Professorship of Divinity and Church History in the Belfast Academical Institution, and a Committee was appointed to carry this into execution, and different measures were adopted for that purpose, which you will find in the Minutes of the Synod. From the Minutes of the Boards, and the Minutes of the Faculty, you will learn the times at which the different professors were appointed; but you may observe, that the connection between the Synod and the Institution was not completely established until there was a Government grant, because it was a kind of pledge to the Synod that the Institution should obtain the countenance of Government.

At what time was the first Professor of Theology appointed by the Synod of Ulster?—I have already mentioned to you, that it was in 1817.

Do you consider there was any effective connection between the Synod of Ulster and the Institution, prior to that appointment?—The Synod's students in philosophy were taught here before that time.

Where were they taught their theology?—They could not be regularly taught any where; they were in expectation of having a Professor of Theology. According to the rules of the Scotch Colleges, a young man who has not received his education in philosophy in their own philosophical classes, will not be regularly enrolled in the divinity class, and therefore it became necessary, if the young men from the Synod of Ulster received their education in philosophy here, that there should be a Divinity Professor.

Then we are to collect from your answers, that philosophy is considered indispensable in the education of students for the ministry of this country?—Clearly so; there is a curriculum of education marked out for the students of the Synod of Ulster, that I could show you from the code of regulations.

[The witness was directed to furnish the same.]

We collect there are at present two distinct objects of the Belfast Institution; one the supply of education to people generally, and the other affording the means of education in particular for the Presbyterian ministers; which of these two objects do you consider the most important, supposing, but not implying, that it was necessary to make a choice between them?—My own opinion is, that the collegiate department of the Institution is by far of the greatest importance in this part of Ireland, not merely as affording an education to professional students, but giving a general tone to the education of youth in this country. I conceive, what we wanted was an education of a higher kind than we had before here; that the kind of education given in this country wanted, in tone and extent, what is necessary to open the human mind, and prepare it to seek more extensive information; to impart to it extensive knowledge. My own opinion is, that it is in consequence of the facilities facilities afforded in Scotland of getting those advantages, with some other things, as their habit of reading the Scriptures, that the Scotch character has taken such a lead. I conceive, in the north of Ireland, nothing could be of such importance to society, to the progress of civilization, and to the general improvement of the country, as giving an extended education, such as would open the human mind for understanding fully the general subjects of science.

Have you any decided impression upon your own mind, as to the tendencies of the Belfast Institution to improve or weaken the spirit of friendly attachment, that ought to exist between the two countries of Great Britain and Ireland?—My opinion is, that the establishment of the Belfast Institution has tended rather to increase the attachment than otherwise to the sister kingdom, and that the spirit of loyalty has been a good deal supported, in consequence of the Government grant to the Belfast Institution.

Will you explain a little more particularly what you mean by your last answer?—I conceive that the establishment of this Institution and the grant of Government to it were exceedingly acceptable to the people of the North, and that the grant attached a great number of people very much to the Government of the country.

Do you think the renewal of the Government grant now, would produce a similar effect?—I do.

Do you conceive there is any considerable extent of a spirit of disaffection to the Government, or towards the British connection, at present prevalent in Belfast or its vicinity?—I do not; quite the contrary since I came here, which was in the latter end of the year 1799. I think there has been a growing attachment to our sister kingdom, and an increase in the attachment to the constitution.

Are we to collect from your answer, that at the period of your first coming here there was any considerable degree of disaffection existing?—I came here the year after the insurrection in this country, and there had been a very considerable feeling against Government, as was universally known.

Are we to collect, that you consider the spirit of disaffection was never so small, nor the spirit of proper constitutional loyalty never so great, as at the present moment?—As far as respects this part of Ireland, I think the ministers who are at present conducting the affairs of the nation are popular here, and particularly esteemed by those best conversant in these matters, so far as my knowledge extends.

Have you been struck by any remarkable increase in the industry and prosperity of Belfast within a very late period?—Yes.

Will you explain to what period you particularly refer?—I would refer to the period of five years back; I would not be very particular upon that.

Did you ever know the people to be so generally employed and so industrious as at present?—Yes, a considerable number of years ago, when there was very good trade here, about 1814 or 1815, the people were very generally employed; I think there were no hands idle at that time.

Are there any hands idle at present?—I do not know any in any department.

Do you think any young men attend the divinity lectures who are not intended for the ministry?—Not any.

Then at least you may say, that any that are found attending the divinity lectures are intended for the ministry?—Yes.

And of course you would consider there are a great number attending the philosophy and other classes, who will eventually come to be added to the number?—Yes.

You were acquainted no doubt with the situation of those students from Ireland who were in the habit of attending the Scotch Colleges, and the manner in which their plan of education was conducted; is it not your opinion, that many of them laboured under a very considerable disadvantage in going to a foreign place, and also in the expence of maintaining themselves there?—Yes, I am of opinion they laboured under considerable disadvantages; and from the mode of education here, I am also of opinion that a great spirit of emulation is excited among the young men; even this is not all; it is now impossible for a young man to pass through our classes without attending to his business; and there is a disposition here, if a young man does not show sufficient talent, not to allow him to get forward.

Might it not have happened in the Scotch Colleges, that the student was unable, partly from expence and other causes, to remain the whole period of the College session?—I would wish not to speak disrespectfully of the Scotch Colleges, but when I attended, a student might go through a class, and not know much of the business of the class, and learn it before the close of the session.

Might he not obtain certificates of attending a certain number of sessions, when his attendance had only been very partial?—Yes; I have known instances of that.

With whom do the divinity students generally reside in Belfast, while attending the collegiate lectures?—They generally take lodgings; they either take a lodging and board themselves, or take board and lodging in houses in the town.

With what class of persons do they generally board and lodge?—With those who keep the boarding and lodging houses; but I think there is one advantage the divinity students have here they have not in Scotland; there are no students that come here to study that have not friends who are acquainted with some people at Belfast, and they are invited to the houses of private families; I am of opinion that our young men are much improved in their manners and appearance, in consequence of their studying here; I believe that will be acknowledged to be a fact, by those who know what the young men were from the Scotch Colleges, and what they now are from our Institution.

Examination of
Rev.
Dr. S. Hanna, D. D.
12 October 1825.

What is your opinion of the moral conduct of those young men while attending in Belfast?—I think it is very good; and I consider this circumstance as being of some importance to the students; from my connections through the different parts of the town, I can, whenever I choose to do it, make myself intimately acquainted with the private conduct of every student belonging to my class; I have so many acquaintances in different parts of the town, that I can know every thing in the private conduct of the students.

What proportion of the divinity students would you say you knew fell into vicious courses?—There was only one student since my appointment that was stopped in his progress by his Presbytery, in consequence of habits of drinking; there has been another that has not come forward, not because he was tired, but because his friends dissuaded him from proceeding, whose conduct was not such as it ought to have been; he declined to come forward, merely because he found he was under such a vigilant inspection that he could not escape.

Is there that sort of vigilant inspection over the young men in Belfast, that they could hardly be engaged in vicious courses without its being known?—I think so.

Was that the case in the Scotch Universities?—I think not; it was impossible that could be the case there. We went there strangers; some few of us might have had letters of introduction with us; we remained generally all the time of our College course, strangers. The professors knew little of us, or of our lodgings.

How many Presbyterian congregations are there in the town of Belfast?—There are two belonging to the Synod of Ulster, two belonging to the Presbytery of Antrim, and two belonging to the Seceders.

In how many of those are the sentiments you consider to be Orthodox taught, and in how many do the Arian sentiments prevail?—One of my pupils is in the fourth congregation, where there was before a man who was not I believe Orthodox in his sentiments; my student is, I believe, Orthodox in his sentiments, so that the two belonging to the Synod may be considered as of the same opinion; I mention this as one proof of the increase of Calvinism; that in what was reputed to be a New Light congregation, in the town of Belfast, there is now an Evangelical minister; the Seceders and Orthodox; Dr. Bruce is an Arian, an avowed Arian; he published a book on the subject. What Mr. M'Ewen's sentiments are I do not know; I have heard that he differs from Dr. Bruce, and that his Presbytery also do not accord with the Doctor's sentiments.

What may be the extent of Dr. Bruce's congregation, as compared with your own?—As many people generally attend my congregation as attend the other three, Mr. Bruce's, Mr. M'Ewen's and Mr. Bellis's, in Donegal-street. I cannot be very particular in such a thing, but I suppose there are.

Could you say to which church the majority of the young men attending the College go?—The young men in my class come to my meeting-house. I billet them out in different pews among my hearers. I will not say they do not go elsewhere; but I believe a number do attend very constantly. In the other classes the young men come to me, and I place them among my hearers also. If a young man comes to board in Mr. Hincks's, or Mr. Montgomery's, whose friends wish him to attend my meeting-house, I get him some place with my friends.

What becomes of those young men, students, whose friends do not point out any particular place of worship for them to attend?—I believe Mr. Montgomery has a pew in Mr. Bellis's meeting-house; where Mr. Hincks's young men go, I do not know.

Do you think that the Presbyterian clergy of the north of Ireland, as a class, have a feeling of attachment or otherwise, to the present Government?—I consider the Presbyterian clergymen are attached to the present Government. I consider them as loyal a body of men as are to be found among His Majesty's subjects.

Which do you consider the most important part of the Belfast Institution, the general instruction of the young men of the place in classical and mercantile information, or the preparation of young men for the ministry?—I state decidedly, that my opinion is, that the collegiate department is of the greatest importance in the north of Ireland, and I will be able to satisfy you all that that is the case. There are a number of very excellent academies for giving education in different places. There is in some of them a kind of course of logic taught; but when the pupils receive all the information given there, what will give to the young mind the extended education I was speaking of before; are they to be left in the north of Ireland without access to that education that opens the human faculties, and prepares them for a higher degree of knowledge, and a higher station in society.

We observe in some of the documents laid before us, a wish expressed by some of the managers, that collegiate privileges should be given to the students; will you state what you understand by that?—The power of granting degrees to a certain extent. I do not think until this seminary becomes more extended, it could be expected that collegiate privileges should be granted unlimitedly. It could not be expected there should be a privilege of giving degrees in medicine, when there was not a sufficient curriculum of education in medicine. But where there is sufficient means of education, to give the power of granting the degree of master of arts, it would aid the interests of the Institution materially to grant this privilege.

Is it meant that it should extend to conferring degrees in divinity?—I suppose it would be a desirable thing if the College could grant degrees in divinity, though my own opinion is, that it should be very sparingly exercised.

Is any thing else meant by collegiate privileges?—No, I do not think there could be any thing else.

Examination of
Rev.
Dr. S. Hanna, D. D.
12 October 1825.

Do you consider that a degree would be of more importance and carry greater weight with it, than the general certificate given by the faculty?—It could not do so with the Synod at home; but I trust in a short time, if the Institution should be fostered, we shall be able to train up young men for distant places, and I hope that it will become useful to the world.

What places?—Particularly America. There is a great want of young men for the ministry there; and if our students could carry out with them a degree in arts, it would be of great use to them. The people in distant places will not know what a general certificate means.

Is it your impression, if you had the power of granting degrees, there would be any resort to the Belfast Institution from Scotland, by young men for the Scotch ministry?—There could not be for the Scotch ministry; for I believe the regulations of the Scotch church are such, that they could not receive an education out of the Scotch colleges; but we are already getting young men from England. In my opinion it would be a matter of great importance, if this Institution was established on an extended scale, so as to benefit England. My opinion is, that this Institution might be of very great service to English students. I am of opinion, that the education the young men get in the academies supported by the Independents, is of a very limited and partial extent.

Are there any young men now in education for the Independents?—There are two; and if this Institution is fostered, we should get a very considerable number; at least I have that expectation upon my mind, that this would be the case, in consequence of the great advantages we offer.

In point of fact, where are the young men who subsequently become Independent ministers, now educated?—In certain seminaries in England.

Not in Scotch universities?—No, very few go there.

Could you name a few of those seminaries?—Gosport is one; Hoxton is another; but there is a number of them.

Is there any place in Ireland where young men are trained for the Independent Ministry?—Yes, in Dublin. It is under a society in London; the reverend David Stuart is the professor of divinity, and one of the Mr. Cooper's, the classical teacher. There is a number of young men trained up for the Independent Church in that place.

Is it your opinion, that the Belfast Institution would afford greater facilities for education than the seminaries you are referring to?—Most undoubtedly; I think there can be no comparison whatever between the curriculum of education there and ours.

Would the Independents feel any doctrinal objections to their young men being educated by such Presbyterian professors as Dr. Edgar and yourself?—My own opinion is, that they would not; and I infer this from what we have in another body of people here, that we call Covenanters; they call themselves the Reformed Presbytery. That religious body have sent some of their young men to me; they are a very Calvinistic body, and they have full confidence in sending their young men to me, and I believe feel no hesitation in putting them under the Professor of Hebrew.

Are you conscious of any doctrinal differences between yourself and the Independents?—None in point of religious doctrine; that is, with the great body of Independents, for there are, it is said, New Light Independents in England. I am led to understand, that there are some who do not hold the Calvinistic opinion, but a great many Independents do; so that we agree in doctrine.

Are we to infer that the great body of Independents, and the Presbyterians, agree in omnibus in matters of doctrine?—I think so.

And that all their differences are confined to matters of church discipline?—Yes.

Do you extend the same observation to the Covenanters?—Yes, they are Calvinists.

Do they renew the solemn league and covenant?—They do.

Is it your opinion, that a large majority of the Independents would be equally ready as yourself, to assent to all the doctrinal matters in the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England?—I would think so, always putting the construction I mentioned upon them.

As there are two constructions put upon them, you must give us the Calvinistic construction. But still assuming that construction, which you believe to be really put upon them by a considerable proportion of the ministers of the Church of England?—Yes, there are writers of the Church of England who put that construction on them. I beg to understand the thirty-nine articles in the way the Calvinists understand them.

The question, is whether the articles do not admit, and fairly admit of an interpretation, which being given, you have no objection to them?—That is my opinion, and I think the original framers of the articles had those opinions in their eye; that is the opinion I have formed.

Have you read the authorized Homilies of the Church of England?—Yes.

Do you conceive the exposition there given is Calvinistic?—I do.

Cannot you recollect any doctrine in the Homilies you dissent from?—No; but there are some minor points I noticed, when I was reading them, I could not agree with; but they are of minor importance.

Do you remember any thing in the Homilies, touching the divine right of Kings and the Lord's anointed?—I do not consider that as a matter of religious doctrine, or of Scripture truth.

Appendix, No 9.

Examination of the Reverend William Bruce, B. A., of Trinity College, Dublin;
Wednesday, 12th October, 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
William Bruce, B. A.
12 October 1825.

WILL you state the situations you at present fill, connected with the Belfast Institution?
—I am Professor of the Greek and Latin languages.

Nothing else?—No.

At what time were you appointed to that situation?—In October 1821.

The situation refers exclusively to the collegiate department?—Exclusively.

Will you describe in what manner you were recommended to the consideration of the electors upon that occasion; by what testimonials?—I received testimonials from Dr. Lloyd, my tutor in college, and from the Rev. Mr. Robinson, a fellow, whom I knew, and Mr. Kennedy. I was known to the majority of the electors, from having been a principal teacher in an academy under my father, for several years.

By an academy you mean a private seminary, kept by your father?—It was erected by subscription, and was under the government of a president and trustees; but my father was the principal for thirty years, and there were other masters appointed by him, and always without reference to religious distinctions.

Does your father continue to conduct that seminary?—He does not.

Does it exist at present?—Yes.

Under whom?—Mr. Gray.

It is perfectly distinct from the Belfast Institution?—Yes.

Was there any competition upon the occasion of your election?—There were other candidates.

Did you personally solicit the support of the several electors?—I have no recollection that I asked a single individual; there were some of them my personal friends; they had spoken to me on the subject, and might have spoken to others, but not at my request.

Are you aware whether there was any thing like an active canvas on the part of the several candidates, or their friends?—I do not know whether it was more than usual. I do not know that they were all here to call upon the electors, but I suppose their friends interested themselves for them.

Are you aware, whether there was any political influence exercised upon that occasion?—There was a statement in the paper of speeches made at the time of the election, but I have no knowledge of what took place, except by that means.

Speeches by whom?—The speeches of the electors, recommending the different candidates, as they came in course of nomination, I believe; but I was not present, nor do I know any thing of it, except what I saw in the papers at the time; but I did not wish influence of any kind to be used, nor was success a subject of any further anxiety, than that every one wishes to succeed in an object he undertakes.

Will you state the emoluments attached to your situation?—There is a salary of 50*l.* a year, and the fees of the students; the fee for attending the Greek class alone is two guineas for the session; if they take the Greek and Latin jointly, it is three guineas for the two.

The Latin singly?—It would be two guineas, but there has not been any one attending Latin without attending Greek.

What may the fees amount to in a year?—I believe about 62 guineas, or 70*l.* on the average of the four years.

Do those two sources constitute the sole means of remuneration for the professor?—Yes, the sole.

Do you receive any young men who attend the Belfast Institution, as boarders, in your domestic establishment?—No; I would not have them in my family; it would not answer my domestic arrangements, and they would not be able to afford what would be any compensation to me; they generally live in small houses, in other parts of the town.

Does your class comprehend any of the individuals who, at the same time, are attending the divinity lectures, with a view to the ministry?—They must all attend me a considerable time before they can attend the divinity lectures, according to the rule. I have not, to my knowledge, had any that were at the same time attending the divinity class.

Are we to understand, that the curriculum of their education requires they should have attended a course of Greek and Latin under your care, before they commence their course under the divinity lecturer?—The regulation of the Synod is so; the divinity chairs are entirely under the regulation of their respective Synods; but the routine is, to go through an under-graduate course, as it would be called in Dublin, before they attend any divinity lectures.

Have you a cure of souls?—Yes.

Where?—In this town.

Your congregation belongs to the Presbytery of Antrim?—Yes.

We understand that the Synod of Ulster, and the Seceding Synod, are each of them represented by a Divinity Professor in the Institution?—Yes.

And we collect, that the Presbytery of Antrim is not so represented?—No.

Will you describe in what manner the young men intended for the ministry in the Presbytery of Antrim, are instructed for the ministry?—We would at any time adopt young men intended for the ministry from other presbyteries; we make their education complete, if not finished before. If they come under our care for education, they attend an under-graduate course in the Institution, or elsewhere, and after that, we prescribe a course of reading, reading, principally the critical reading of the New Testament; that is the principal course of reading, with the Evidences, and Ecclesiastical History.

231

A young man intended for the ministry in the Presbytery of Antrim, and selecting the Belfast Institution as the theatre for his education, would he attend either the course of lectures delivered by Dr. Hanna or by Dr. Edgar?—It would be at his option; we would take care that he was acquainted with the New Testament, critically, and with those branches we thought essential, but it would be at his option to attend either or both.

Or neither?—Or neither.

It would constitute no sort of objection to him, his having attended either of those courses?—None.

No objection in point of rule or of feeling?—No, we have no objection to inquiry on all sides.

Would the Presbytery feel it necessary to superadd some instructions in divinity besides what they might hear in those courses?—Nothing; we merely ascertain that they are competent to understand the Scriptures. We have no text-book of divinity for them, and according to our principle, the Scriptures are our only rule of faith and worship. We do not object to any that adopt the Scriptures as their guide.

Would the Presbytery of Antrim, in the case of young men so educated, feel it necessary to superadd any particular oral instruction in religious matters, or would they take them as they found them?—Take them as we find them; we have always been in the habit of doing so, and most of our congregations are filled by young men who have come from Synodical Presbyteries.

Is there any particular trial of his qualifications deemed necessary by the Presbytery of Antrim; any certificates he may have received from the particular professors, more especially those of divinity?—He is appointed certain books to read every quarter, and is examined strictly on those, and then tried as to his competency to compose; but if it is doctrinal instruction that is meant, there is no oral doctrinal instruction, nor are the books such as to give any influence to his mind, one way or another, on controverted doctrines.

Are the books the same or different from what would be offered to him by Dr. Hanna or Dr. Edgar?—I cannot say what books they would offer, but they are such as Butler's Analogy and Paley's Evidences, and Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History.

It has been stated to the Commissioners, that there are some peculiarities of doctrine that distinguish the Presbytery of Antrim from the Synod of Ulster, generally. We should be obliged to you to explain how that is, and what it is?—Our only bond of union is to acknowledge the Scriptures only, and each minister is at liberty to form the best opinion he can of the doctrines contained in the Scriptures. I believe, in point of fact, there are not any of the present ministers of the Presbytery of Antrim, Trinitarians; but at the original formation of it in the year 1725, there were Trinitarians; I cannot say whether they were all so.

How many ministers does the Presbytery of Antrim at present contain?—Ten.

Is it your impression, that there is not so much as one Trinitarian among that number?—I do not know of one; I might say I am pretty sure there is not one.

The Commissioners have seen a book, published within the last year by your father, in the preface of which it is stated, "The doctrines recommended in these sermons are the same as were formerly inculcated by those eminent ministers, Haliday and my grandfather, Drennan and Brown, Mackay and Crombie; and lastly, by myself and my son, with such variations as must be expected in men neither shackled by subscriptions, nor guided by formularies;" without descending into the particularities of doctrine, we would wish to be informed generally, whether the doctrines contained in this book are the same you approve of?—Generally, they are. If you selected particular passages, I do not know whether there would be any variation, but none of any great importance.

Do you conceive that those opinions are approved of, or disapproved of, by the two authorized Professors of Divinity in the Belfast Institution, namely, Dr. Hanna and Dr. Edgar?—They do not agree in those opinions, as far as I know their opinions.

Have you heard, that it has been considered as a circumstance of objection to the present constitution of the Belfast Institution, that the same young men who are to receive their ultimate impressions in divinity from those professors, are in the first instance necessarily to receive their instruction in Greek and Latin from yourself?—Yes.

Have you ever, in point of fact, in the instruction you have administered, interfered in any manner with the religious opinions of the pupils, or taken any particular steps to form their religious views, according to what you conceived was correct?—Never, in the remotest degree.

Do you consider those doctrinal views, which are stated in your father's publication, and which you have stated yourself, generally, to approve of, to be a fair exposition of the religious opinions of the Presbytery of Antrim?—I cannot say; I have no means of knowing from them, individually, whether they are so or not. As I have not had particular conversation upon the subject, I could not answer the question.

Have you ever heard it asserted, that the ministers of the Presbytery of Antrim have expressly disclaimed holding the opinions set forth in that book?—Never; they may have disclaimed that book as their authority in religious matters, for that book is no authority for any of them on religious opinions. I would disclaim that book being my authority, or any book but the Scriptures.

Were these sermons ever preached as now published?—Some of them, I recollect, were preached as published, others I cannot say whether they were or not. They were, of course, revised for the press.

Examination of
Rev.
William Bruce, B. A.
12 October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
William Bruce, B. A.
12 October 1825.

Have you preached sermons to the same effect and tenor?—Upon some of the points I have, but upon other points I have not preached at all.

Are your father's sermons and your own attended by any considerable number of young men, who are instructed in the Belfast Institution?—I cannot say that I ever observed them to be attended by any. I may once or twice have seen a young man in the meeting-house, in the course of the winter, whose face I knew. I am sure no one has regularly attended who was not previously connected with the congregation, or one of the same denomination.

Is it your habit to open your class with prayer?—With a short one; it is a usage in the Scotch colleges, and has been adopted here; not that I much approve of the frequency with which it necessarily occurs.

Is that prayer extempore?—Yes.

How often is that extempore prayer repeated by you?—Once before breakfast, when I first meet the Latin class, and once after breakfast in the Greek class.

Is it your impression, that you have ever upon any occasion made use of such expressions in extempore prayer, as a person who differed from you, a strict Calvinist, could not conscientiously join you in?—I never, at the Institution or elsewhere, am in the habit of using any thing but Scripture language in my prayers, praying to God through Christ, and in those terms that are so current in the Epistles, and I may add the collects of the English liturgy. I have a particular objection to introducing any thing of disputed doctrine into the strictly devotional part of public worship.

It is your impression, that you never have upon any occasion made use of a prayer that could be objected to by persons of a different feeling?—I never have. I was President of the Faculty of Professors last session, and at the close of our common halls, the president, after his final address, concludes with a benediction or short prayer to the students, and at that time it was asserted I made a prayer with a particular expressive pause; I recollect I got up to pronounce the benediction, and the young students, who were not aware of the circumstance, were shuffling in the act of rising up, and I paused till that shuffling was over, and it was said that this was done to impress a particular opinion.

In the course of your Greek lectures, do you lecture upon the Greek Testament?—No.

Is there any particular reason for that?—I would not wish to teach the New Testament, if any religious body felt a jealousy upon it, though I could teach it without any allusion to disputed doctrines; but besides it is not the best book for the purpose; all the students must have a literal translation, and therefore you cannot know whether they are repeating it from themselves or from the translation.

Was it taught by your predecessor?—I know nothing of that; but my predecessor agreed in general with us in religious opinions. I do not know whether he taught the Greek Testament, but I believe he did.

Was there any arrangement or understanding between you and the professors of divinity, as to your not teaching the Greek Testament?—I recollect telling Dr. Hanna, and perhaps Dr. Edgar, that I would not teach it. I considered that it was their business to teach it.

Who was the gentleman that preceded you in the chair?—Dr. William Neilson.

Was he of your religious opinions?—I believe he was; I never had any conversation with him, but he was understood and admitted by some that knew him intimately, not to be Trinitarian, nor Socinian, and he attended public worship in one of our congregations.

Have you known of any other persons, who agreed with you in religious opinion, being professors of the Institution?—I believe Mr. Hincks agrees with me in religious opinions.

Originally, at the establishment of this Institution, were there any persons of your religious opinions chosen professors?—I do not recollect any; but there was an Arian minister a candidate for the Logic chair, and no objection made on that score. The first professors were Dr. Young and Mr. Cairns, and Dr. Ure, of Glasgow, whose religious opinions I knew nothing about. Mr. Cairns belongs to the Seceding Church, and Dr. Young to the Scotch Church.

Do you consider Mr. Montgomery as agreeing with you in religious views?—Yes, I do, generally; and as far as we have ever explained we do agree.

Do you consider the same of Mr. McEwen?—Yes.

Is there any term in church history, by which you would be content to designate your own views of Christianity?—We are commonly designated Arians, and we do not object to the term, without knowing what Arius actually thought on many points. We are Anti-Trinitarians or Arians, distinguished from the Trinitarians on the one hand, and the Humanitarians on the other.

Did the prayer with which you concluded at the last session, in any manner, directly or indirectly, imply what your religious opinion was upon the point in difference between you and what is called the Orthodox Calvinist?—It could not; because I conceive there is no Orthodox minister that might not have been content with using that form; I believe it is as nearly the form that so frequently occurs in the Church of England as can be.

Do you recollect what the expressions were?—No, I do not; if I had thought it would have made so much noise I would have put them down; but I think it was one of those forms occurring in the Epistles.

Do you recollect the substance?—It did not consist of more than three or four lines, and as I adopt one or other of the many scriptural forms, I cannot distinctly recollect; but I think that I dismissed them with a prayer for grace, mercy and peace, from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ, or from God through Christ; one or the other of these forms I could have used equally, but I do not remember the words.

Do

233

Examination of
Rev.
William Bruce, B.A.
12 October 1825.

Do you recollect, whether there was at the end of the prayer an ascription of All glory to God, then a distinct pause, and then "through Jesus Christ?"—There probably might have been glory to God through Jesus Christ, but that pause arose purely from the circumstance of there having been a noise, and it not being proper to close a solemn form of worship in the midst of a shuffling noise—I therefore stopped till the noise subsided.

It was purely accidental?—It was; it never came across my mind that it could be otherwise interpreted, till I saw it in that statement of Mr. Cooke, to which I presume you allude.

Have you ever, upon any occasion in the performance of your duty as a professor, referred to Arian principles?—Never, I am sure.

Have you ever professed yourself an Arian in the presence of your pupils, or when acting in the discharge of your duty?—Never, that I am aware of.

Do you feel at liberty to address direct worship to our Saviour Jesus Christ?—We do not; what we call mediatorial worship, or through Christ, we do, but we think that we have no precedent for direct worship to Christ in the Scripture; this is our view; whether we are right or not is another consideration.

Do you consider that the death of Christ operated as an atonement for sin?—That would require me to know what was meant by atonement.

As an expiatory sacrifice?—As a vicarious sacrifice, most certainly not.

As a sacrifice of any kind, bearing the punishment for the sins of mankind?—Nor could I use these words, "bearing the punishment for the sins of mankind;" but I could say, in Scripture language, that if Christ had not died we should not live hereafter. That is the only length I feel warranted by Scripture to go, and that Christ is the only name given under Heaven whereby we can be saved.

In what sense do you understand the expression that "he has borne the iniquities of his people?"—The whole humiliation, ministry, sufferings and death of Christ, resulted from the iniquity of man, and that would be a sufficient explanation; but if I were to consider it in a critical point of view, I should like more time, and to see the particular passage.

Have you in any public discourses suggested, that those who are condemned are ultimately to be annihilated?—Never, that I recollect; I am sure I never have; I have not formed any such opinion, or any opinion upon that point.

You are aware, it is expressly suggested by your father?—It is.

And we are to collect, that you have not made up your mind upon that point?—No; nor do I know that his mind is made up upon that point. I have no opinion upon that point; I would say that I do not believe it, but rather believe in universal restitution than in annihilation. I do not, however, pretend to be decided even upon that point, for I see very great difficulty.

Have you expressed in your sermons any particular views upon the operations of the Holy Spirit?—Not that I recollect.

Is that a point to which you do not advert in your sermons?—Do you mean supernatural operation; the ordinary operation of the Spirit of God, I may have frequently used as an exhortation, but not in a doctrinal point of view. I have not urged the personality of the Holy Spirit.

Do you hold that there is a more economical subjection of the Son to the Father, or that the Son is the mere creature of the Father?—I believe that the Son was before all worlds, without determining when he began to be, and also believe that he was posterior to the Father; but as to the scholastic terms, "creation," or "generation," I can say nothing; because I do not understand the difference between them, as applied to God.

You do not teach any thing distinct upon them?—I teach his decided inferiority, and that he was posterior to the Father, but before all worlds, and the minister of the Almighty in the creation of the world.

Subordinate to the Almighty?—Yes, in all things.

To be considered as God, or not?—I am not clear myself, whether the term "God" is distinctly attributed to him in the New Testament, or not; but in the relative sense explained by the Arian writers, as Dr. Clarke and Whitby, and by Milton in his newly discovered work, which I have just been reading over, and the 5th, 6th and 7th chapters of which state my own opinions pretty accurately, I think it applicable to Christ.

Would you, holding that opinion, hold there was more than one God?—Only one Supreme God.

And another inferior?—As the term God, in the present usage of our language seems appropriated to the Almighty, I would rather say, a Being to whom the term God has been applied, as it has to angels and others.

Do you mean inferior in point of power?—Yes; all his power derived from the Father.

But pre-existing long even with reference to his appearing on earth?—Yes; pre-existent before the creation of the world; and I suppose before the angels, principalities and powers, which we understand he is said to have created.

And that he was the agent of the Almighty in the creation of the world?—Yes.

Do you teach that you may expect grace and mercy through his merits and sufferings?—Through his merits and sufferings, objecting to any thing vicarious; but through his mediation and intercession, and for his sake.

Do you conceive, that in the sacrifice and his suffering upon the cross, he offered himself up to God the Father for our redemption?—I believe so; but I do not know that the word "sacrifice" is applied to that; but I believe, that he voluntarily humbled himself and became obedient to death, for the redemption of the world, and the obtaining of eternal life.

Examination of
Rev.
William Bruce, B. A.
12 October 1825.

And that through his sacrifice alone we can hope for salvation?—Yes; I believe that without the humiliation and suffering of Christ, we should not have had salvation.

Are you extensively acquainted with the members of the Synod of Ulster?—Not very extensively; I know several in this neighbourhood, and some in more remote parts.

Do you conceive that your religious doctrine is embraced, and to any and to what extent, by clergymen of the Synod of Ulster?—I believe that there is a considerable number of the Presbyterian clergy of the Synod of Ulster that agree with the Presbytery of Antrim in their religious opinions, both with regard to the Trinity, and with regard to the Calvinistic doctrines, being Anti-Calvinistic and Anti-Trinitarian.

When you say Anti-Calvinistic do you mean Anti-Calvinistic with reference to Arminianism?—Yes, predestination, reprobation, and all what are called the "Five Points."

Are there any of the Presbyteries in which there are not examinations, with the view of ascertaining whether the candidate for the ministry does or does not hold the Arian doctrines?—I have no knowledge of what is done in any other Presbytery than our own. I was never present at any meeting of any other Presbytery.

When you stated there was a considerable number who agreed with the Presbytery of Antrim, with reference both to the question of the Trinity and the question of works, did you mean that there were a considerable number who agreed with the Presbytery of Antrim upon both those questions, or that some of that considerable number agreed with them as to one, to wit, the question of the Trinity, and some as to the other, to wit, the question of works?—Perhaps, I should not speak upon the subject from the vague manner in which I know it, but as far as I know, any members of the Synod of Ulster that do not believe in the Trinity, they renounce the Calvinistic doctrine; but whether there are any that remain Trinitarians, and at the same time renounce the Calvinistic doctrine, I cannot say one way or another.

You have said a considerable number of the members of the Synod of Ulster entertain, as you understand, the same doctrines and opinions that the Presbytery of Antrim do; is that opinion formed from personal acquaintance with the individuals, and having heard them express their sentiments, or in what other way?—It arises as much from common report, except as to a few individuals whom I have heard speak upon the subject.

Has that report reached you through members of the Synod?—I could not say how; but it is my belief, that many do not, and that some are silent upon the subject altogether, because they have gone beyond their Congregations.

When you say, "many do not," do you mean many do not hold your doctrines, or do not hold the Calvinistic doctrines?—There are many that do not hold the Calvinistic doctrines, but the majority do hold the strict Calvinistic doctrines.

Does the Institution, so far as your knowledge goes, enjoy public confidence?—I know of no reason to the contrary, except that that confidence may have been shaken a little by fears from the late agitation of the public mind; but till that time it did, and I am sure it will continue to enjoy, and that this agitation will be but temporary.

Has your class been as numerous since your appointment, as the same class was when your predecessor existed?—I have no knowledge exactly what it was before. I could tell the number in my class from the commencement of each year; but I do not know at all the number in my predecessor's time; but he was both head master of the classical school and professor in the collegiate department.

So far as your knowledge goes, has the number in attendance in the Institution, including both the schools and college, increased or diminished in the last four years?—I should think they have increased. I have seen it stated by others, who have seen the documents, that they have increased.

Has any objection ever been made, on the part of the Synod of Ulster, or of any particular Presbytery, to the manner in which any pupil educated or instructed under you answered the necessary examinations, preliminary to his admission to orders in the Presbyterian Church?—No objection that has reached my ears. I should explain a circumstance that made a difference in the numbers attending my class last session. Before this time last year there were no Examination Committees appointed by the Synod of Ulster, to examine the young men in classics and English, previous to their coming to the Institution; this was formerly done by the Presbyteries, and the young men passed through the Presbyteries with less difficulty than through these Committees; there were consequently several young men prevented from coming forward to any classes, because they were not sufficiently prepared, that would have come if the examination had been by the Presbyteries. If these had come, my class would have been much larger than it was.

If any rule were established, by which persons holding the Arian doctrines were excluded from professorships, what effect do you conceive it would have upon the public mind?—I believe it would have a bad effect upon the public mind to have any exclusion, whether of Arian or not Arian.

What do you think would be the feeling of the Arians upon the subject, if that doctrine was made a ground of exclusion?—I believe they would think it excessively illiberal, and be very much displeased, and think such exclusion in direct opposition to the principle upon which the Institution set out.

Do you think it would tend to make them withdraw their children from the Institution?—From the schools I do not know; their attending the schools depends upon their opinion of the personal character of the master. I cannot say what effect it would have.

In the college?—In the college department, there are very few of the Arians in this neighbourhood concerned in it. I mean, they have no concern in it, as to sending students there.

Do

Examination of
Rev.
William Bruce, B. A.
12 October 1825.

Do you happen to know, whether there are at present any students in the Institution intended for the ministry, and belonging to the Synod of Ulster, who hold the Arian doctrines?—I have no knowledge whether they do or do not, one way or another. I do not know even to what religious body the students belong till the end of the session, when I am obliged to send their certificates to the particular body to which they belong.

Do you know, whether you have any students intended for the Presbytery of Antrim?—Yes, I should know them as having come before me in another capacity in the Presbytery; there are one or two, I believe.

If the profession of Arianism were made a ground of exclusion, would the Presbytery of Antrim allow Candidates for the ministry in that Presbytery to come to the Institution?—I cannot answer what the body would do; they would be more unwilling to send them than now, because they would think the only object of that exclusion would be to have particular doctrines taught, and these doctrines inculcated, before the time they came to consider theological questions.

Have you any students from the south of Ireland?—There is one, belonging to a minister in Cork, who is at present going through a part of his course; he attended my lectures two years ago.

Are you able to state, whether Candidates for the ministry in the Synod of Munster are instructed here?—They have no Candidates for the ministry; their congregations have been supplied either by regular ministers, or by probationers from the north; they have no young men under education themselves.

In the Presbytery of Antrim, is it left open to the individual to form his own opinion upon the subject of Arianism or Trinitarianism?—Yes, perfectly; he would not be considered less entitled to our certificate, for holding one doctrine or the other.

Are you acquainted extensively with the Proprietors of the Institution?—I am acquainted with a considerable number. I have not looked over the list, to see what proportion I am acquainted with.

What do you think is their disposition, as to the connection between the Institution and the Government?—I believe the body of the Proprietors have always wished it; there may have been individuals who have not, but the body of Proprietors have always wished it, as giving permanence and greater weight and respectability to the Institution.

Do you know, whether there is in the body any disposition, in the event of Government granting assistance, to allow the Government any control over the election of the Professors?—I have no opinion upon that; there were certain resolutions agreed to by the Proprietors, in consequence of a letter from Mr. Peel, that would show their sentiments.

You do not conceive that their sentiments have undergone any change since that time?—I cannot say; they are a mixed body; the same body may not meet twice; but as far as I know them individually, they would not be unwilling to grant any thing that would not deprive them of their independence; they would always resist the proposal of Mr. Peel, which was, to have as many votes, and I believe proxy votes, at the control of Government, as belonged to the Institution here.

You are a member of the Faculty?—Yes.

Do you feel that the Institution at present is sufficiently supplied with the necessary means of affording instruction, both classical and scientific, to the persons who attend it?—There is not sufficient room in the building, nor any thing like it. The first year I attended, the same room was occupied from eight in the morning till eight at night, by different classes in succession, one after another, except during the time of meals, and it is only by occupying the schools during the time the scholars are absent, that the business can be done at all.

Do you think further buildings are necessary?—Yes; in one year I was obliged to meet in the room where the Board of Managers met, and then I was displaced, and could not go through the course of instruction on the days of their meeting.

If there was a disposition in the Government to grant a sum of money towards the erection of further buildings for the benefit of the Institution, would that disposition be met with a corresponding disposition on the part of the Proprietors to make an advance also?—It would have to be done individually; that would depend very much upon the prosperity of the country. There is no indisposition among the liberal part of the community to grant further assistance; but there would be a feeling that a great deal has been done, to the amount of above 25,000*l*.

Have you ever considered what further extent of building would be required?—No, I have not; I think a museum would be actually necessary; it would be desirable to have a classroom for every two classes; for as each class meets two hours in the day, three classes would require six hours a day, and this would cause inconvenience in the arrangement of hours.

You would require further lecture rooms?—Yes.

Particularly a theatre for chemistry and natural philosophy?—Yes, particularly; there is no fit room for showing an optical experiment, or for a chemical laboratory.

There are at present what may be considered two boarding houses?—Yes.

There is no hospital attached to either?—No; such a thing in public schools is not common; they have sick rooms; but they do not like the name of hospital in a public school.

Is there any sick room?—I do not know; but I believe neither gentleman has more than one sitting room, and they are very much hampered, owing to being obliged to take so much of the building for the collegiate classes.

Examination of
Rev.
William Bruce, B. A.
12 October 1825.

Do you think it desirable, that further means should be afforded to provide further accommodation for the boarders?—Yes; the building of additional lecture rooms might afford more room for the accommodation of the boarders in the present building; but the gentlemen who have the boarding rooms require more accommodation for themselves and their families than they at present have.

Have you ever visited any of the dormitories?—I have gone up once or twice with friends to the dormitories to look at them. I know both Mr. Hincks and Mr. Montgomery very well.

Do you think if there were more dormitories there would be more boarders?—I do not know even how many boarders there are; the dormitory seems spacious.

Can you suggest any improvement or alteration in the present system of the Institution, which you think would be desirable?—If I were to consider the plan minutely, I am sure I could; in my own department there are alterations I could mention; we adopt the Scotch system here, and I think there might be a blending more of the English and the Dublin systems, which would be advantageous. I am partial to the Dublin system from having been brought up there, and knowing more of it.

Will you mention any alterations you would like to suggest?—I should think longer time would be necessary to the classics here. In Dublin, classics are attended throughout the course prior to graduation, and only one year's attendance is required here, which is too little, for when they come to the general certificate examination, I find they have fallen off; we have a form of general certificate, (I do not know whether it has been submitted to the Commissioners), that we give at the end of three years.

Your pupils do not receive that certificate until a considerable time after your instruction of them ceases?—They have to go through two years more, one year at moral philosophy and mathematics, and the other year natural philosophy, and then they are re-examined in all the branches they have attended; and if they acquit themselves respectably they receive that general certificate.

Is it your notion that some means should be taken to keep alive the knowledge they receive from you, while they are going through other courses?—Yes, I would say so without a view to any other emolument; I do not say, whether it should be done by attending me, or by any other means.

Your session continues six months?—Yes; according to the Scotch plan, we have a public examination the last week in April, of each class, in the business done during the session; they are examined in the common hall, and those who acquit themselves well receive a certificate.* There are besides prizes voted by the class to the best during the session, and at the end of three years they receive a general certificate; and there are three prizes given at the general certificate examination, for the best answering, viz. one in classics; one in moral philosophy, logic, and belles lettres; and one in mathematics and natural philosophy.

Do you approve of that plan in preference to the one in which vacations would take place at different periods of the year?—I believe it is cheaper, and therefore more desirable here, for the students are seldom able to do more than pay for the expense of the six months, and the additional expense of travelling backwards and forwards, and supporting themselves in the vacation, could not be borne by that class of students.

Do you conceive that the frequent interruptions by vacations would be detrimental to them also?—There is a short vacation at Christmas, being festival time; and we do not think there is any advantage to be derived from it, except that their friends may see them, and some of them cannot afford that, and stay in their lodgings.

Is it customary to give premiums at the end of the session?—Yes, there are premiums voted by the class to the best of their fellows, and premiums also in the common hall; but those most attended to are those given by the class, which are given with the greatest fairness and considerable discrimination. I think they have been always right in their selection.

When they return after the long vacation, which commences in May, have you found their minds in a state which showed they had been attending to study during the time they had been at home?—I have not the same means of judging of that as the other professors; they undergo an entrance examination by me at the commencement of the first session; but after the examination at the end of that session, they do not come under my care till the end of the course: supposing they attend Greek, Latin, and logic the first year, they are then

* The Number of CERTIFICATES granted in each year, has been as follows:—

In 1817 - - - -	5	Of these 118, there were Students from the
1818 - - - -	8	County of Antrim - - -	21
1819 - - - -	6	Armagh - - - -	4
1820 - - - -	19	Cavan - - - -	1
1821 - - - -	11	Derry - - - -	15
1822 - - - -	14	Donegal - - - -	4
1823 - - - -	15	Down - - - -	53
1824 - - - -	19	Monaghan - - - -	7
1825 - - - -	21	Tyrone - - - -	13
	118		118

237

Examination of
Rev.

William Bruce, B. A.
12 October 1825.

then examined in logic on their coming the next session, prior to entering the metaphysical or moral philosophy class, but they are not examined again in the languages.

Have you any means of knowing whether they have made any proficiency during the vacation?—I have not; we tried the plan of offering prizes for those who would voluntarily read a certain course in the vacation, but as there were generally one or two eminent in the class, whom the rest knew would be most likely to succeed, the others never came forward. There is another great defect, which might be remedied by the Synod, that they are not obliged to attend the Latin so much as Greek; the attendance on the Latin class is voluntary, and the Greek is imperative.

You have stated, that those members of the Synod of Ulster, whom you understood to entertain principles commonly called Arian, had, as you believed, in most or many cases gone beyond their congregation; will you be so good as to state what you meant by that?—In some congregations, I believe, the more leading and educated classes have become less Calvinistic, and more inclined to Arian principles than those who are not, whose situation in life prevents it, and that they retain more firmly the rigid Calvinistic principles; but that is merely my general impression.

According to that impression, you mean to convey the idea, that the majority of the congregations, more especially those not of the highest class, have not adopted those doctrines, and do not receive them with the same satisfaction?—Yes, I am not conscious that my impression on that subject is influenced by my own views of the doctrines; it is an impression I have from mixed conversation.

Is it your opinion that many of the laity, residing in Belfast or the neighbourhood, do entertain and have adopted those principles called Arian?—There are a considerable number of Arians in the town and neighbourhood of Belfast.

In what class of society would you conceive they are to be found?—Chiefly in the higher classes, but not exclusively so; by the higher, I mean those who are more wealthy.

Do you mean to distinguish them from those more advanced?—Some of the bankers, and merchants, and shopkeepers, and there are others also.

Would you consider that a large proportion of that class you have been alluding to, merchants, and bankers and others, are in that situation; would you consider the majority to have adopted those sentiments?—I cannot say the majority, but there is a considerable weight of property and intelligence that do maintain those principles.

Would you consider that that number is increasing?—Indeed I do not know whether it is increasing or decreasing; it is very stationary, I think. There are changes, so far as I know, from deaths in families, and from individuals changing in their views; one of our congregations might be increasing, and the other not, but I do not know that there is any great difference; we are not a very proselytizing sect.

Could you state the number of persons attending your church?—There are about 120 families, which may make about four or five hundred; some of them are Bachelors and some of them single Ladies, and many have families, but they may amount to that.

Do you think it of more consequence, supposing one of the branches should be abolished, that the general Institution for classical and commercial knowledge should be continued, or that for preparing ministers for the church—which would be most important?—There must be a vast number more families concerned in the school, the neighbourhood supplying those to the schools, and the more remote parts of the country those to the college department; but the public in general are more interested in the college department, as the schools can support themselves.

You are not aware of any public act of the Presbytery of Antrim respecting that publication put upon the table?—Certainly, no public act, no presbyterial act, certainly not. I am very confident of that; but in a petition from the Presbytery of Antrim to the House of Commons, presented last Session, it is disclaimed as authority, and the paragraph in which it is so, was proposed by the author himself.

Letter from the Rev. Wm. Bruce, to the Secretary of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, dated Belfast, 24th October, 1825.

Sir,

LEST the Commissioners of Education Inquiry should not have received information, as to the expenses of a regular course of Education in the Collegiate Department of the Institution, I take the liberty of sending you the following statement:—

A course of Greek and Latin	-	-	-	-	-	three guineas.
D ^o of Logic	-	-	-	-	-	two d ^o .
D ^o of Mathematics	-	-	-	-	-	two d ^o .
D ^o of Moral Philosophy	-	-	-	-	-	two d ^o .
D ^o of Natural Philosophy	-	-	-	-	-	two and half d ^o .
Expense of taking out general Certificate	-	-	-	-	-	one d ^o .
Total	-	-	-	-	-	twelve guineas and an half.

Subscription to the Library for the whole of that period, 7s. 6d. I know of one very respectable house, where lodging, attendance, and the use of the kitchen fire, can be had for three shillings per week, and, I believe, there are many cheaper. The above course is the least that should be taken; but a much more eligible course might be pointed out at an expense of about eighteen guineas, or six guineas per annum. I also take the liberty of

Examination of
Rev.
William Bruce, B.A.
12 October 1825.

inclosing a statement of the principle upon which I act, in avoiding all interference with religious opinions, and which I felt obliged to allow to be printed when such an outcry was raised on this subject.

I have the honour to remain,

Your most obedient humble servant,

W. Bruce.

Belfast, 24th October, 1825.
To Rob^t Pauncefote, Esq. &c. &c.

Appendix, N^o 10.

Examination of the Rev. Tho. Dix Hinks; Wednesday, 12th October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
T. D. Hinks.
12 October 1825.

YOU are a clergyman of the Presbyterian church?—Yes.

What Synod are you in connexion with?—When I was a minister of the Presbyterian church, I was a member of the Synod of Munster, and am at present of the Presbytery of Antrim.

Describe the situation you hold in the Belfast Institution?—I am Master of the Classical School, and I am also Professor of Hebrew.

The first situation belongs to the school department, and the second to the collegiate department?—Yes.

Were you appointed to both those situations at the same time?—No; I was appointed as the head master of the classical school in the year 1821; I think in the month of June, and I was not appointed to the other till about the same time in the year 1822.

Was there any understanding or expectation when you were appointed to the first, that you would on a future day be appointed to the second situation?—There had been conversations, but no agreement, with the gentleman who was the candidate for the other place; nothing that could influence; and this after my own election. My predecessor had held the professorship of classics and the professorship of Hebrew, with the classical school; when I first thought of the appointment, I had looked to succeeding to all the places he held; but when I came to Belfast, to consider how far it would be proper for me to become a candidate, and had the duties explained, I found that the holding of the situation of classical master, and of professor of Latin and Greek, would be incompatible; that they had been wisely separated by the joint boards; and I applied for the school without reference to any professorship.

Your predecessor was Dr. O'Beirne?—No, Dr. Neilson; the vacancy was occasioned by his death.

Were you personally acquainted with the electors previously to your appointment?—With some of them; so far as this, that before I determined on applying for the situation, I came to Belfast to get information, and I was introduced and saw several of the Managers, who were ready to answer any question; but I did not previously know any of them.

In what manner did you become recommended to them; what was the nature of the testimonials you produced?—When I determined on becoming a candidate, I had a very great number of testimonials. I had testimonials from the present Primate, then Archbishop of Dublin, from the present Archbishop of Dublin, from the late Archbishop of Cashel, the present Bishop of Cork, on an acquaintance of twenty or thirty years; and from the present Bishop of Limerick, then Archdeacon Jebb, and from other clergymen of the Established Church. I had some from pupils who had been educated by me. I may mention two who wrote on that occasion; Mr. Devonsher Jackson, the secretary of the Kildare-street Society, and Mr. Richard Benson Warren, who had lived in my house for many years, and was thoroughly acquainted with me; those gentlemen wrote on the occasion, and a great many others who were connected with me, from having children educated by me, or from their knowledge of me in the different situations I had filled. I also laid before the Managers a letter of Lord Shannon's, not written for that express purpose; and others of the same character, as from the Managers of the Cork Institution.

Was there any competition on the occasion?—Yes, and it had been going on for some time before I applied; a very respectable gentleman, but one much younger than I am, and of much less experience, was a candidate. He was a clergyman of the Established Church, he was a candidate before I was, and had been very strongly recommended, and I have heard that the competition was very close; that some persons who would have voted for me on account of my own and Mrs. Hinks's experience, were favourable to him on the ground of his being a member of the Established Church; but since the election, some who then opposed me, have expressed their satisfaction in the event.

Have you any connection with any cure of souls?—No, I have no religious duties to perform; but I am associated with the Presbytery of Antrim, a connection I have no wish to disclaim, though it is a connection chiefly of a social kind.

What number of pupils have you in the school?—It is constantly varying. I made a return for the Managers a few days ago, of 150; some young men having gone up to college, or gone home to make some preparations for the next entrance. It is now reduced to 143, and there are eight or ten more who are nearly going, but there will probably also be an increase; I have put in writing the number of pupils for the last three quarters, distinguishing those who pay.

We understand you are one of the two masters, who by the rules of the Institution, are permitted to keep boarders within its walls?—I am.

239
Examination of
Rev.
T. D. Hincks.
12 October 1825.

How many have you?—Eight-and-twenty, at the rate of thirty guineas per annum. I have never had more than about thirty.

What do you consider on the whole to be the gross receipts resulting from your school department?—The gross receipts of the classical school, independent of the board, would be, making the deductions for free pupils, about from 450*l.* to 500*l.*, and from the boarders, 840 guineas.

That is the gross, subject to deductions for the payment of assistants?—Yes, and the board of the young gentlemen. I do not consider that by the board, I have much emolument.

What may be the expense of remuneration to the assistants, and how many do you keep?—The number and remuneration are not permanently fixed, but I have four assistants at present; to one of them I pay 50*l.* a year; to two I pay 30*l.*, and to the junior assistant, not more than 10*l.*

Do the assistants all board with you?—Yes; all of them live in the house, and the board is to be added to the sum paid to them; one of those assistants is my son.

What may be the amount of your emoluments arising from the collegiate department?—The average would be about 50*l.* I mean the sum received, supposing I paid no compliments to students from any particular connexion with them, and without reckoning the expense I go to for premiums, and the expense in providing books.

Is there any salary annexed to the office of Hebrew Professor?—None whatever; I do not suppose that my actual receipts, independent of the reduction for books, has ever amounted to forty guineas.

Does it result, either from the rules of the Institution, or the rules of the Synods, that the Students who attend the lectures of the Divinity Professor, must also attend your class in Hebrew?—The Synods require it as a matter of necessity; and it is in general considered a divinity professorship.

Explain what you mean by saying, "it is in general considered a divinity professorship?"—It is considered peculiar to the divinity students, and in the colleges in Scotland, (from which the rules of this were adopted), it is regarded as a divinity professorship; and I am called upon to give an account of my class immediately after the Divinity Professors, before the other professors. In the common hall, at the end of the session, the Divinity Professors are first called on, and then I am, as Hebrew Professor, instead of in order of appointment.

State the course of instruction you give in Hebrew?—The pupils attend two years. I first instruct them in grammar. I have used Fitzgerald's Grammar, but it is difficult to be got, and I think it not a good book. I have latterly used Lyons's Grammar, and Jones's Hebrew Selections; he is a teacher in the Feinaglian Institution; it contains three chapters in Genesis, and ten Psalms, with a kind of Lexicon, and Grammatical Notes, supplementary to Fitzgerald's. I have adopted that book in the junior class; in the senior class I read a portion of Scripture, varying it so as to enable the young men to attend more than one session. With a view of inducing them to cultivate a knowledge of the language, I vary the portion of Scripture, that they may not go over the same part twice, and for such additional attendance they do not pay as for the regular sessions.

Do your lectures embrace doctrinal discussions, or are they confined to grammatical construction?—They are confined to the grammatical construction, or to circumstances unconnected with doctrines. I do not hesitate to say, that it is a professorship of such a nature, that I do not wonder at its having excited some alarm: indeed, I have always said it would naturally occasion jealousy, respecting a person not holding the sentiments of the Synods, because the Scriptures are taught, from which opinions are formed, and on that account I have been on principle, and from the obligation I entered into on my appointment, very cautious; but at the same time I do not think, that if I were inclined to it, I could much introduce any thing connected with my peculiar opinions, or that would be objectionable. I have, however, made it a point to consult and use those commentators, and those books only, for the business of the class, that are in estimation in the Established Church, recommended by the bishops of the Established Church, and adopted by all those sects called Orthodox. I have never consulted for the class, books of another description, and upon any point disputed I have invariably adhered to the common version, not thinking there was any occasion to depart from it.

Are we to understand from your answer, that you feel your religious opinions to be different from those of the two Professors of Divinity?—Yes.

How would you describe the difference of opinion?—I hardly know how to describe it. I have not been very much given to theological pursuits. I have been very much engaged in the business of education, and in scientific pursuits—and theology further than moral practice, and enforcing the Scriptures, has not been an object with me, and I have read, since I was at college, very little upon the subject, excepting the Scriptures themselves. I believe, so far as the leading points, the term Arian may convey an idea of my present sentiments, with very high notions of the dignity of our Saviour, a decided opinion of his pre-existence, and my belief in the entire Scriptures; and as I do not find in the Scriptures the doctrine of the Trinity, so far I am what may be called an Arian; but I have read no Arian treatise upon Divinity, and am not acquainted with the subject scientifically, and do not mean to profess myself an Arian, except as implying my opinion as to the person of Christ.

Do you feel yourself at liberty to address direct worship to the Saviour?—No; I worship through him.

Do you consider that the death of Christ operated as an atonement for the sin of man?—Most undoubtedly. Of all the different schemes, I could not exactly say which I adopt;

Examination of
Rev.
T. D. Hincks.
12 October 1825.

firmly believing in the benevolence of the Divine Being, I do also believe, that by His atonement the death of our Saviour was mainly instrumental in our redemption. I recollect, when I read the treatise of the Archbishop of Dublin on the Atonement, I did not see much in it concerning that doctrine, from which I differed.

Were your sentiments upon religious subjects a matter of notoriety, previous to your appointment?—I have never been particularly active in disseminating them, but quite the reverse. I have always been adverse to religious controversy, or to taking any part in it. I have never been forward in publishing or preaching upon controversial subjects, but I thought it a duty, when I proposed myself as a candidate for the mastership in the Belfast Institution, to say that I agreed with Dr. Bruce's opinions, and that, if his sentiments were considered objectionable in a candidate, I should be glad it would be mentioned at once, as I would not in that case become a candidate. I was in a respectable situation at Fermoy, at the head of a school, which, though I had motives for leaving, certainly I could not leave at random, and it was a point of great consideration with me, whether I should offer myself or not; and therefore it would have been very foolish not to state any thing that might be objected to.

To whom did you state that?—To different persons who were Managers, and whose opinions were otherwise; I think officially to the Secretary; but I am not certain.

Were the dignitaries of the Established Church who recommended you to the situation, aware of your sentiments upon the subject?—I do not know that the dignitaries of the Church, who honoured me with their testimonials in my favour, were aware of my peculiar opinions. They knew I was a Dissenter from the Established Church, and they could not therefore altogether approve my opinions; but they spoke of me as qualified to teach a school, and as a man of activity and loyalty, without adverting to my opinions.

Was it pretty well understood at the time of your election, that you disapproved of the peculiar doctrines of Calvinism?—Yes, I suppose that it would be understood by the electors, and every body who thought of it, that I did.

Do you think it possible for any persons to agree at once with the Archbishop of Dublin and Dr. Bruce, upon the subject of the Atonement?—Perhaps not. I do not entirely agree with Dr. Bruce. I did not know his sentiments on this subject at the time; I only looked to one point. Dr. Bruce was known in Belfast, and known to be an early friend of mine. I knew little more of Dr. Bruce's peculiar opinions, than that he was not an Unitarian, in the common acceptation, and that he was a Dissenter from the doctrine of the Trinity, and I merely wished to convey the idea that my opinions were not the same as those which were deemed Orthodox; that I did not hold the doctrine of the Trinity. I did not wish to mention that I concurred in all Dr. Bruce's opinions.

Will you explain what meaning you attach to the expression, "worshipping through Christ?"—In worshipping through him I express my belief in him as a Saviour, and that we are to come to God through him; that he is our mediator and intercessor, though not the object, as I conceive, from the Scriptures, of direct worship, yet at the same time, that he has taken a deep interest in our salvation, and that it is through him only we hope for acceptance.

Do you consider him as possessing a divine nature?—I do not know well how to explain that; I am not very much read in theology, and I do not know certainly, whether by divine nature is meant being equally one with God; if so, I do not think so; but if by divine nature is meant a connexion with the Supreme Being, different from what men have, emanating from the Supreme Being in a different way, I do think that this is the doctrine of the Scriptures.

Do you consider Jesus Christ to be God?—I do not.

In any sense of the word?—In any sense of the word I should not apply the term "God" to him.

You consider him a created being?—Yes.

And that there was a time when he was not?—Yes.

What meaning do you attach to the expression "the Holy Spirit?"—I have not, really, clear ideas upon that subject; there are certain passages in the Scriptures in which he seems to be considered as a distinct being; there are other passages that appear to me more to favour the idea of his being no more separate from the Father than our souls from us; that there is a kind of connection between them, and that he is almost the same as God. I have, however, no definite ideas upon this subject.

In what manner do you explain the word "Elohim" to your Hebrew class?—I have never explained it at all; I translate it "God," and avoid making any remark upon the term; I do not think that many of those divines I have conversed with, or into whose writings I have looked, lay any great stress upon it as an argument for the doctrine of the Trinity, but I know that some Christians do think so. I have therefore thought it best to leave it alone, except to say that it is a plural joined with a singular. They might see a multitude of instances of the same kind, from which no individual would think of drawing the same conclusion, and on this account many learned men do not lay a stress upon it; but I have never pointed out any thing of this kind to my class, but have let the word pass unnoticed. If I felt myself more at liberty, I would mention the names of persons who drew such a conclusion from it, and also of others who did not, still confining myself to supposed orthodox writers.

What course would you pursue, if a young man were to ask you, how it happened that a plural noun was joined to a singular verb?—It very often occurs, that plurals are joined to singulars, and singulars to plurals.

Supposing that a young man should ask you, how the word "God" came to be signified by a plural nominative, what answer should you give him?—I would tell him there had been different

241

Examination of
Rev.
T. D. Hincks.
12 October 1825.

different modes of explaining it, and refer him to his Theological Professor, since it involved a disputed point, and I was not therefore at liberty to speak upon it.

Has any young man ever put the question to you?—No, there was a point mooted by the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster, who took hold of an expression, in which he quite misunderstood the meaning and tendency of my question, as I believe has been made clear to his own satisfaction in my reply, and which I think might be clear to anybody; it was about the word "Adonai;" it is disputed, whether it be a singular or a plural; but whichever it be, it is written in a peculiar way by the Masorites; words of a similar kind have a short ā before the i, excepting when a certain accent comes, which is called a royal accent, and then the short is changed to a long ā. Now in the word Adonai they always write it with a long ā, and it has been explained in mas-oretic works, that this has been done out of respect to the name of the Supreme Being; it is just the same distinction as where we write the name of God with a capital or a small letter; and during the examination of the class, I merely asked a young man respecting this change, who understood my question and replied accordingly, that the long ā was used out of respect to the name of God; it had no connection whatever with plurality.

How do you explain the word "Jehovah" to your class?—I consider it derived from the Hebrew verb, which signifies to be, that it expresses the self-existence of God, and is interpreted by the words "I am that I am."

Do you consider it to mean the Supreme Being, God the Father?—I certainly consider Jehovah to mean God the Father; I know there has been an argument introduced, I think by Mr. Taylor, a clergyman of the Established Church, under the name of "Ben Mordecai," in which he has considered Jesus Christ as the Jehovah Angel. I speak incorrectly perhaps, for I have never read his book, much less entered into the consideration of it; I have always been in the habit of regarding "Jehovah," as implying the Great Supreme Creator of all things.

And so teach it to your class?—Yes, so far as I am called upon.

Do your pupils translate the word "God?"—Yes, they do, or rather Lord, as in the received version; my practice is to refer them to the received version; I never depart from it, excepting in slight points, which go to the reconciling and pointing out of differences between the Septuagint, or the quotations of Scripture in the New Testament, or if in the writings of Bishop Lowth, or any man of acknowledged authority, I find an explanation that does not affect doctrines, any thing for example tending to explain the manners of the Jews, or their general history, I lay it before the class, but I do not enter upon explanations which can at all involve theological discussions.

Do you open your class with prayer?—Yes, at the commencement of the session; not at other times; for this reason, my class is held at six in the evening; I conceive where all those attending it have been engaged in prayer, and have entreated a blessing on the labours of the day before, it is a work of supererogation; I have however no objection to it; and I have intended to alter in that respect, for this reason, that after the commencement of the last session, the theological professors expressed a wish that the class should begin by prayer. I have no objection to it, but I did not like to make any change in the middle of the session.

The prayer when you do offer it is extempore?—Yes, contrary however to my former practice. When a settled minister I preferred written prayer, and was always in the habit of using written prayers before I came here; it was rather a departure from my own judgment, and a compliance with the practice of others. I generally confine myself to what is the peculiar business. I wish to avoid extending my prayers, from not being in the habit of that mode of prayer, and from thinking it better to confine them to the acknowledgment of the perfections of the Supreme Being, and to imploring a blessing upon what we are about to be immediately engaged in.

Have any of your boys been successful upon their examinations, in obtaining admission into Trinity College, Dublin?—Yes, there have been some; there is one young man at present, a pupil of mine, that has carried the prizes regularly in college.

At entrance?—Yes, in Hebrew; a sum of money was left for young men that were to be examined in Hebrew at entrance, and premiums are given, varying from 2*l.* to 20*s.*; several of my pupils have got the first premiums.

In what Presbytery were you ordained?—It was then the Presbytery of Munster; it has latterly been called the Synod of Munster, having been united with the Southern Presbytery of Dublin.

The Arian doctrine is understood to be the doctrine of that Synod?—There are persons not Arians members of it, but the greater number of them are so.

What number of ministers may there be?—Twelve.

Was it known you were in connection with that Synod, at the time you obtained those testimonials from the dignitaries you have mentioned?—Yes, I suppose so; I neither expressed it, nor was I questioned upon the subject; it was a matter of general notoriety what my opinions were; I never attempted to conceal them.

You have referred to a conversation between yourself and one of your pupils, in the course of a lecture with reference to the word Adonai?—Not with one of my pupils; we have public examinations by order of the Synod in the common hall, in the presence of the Moderator and the Committee of the Synod; my pupils were examined in Hebrew; Dr. Hanna sat in the pulpit or chair with me, and I asked a question incidentally respecting the long ā in the word Adonai, and the pupil gave me in answer, that he had understood it as being put as a mark of respect to the name of God, and afterwards the Moderator, publicly, when he

Examination of
Rev.

T. D. Hincks.

12 October 1826.

entered into particulars respecting the Institution, pointed it out as a charge against me, that I had given such an explanation to the class.

How was it understood, that the explanation of the term bore upon the doctrine of the Trinity or Arianism?—I cannot tell; the Moderator thought so. I speak of the Moderator of last year, Mr. Cooke; he published a remark upon it; and I published a pretty long letter in the newspaper, a column, in which I quoted a number of authorities, and in which I entered more into minutiae than the subject required, to show that he had not been acquainted with the subject, and that he had taken alarm without foundation.

Did you tell the students you were examining that Adonai was plural, and was so used to express dignity?—Certainly not; I asked my question respecting the long ā, and the student answered the question accordingly, without saying anything about plurality; when I explained it I merely accounted for the difference from other words, also plural, in having a long ā instead of a short one, by observing, that it was the practice of the Masorites out of respect to the name of God, as denoting dignity; but I did not enter into any further explanation, nor was there any thing that passed alluding to plural, but the Moderator, probably under some alarm, and watchful, caught the word, though he afterwards acknowledged he did not understand much of the subject; he was apprehensive it had a tendency to inculcate Arianism.

Was your statement simply, that the long ā was used in the manner in which it was in that word, as marking the dignity expressed, or to that effect?—That the long ā was used in that word in consequence of dignity, or, I would rather say as a mark of respect; I did not use this illustration at the time, but I would repeat it, as explaining my meaning; it was just as we write "God," with a large G instead of a small one; that the long ā was used before the final i instead of a short one, as marking the dignity of the Supreme Being, being the name of God; the Masorites have adopted it to express dignity. I found that explanation in all the commentators who were Trinitarians; I quoted eight or nine of the highest authorities for it.

What other explanation does it admit of?—It makes no difference in the sense at all; it is a matter of no moment whatever. If I had thought any one could have connected it with doctrines, I should not have used it at all; it is not like "Elohim." Those who read Hebrew without points, and some of those who use them, never make it a plural.

What is the other explanation it admits of?—It admits of no other I can conceive of; the word is translated in the same way, whatever opinion may be formed. It is a name of the Supreme Being, and the difference about the points is of no greater importance than I have stated. The points are by a great many of the best Hebrew scholars, and some of the most orthodox ones, given up entirely; none, I believe, consider them as of divine authority. I was explaining the Masoretic doctrine, and was merely saying, as much as if I told a child such a word is always written with a capital. I could never have conceived it possible that it could have attracted notice; in fact, I did not know what authorities there were for my remark till it had been found fault with; it merely occurred to me in one grammar, and I mentioned it incidentally; but when it was found fault with, I looked to see how it had been explained by the lexicographers.

Have you, at any time, either in your lectures or examinations, or in any course of communication with your pupils, touched at all upon the controversy between Calvinism and Arianism?—Never at all.

You have mentioned the number of boarders you have at present; do you conceive that the accommodation for boarders afforded to you by the Institution, would allow of your having a greater number, and what number?—I think it would accommodate about forty conveniently; I have never had so many, therefore cannot speak from experience.

Have you now many gentlemen not belonging to Belfast attending your class, who are not boarding in your house?—About eighteen, I think.

Do you think they would become boarders with you, if you could afford them accommodation?—Not at all; the young men who do not board with us are in a station of society that makes it necessary for them to board for a considerably less sum.

Do you think it desirable that further accommodation should be afforded to you for the boarders?—I do feel that we are considerably inconvenienced for want of more room; as a schoolmaster, I want a much larger room for teaching, and I could adopt many plans that occur to me as improvements if I had more room.

Have you more room than Mr. Montgomery?—My dormitory is the same size; I am sorry it did not occur to me to exhibit it; it is always ready for inspection.

Does any thing occur to you that would tend to the improvement or advantage of the Institution, that you would wish to mention?—There are many circumstances to which, if opportunity permitted, I would wish to draw your attention.

Are you acquainted, in general, with the political principles of the Professors and Masters of the Institution?—Indeed, I think I am, so far as every thing that has occurred within four years.

So far as your knowledge goes, what character would you apply to the several Professors and Masters of the Institution, that of affection or disaffection towards the established Government of the country?—Affection towards the established Government of the country, certainly.

Have you ever learnt any circumstance that would induce you to think that in any certain case disaffection existed?—No, in no one instance; I have not heard any circumstance that would lead me to suspect any of them.

So far as your experience goes, as to the gentlemen educated at the Institution, are they generally marked by feelings of affection or disaffection towards the Government of the country?

243

Examination of
Rev.
T. D. Hincks.
12 October 1825.

country?—So far as I know, they are affectionate towards the Government; I do not think the Institution has any connection with politics. It is hard for me to speak to this, from the short time I have been a resident. I have not meddled with political discussions, but in the town of Belfast there has been a great deal of talk about politics; and there are many pupils who may adopt the opinions of their parents; as far as I have reason to believe, they are all attached to the Government of the country.

Is your classical course the same as that pursued in the University of Dublin?—It is obliged to vary, because we must take in the course of entrance for the Synod of Ulster, and also for Maynooth College, which is more extensive than that of Dublin College; and to accomplish that, we are obliged to read much higher books.

Has it so happened that any persons have been educated here for the Roman Catholic priesthood?—Most unquestionably several; I have four boarders, and seven or eight Roman Catholic day scholars, of which three are looking forward to the priesthood; and there was one left me lately educated in my school, and who also attended my Hebrew class, with the knowledge, I believe, of his Bishop, and is gone, under circumstances highly favourable, to Maynooth College, in the last year.

[The witness was requested to furnish the Commissioners with the Particulars of his Classical Course.]

Have any of your pupils been intended for the Established Church?—Several; I have frequently had sons of clergymen of the Established Church intended for the church. I have at this time come to spend a year with me, the son of a clergyman in the south of Ireland. I have had a number of the sons of clergymen of the Established Church with me, and several clergymen, that are now settled, were educated by me. I have had pupils from the south since I came to Belfast; if it had not indeed been for my connections in the south, I should, perhaps, not have had so many boarders. A young gentleman, who is now a candidate for the gold medal in college, who distinguished himself very much during his course, is a Roman Catholic, and within the last three months he has introduced two other Roman Catholic boarders to me.

Course of Reading in the Classical School.

THE Latin Grammar used is Ruddiman's Rudiments, which I prefer to most of the old grammars, but think might be much improved. A vocabulary is used for exercises in the declensions; and when sufficiently advanced, the pupil begins to write Ellis's Latin Exercises, entirely taken from the writings of Cicero, and adapted to the Eton Syntax. More advanced pupils use Valpy's Elegantiae Latinae.

The first books for construing are Valpy's Delectus Sententiarum and L'Homond's Epitome Historiæ Sacræ, in addition to which, Dr. Burrowes's Selectæ, when it can be procured; Eutropius, and a cheap Selectæ Sententiæ, published in this town, occupy about a year and a half; Cornelius Nepos, the Commentaries of Cæsar, and Walker's Selection from Ovid's Epistles, are next used; and at this time the pupils generally begin Greek grammar and prosody. The grammar used is one compiled by myself, and the prosody, I prefer, was published by the Rev. R. Boyce; a part of Ovid's Metamorphoses and Valpy's Greek Delectus usually complete the part of the instruction previous to what is called the entrance course.

The entrance course for Dublin College includes the first six Æneids of Virgil, the whole of Sallust, two Plays of Terence, the Satires and Epistles of Horace, and select Satires of Juvenal. Sizars must read the additional six books of Virgil, and the Odes of Horace; and the latter, some part of Livy, and Cicero de Officiis, are necessary for entrance with the Synod of Ulster and at Maynooth. We also frequently read the Georgics of Virgil, select Orations of Cicero, and parts of Tacitus.

The Greek entrance course consists of the four Gospels and Acts, Walker's Selections from Lucian, Ormston's Extracts, and the first eight books of Homer, of which Ormston is seldom read. Both the other courses require Xenophon's Cyropædia, and we frequently add several more books of Homer, some part of Demosthenes, a Greek Play or two, and a book of Herodotus, taking advantage of the publications for the Greek class at Glasgow; Dr. Neilson's Greek Syntax and Idioms, with his Exercises, are also used; and with the higher classes, Mr. Phillips's Greek Prosody, with Professor Bruce's Account of the Greek metres.

The senior class, at present, read with me the Odes of Horace, and selections from Livy and Tacitus, alternately, in Latin; the Œdipus Tyrannus and Demosthenes περί Στεφάνου in Greek, besides advanced parts of Homer, and the Georgics of Virgil, with my first assistant. I devote from 10 to 12 to the head class, and, with the exception of a Greek lesson in Homer, of the second class before breakfast, hear the junior classes as it may be convenient, during the other hours of business.

Saturday mornings are devoted to history and ancient geography, in both which there are monthly examinations by myself. The books used are an epitome of history, in great measure abridged from the Elements of Professor Tytler, but more accommodated to a classical school. This, as well as the ancient geography, were compiled by myself, and I take the liberty of sending a copy of each, and of the Greek grammar. The remainder of Saturday is employed in exercising the pupils in Greek and Latin grammar, including prosody. With respect to Hebrew, it should be mentioned, that besides the instruction in the Bible, a lecture on grammar, often taken from the Philologia Sacra of Glassius, or an account of the different versions of Scripture, the Jewish sects, the Masora, Talmuds, &c. is given on one evening in the week, on which the pupils are examined on the following one.

Thomas Dix Hincks.

Appendix, N° 11.

Examination of the Rev. W. D. H. M'Ewen, A. M.; Thursday, 13th October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
W. D. H. M'Ewen,
A. M.
13 October 1825.

YOU are a Clergyman in the Presbyterian Ministry?—I am of the Presbytery of Antrim.
Have you any congregation committed to your charge?—The second congregation in Belfast.

How long have you been resident at Belfast?—Upwards of eight years.

Are you a Visitor of the Belfast Institution?—I am.

At what time did you become connected with it?—Immediately on my removal to Belfast I was appointed a Visitor; at the expiration of four years I was appointed a Manager, and at the termination of the next four years I was re-appointed a Visitor.

We collect from the books of the Institution, that few, if any, of the Managers appear to have been more constant than yourself?—I have been very uniform in my attention to the duty.

And there are few who could give us better information as to its original objects and the plan upon which it has been conducted?—I have certainly paid very considerable attention to it.

How often are the meetings of the Visitors and Managers held?—Generally speaking, once a fortnight, on every alternate Tuesday; I am not sure, but during the College session they are held every Tuesday. We have not so much business during the vacation.

Do you conceive that the Belfast Institution was originally founded for the express purpose of providing the means of education for the Presbyterian Ministry, or do you conceive that object to have become an incident to it, and to have formed no part of its original design?—I have always been of opinion, that although not distinctly expressed by the insertion of the name of the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster in the Act of Incorporation, yet that it was the intention of the Proprietors to cultivate an union with that body. In the session which opened on the first of February 1814, its plans were not stated in detail.

Do you think it was in the mind of its founders to render it subservient to that purpose?—I do, from the general history of Presbyterianism, and inserting the Moderator's name as a Visitor.

Was there any Bishop who had his name inserted at the same time as a Visitor?—Yes.

If it was merely from the insertion of the Moderator's name, we might infer from the insertion of the name of a Bishop of the Establishment, it was intended also for the education of Ministers of the Establishment?—That would have been an interference with the regular education of the University of Dublin, which was never intended.

Can you state for what end the two Bishops of the Establishment and the Provost of the University of Dublin were appointed as Visitors?—I conceive the object of appointing them, and the Members of Parliament for the two counties of Down and Antrim, was to afford every reasonable satisfaction to His Majesty's Government, that nothing improper would be attempted within the walls.

What impropriety do you allude to?—I think the mere circumstance of knowing that men of that rank and consequence in the kingdom, were officially connected with the Institution, and also entitled to inspect at all times every department in the seminary, was calculated to give a reasonable security to Government that every thing would be conducted with propriety.

Have either of the Bishops of Down or Dromore ever, in point of fact, interfered in the concerns of the Institution, or attended as Visitors?—Distinctly; the Bishop of Dromore actually attended and voted at the election for one of the professors, at the election of Professor Stevelly, I believe I was present when he took a part in that election.

Have either of the Bishops ever interfered, except on the occasion of an election; have they ever taken a part in the management and concerns of the Institutions?—Yes, the late Dr. Percy, Lord Bishop of Dromore, not only interfered by subscription, but offered his advice by letter as to the mode of management to be pursued, and his letters are in the letter book.

Have any and what Bishops of Down or Dromore, so far as your information goes, personally inspected the Institution, and gone through the building, and seen the arrangement of the classes, &c.?—The Lord Bishop of Down has been recently appointed; on that occasion I was one of the deputation that waited upon him, to know if he would accept of the office of a Visitor, which he did, and I believe he went through the different departments of the Institution; I know he consented to accept the office in the Institution, and that the reason he assigned for not voting at an election was his recent appointment, and that he did not wish his first connection with the office should be one of patronage.

Did the preceding Bishop of Down ever act as Visitor?—I never saw the preceding Bishop of Down in the Institution, but I cannot take upon me to say that he did not.

Do you recollect any of the county members, who are from their situation Visitors, voting at elections?—I do; I recollect perfectly Colonel Forde attending and voting; and I believe I might also state, but not with the same certainty, that Lord Arthur Hill has attended; the Marquis of Downshire I know has frequently attended; and I believe that the late Sovereign of Belfast, Mr. Verner, has not unfrequently attended, as well as Sir Arthur Chichester.

Is it your opinion, that those persons who may be considered the resident aristocracy of Belfast approve, generally speaking, or disapprove of the Institution, or would wish its continuance, or wish it to cease to exist?—It is the absolute impression on my mind, that they are favourable to the Institution.

Do you know any person in the neighbourhood, of rank or importance in society, that, so far as you know, actually disapproves of it?—I conceive before the appointment of the board of of Faculty there were doubts and difficulties; it was then thought by some of the aristocracy, that there might be an interference of the managers, who were mercantile men, with the conducting of the general business of the College, to which they conceived they were incompetent, but I conceive an absolute change took place in their minds upon the formation of the Board of Faculty.

245

Examination of
Rev.
W. D. H. M'Ewen
A. M.
13 October 1825.

By the Board of Faculty, we are to understand the professors alone?—Yes.

Will you describe exactly the nature and extent of the authority of the Board of Faculty?—I wrote the first sketch of the Act which was subsequently passed, and that places under the control of the Board of Faculty, absolutely the whole of the moral and literary concerns of the Institution. It prevents the Managers interfering directly or indirectly in the management of their classes; it leaves them as absolute in the management of their classes as the professors in Glasgow University.

Are their decisions as to their own duties, not subject to the control of the Visitors and Managers?—The Visitors retain the power to inspect at all times every department of the Institution, and report upon it; the Visitors both Parliamentary and elected, are empowered by the Act of Incorporation to enter into any of the classes, and inspect the manner in which the business is conducted, and to report to the joint Boards, but they have no power to control the professors in the execution of their duties.

Supposing the improbable case of the professors joining in assigning to themselves a less strict performance of their duty than the Managers and Visitors might approve of, what would be the actual result?—We attempted to guard against that by a special enactment, that they were to hold their situations upon the condition that there should neither be immorality, incapacity nor inattention; and within my own knowledge, we were obliged to report not on the immorality of the individual, but both on his incapacity and inattention.

Was there any professor that became the subject of such a report?—There was; to whom we paid his salary for the current year, and who retired to Scotland quietly, without any disturbance. He was not fit to conduct his class.

Does he continue to receive his salary?—No; he did not officiate half a session, till his incapacity was ascertained by even junior students in his class.

The appointment of a professor is for life?—Yes; provided there is morality, capacity and attention.

Do the Masters hold their situations on the like tenure?—Yes.

Be so good as to enumerate the different professorships that are attached to the Institution, with the salaries respectively annexed to each?—The present President of the Board of Faculty, who is changed annually, is the Reverend Mr. Hincks; he is the Professor of Hebrew; and I believe he receives no emolument excepting the fees of the students. Mr. Bruce was originally appointed the Professor of Hebrew, Greek and Latin; he found the duties were very arduous, and I think there was an arrangement entered into, that Mr. Hincks should be allowed the fees of the Hebrew class, and that Mr. Bruce should retain the salary of the Greek and the Latin chairs. Dr. Young is the Professor of Moral Philosophy, and his emolument is 150*l.*, exclusive of the fees of the students. Mr. Cairns is the Professor of Logic, and his emoluments are 150*l.*, exclusive in like manner of the fees of the students. Mr. Stevelly is the Professor of Natural Philosophy; his salary is 150*l.*, exclusive of the fees of the students. Mr. Thomson is the Professor of Mathematics; his salary was 50*l.*, but that I think he resigned about a year since, in consequence of the reduced finances of the Institution. Dr. Drummond is the Professor of Anatomy and Physiology, and his emoluments from us were 50*l.*, but he also resigned it under the same circumstances. With respect to the two Professors of Divinity, they are paid nothing from the funds of the Institution; the students in the divinity classes pay a certain fee, and in case the amount of fees does not come up to 100*l.*, the Synod are pledged to make it up 100*l.* to each, I believe.

Do you yourself approve of that striking disparity of salary that seems to be established, or would you think it a better arrangement that all the professors should receive the same, if there were funds sufficient?—All the salaries seem very small; but some of the professorships appear to me much less useful than others. I think it very right that the students of theology should make themselves acquainted in some degree with comparative anatomy, on the plan of Ray or Paley's natural theology; but I do not think it of the same importance as the study of moral philosophy.

Do you think 50*l.* salary is a becoming remuneration for the Professor of the Hebrew language?—By no means.

Then that 50*l.* a year is added to considerably by fees?—Yes; but the Professor of Hebrew has not 50*l.* from us, he only has the class fees; Mr. Bruce has the 50*l.* attached to the Greek and Latin chairs; and Mr. Hincks has only the fees of the pupils. The reason of that was, that the combination of the Hebrew, Greek and Latin languages necessarily produced a great number of pupils. I may be mistaken, but I believe, I am correct. I will examine into it.

We should wish to know what impression has resulted from your experience, as to whether sentiments of disaffection to the Government have for any time past prevailed to any and what extent, among the Professors and Masters of the Institution?—I have ever since my coming to Belfast, been a Member of the Boards, and I do declare, I never knew an instance of disloyal sentiments being inculcated or expressed on the part of the Professors, Masters, Managers or Visitors in the Institution. Difference of opinion may have prevailed as to the Managers private sentiments. I speak positively as to the Masters and Professors.

Examination of
Rev.
W. D. H. M'Ewen,
A. M.
13 October 1825.

The question is, rather whether you conceive such sentiments to have been entertained by the Professors or Masters?—Never.

What is your impression as to the young men who have attended the collegiate lectures, in regard to their sentiments towards the Government?—I have uniformly found them correct and loyal in their sentiments. In truth, I have never heard a single political discussion mentioned by the students there, they are so entirely occupied by literary pursuits. I have never heard them express an opinion upon the passing political events of the day.

Are we to understand that it is your opinion, there is no decided political tone about the Belfast Institution?—That is decidedly my opinion.

Will you be so good as to state what you conceive to have been the origin and progress of the connexion that now exists between the Synods of the Presbyterian Church and the Belfast Institution?—That connection took place, I think, in the sessions 1815 and 1816. There had been a communication previously in 1814, and on that occasion the Synod of Ulster, acting upon the views of home education, stated that so soon as adequate professors were appointed, they would select the Belfast Institution as the place in which their students might complete the curriculum for the Presbyterian ministry. I think it was opened on the first of February 1814; the first session of the Presbyterian students was in 1815 and 1816. I have not referred to the books, but that is my belief.

We collect from the whole of the evidence we have received, that the collegiate course embraces two objects; one the preparation peculiar for the Presbyterian ministry, and the other affording to the community at large, the benefits of an improved education?—Yes.

Which of those two objects do you conceive to be the chief at present, and which the subordinate, supposing, but not implying, it should become necessary to make a choice between them?—As a Presbyterian minister, I may be partial in the opinion I form, for I have always been convinced, that the education of candidates for the ministry in our country was a subject of paramount importance. I am perfectly sensible of the importance of diffusing education generally in our country.

On the whole are we to understand, that you think that the purpose of preparing young men for the ministry is of the two the most important?—That is my conviction; many might differ from me in that opinion, and I am also aware of the great importance of educating teachers. I know we have been sending out teachers through almost every parish of the province, which I conceive, next to the ministers, are the most useful class in the community.

Be so good as to state the grounds upon which you think Irish education for the Presbyterian ministry is of so much importance?—My preference to that has been founded upon the history of the different attempts made to carry it into effect, but particularly from its affording a more firm security for the morality and religion of our students.

Will you explain how it is that the education in Belfast affords superior facilities on these points, in preference to what might be obtained in the Scotch Universities?—With respect to the Irish students who attend in the Scotch Universities, I can state, that nine-tenths of them did not obtain letters of introduction to persons who would act as moral guardians. Formerly they went to a place with which they were unacquainted; they lodged in a large commercial town, and it was only necessary they should answer their names upon the call of the catalogue, and they returned to their respective presbyteries, who were unable to ascertain how they spent their time, except so far as the production of the certificates might inform them. There are few persons in Ulster who have not connections in Belfast; they come recommended to some particular friend, or some minister; the number of students is much less, and the professors are enabled to exercise a much more vigilant system of inspection. I have known an instance of a student called before his presbytery, and informed that his life had been so immoral, that he was not fit to obtain license for the Presbyterian ministry, and he was set aside; whereas, had that occurred in Glasgow, he would have returned, and most likely have been licensed, without the Presbytery knowing any thing of the matter.

Is it your opinion, that the young men attending the collegiate course in Belfast are under a system of respectable moral guardianship?—I do firmly believe they are.

In what description of houses and families do they usually reside?—We have latterly in Belfast been getting much into the habit that prevails in Glasgow; persons of moderate habits lay out their account to give a sitting-room and sleeping-room to one or two students, and I would generally say, that the places in which the greater number of the students lodge may be considered in decent mechanics or upper tradesmens houses, situated in respectable streets; those of a wealthier description may either be boarded with some of the professors, which occasionally takes place, or if they chuse, occasionally in the boarding schools of the Institution, and yet attend the college; but I think there is a class of people of respectable habits, who are gradually getting into the plan of lodging students.

Have you ever heard of any complaint among the town's-people of Belfast, that any of the students attending the collegiate course were of disorderly habits?—I have mentioned one instance, where an individual was preventing from obtaining his license; but, generally speaking, they are much more free from irregularity than students commonly are. I speak of the University of Glasgow, where I was educated, and where I have heard of tumultuous scenes taking place, which were never known in Belfast.

Are we to understand, that it is your opinion there is less vice among the students attending the Institution here than in Glasgow?—Yes, I think so; and I can give one reason for it. At Glasgow it is known there is a tavern within the walls of the college, which in my time was kept by the head porter of the University.

247
 Examination of
 Rev.
 W. D. H. M'Ever, A. M.
 13 October 1825.

Are there other taverns in Glasgow and Belfast, which the students more or less frequent?—Yes, but a student at Glasgow was often led into an inconsiderate expense, from this circumstance; he took all his money with him at once, from the difficulty of remittance, and never, in all probability, having been master of such a sum, he contracted habits of wasteful expenditure. When they are sent to Belfast they do not bring with them, generally speaking, more than 10*l.* in their pockets.

Were there not many of the Irish students without acquaintance in that great city?—Yes, a great number.

Are there any of the young men who attend the collegiate course in that situation in Belfast?—I should think it impossible.

Do you think it was in the power of the professors and masters at Glasgow to exercise the same control over the students as here, or do the circumstances account for the difference?—I am certain they were anxious to do every thing in their power, but the number was so great, it was out of their power to enter into a minute inspection.

In addition to that, Glasgow is four times the size of Belfast?—I should conceive it is.

We observe, that the Synod of Ulster is represented in the Institution by having a Professor of Divinity of its own nomination, and the Secession Synod is represented in like manner, but that the Presbytery of Antrim is not: can you state from whence that circumstance originates?—The Presbytery of Antrim consists only of eight congregations, and nine ministers, and the examinations in that Presbytery are of a very strict nature. I speak from actual knowledge. Many students prefer being licensed in the Synod of Ulster, although ultimately they may be placed in the Presbytery of Antrim, because, in the minds of many people, there is associated with the Presbytery of Antrim a notion of Arianism, which would not recommend him in a number of congregations. Another cause is, that we leave every student to exercise his own judgment in pursuing his theological studies, provided that he satisfies us when we examine him. We impose no creed upon him.

Is it your opinion that the imputation of Arianism is improperly attached to the Presbytery of Antrim?—I have no hesitation in admitting, that the Presbytery are Arians, admitting great shades of difference amongst its members. I, generally speaking, should say they are High Arians.

Are we to understand by that, what is called Semi-Arians in theology?—I should say they were of that class which entertains the highest views of the mediatorial influence of our Lord. Low Arians differ from us upon that point.

Will you be so good as to define to us, as distinctly as you can, the difference, according to your conception, between High and Low Arianism?—I think the High Arian may consistently teach the doctrines of the Atonement, and dependence upon the continual intercession of the Son of God at the throne of grace; the Low Arian holds different views of the Atonement. I think that is the cardinal point upon which they differ; and perhaps likewise as to the influence of the Holy Spirit.

What is the difference between a very High Arian and a Calvinist?—The Calvinists a, generally speaking, divided in this country into what are called High Calvinists and moderate Calvinists; the moderate Calvinist, I conceive, very seldom inculcates the doctrine of particular election, and still less frequently the doctrine of reprobation; whereas I conceive that the strict Calvinist must, to be consistent with his own system, teach both of those doctrines; but I beg leave to add also, that Calvin's Institutes give a much more fair and correct view; his principles have been very often misrepresented in modern books.

Without entering at present into any discussion of the tenets of Calvin, we wish to obtain from you what you conceive to be the essential difference between the highest degree of Arianism and the most moderate degree of Calvinism?—I have mentioned, that the High Arian may consistently teach the doctrines of the Atonement and dependence most devoutly upon the continued mediatorial intercession of the Son of God.

Upon those two points he agrees with the moderate Calvinist; the question is upon what point he differs from him?—I think every Arian must believe that there was a time when Christ was not.

Do you conceive that every Calvinist must believe the contrary?—I may state that the Trinity was not one of the five points of Calvin; it is distinctly taught in Calvin's system; but it is not one of the five points. I think the Calvinist necessarily holds the co-equality of the Son of God with the Father. I think the Arian of every description must hold the old scholastic principle, that there was a time when Christ was not.

What are the sentiments of the High Arians as to the Holy Spirit?—As to that I think that the High Arian holds that the influence of the Holy Spirit was at first miraculous, and calculated to afford that information which was required in the first ages of Christianity; that he now believes, not in the miraculous influence, but in the continual operations of the Spirit of God operating upon the mind of man.

Do High or Low Arians consider the Holy Spirit an object of worship?—No.

Do the High or Low Arians consider it proper to address worship to Jesus Christ?—I should not object to those who might conscientiously address prayer to the Saviour of the world, but I should prefer those who offered up their prayers to God, through the Saviour; direct addresses in prayer to the Redeemer, are not common amongst Arians.

What is understood by the term "through the Saviour?"—That it has pleased Almighty God to extend his mercy to a guilty world, through the merits and mediation of the Saviour, and "not for works of righteousness that we have done."

Do you consider that you can of yourself be saved, or do such acts as will entitle you to salvation; or that you can only do such acts through the grace of God, communicated to

Examination of
Rev.
W. D. H. McEwen,
A. M.
13 October 1825.

you through the merits of Christ?—I distinctly hold, that we are not to be saved by our own acts, or Christ has died in vain; it is only through the grace of God strengthening us.

Do you receive that grace through the merits of Christ; if Christ had not died, do you think that grace would have been communicated to you?—I firmly believe, and regularly teach, that Christ died to make reconciliation for iniquity, as predicted in the Old Testament; and from the concurrent testimony of the New Testament, that “God hath made him to be sin, for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God through him.”

Do you hold that his death has made that atonement through which you receive grace from God?—I conceive distinctly, that Christ offered up himself a sacrifice for sin, the influence of which was not limited to the elect. I have uniformly taught that doctrine.

Do you conceive that sacrifice to be a vicarious sacrifice?—No; I do not hold the doctrine of vicarious sacrifice, as generally taught.

The Calvinists all hold that doctrine?—Yes, the strict Calvinists must all hold it; the reason we do not hold it, is, because we suppose it might supersede moral rectitude.

Why do you conceive it might supersede moral rectitude?—If Christ suffered in the place of an elect individual, that individual must be saved, whether virtuous or vicious, if he was substituted in his place.

Then the principle upon which you deny the vicarious sacrifice is, that the death of Christ was for mankind in general, and not limited to the elect?—Certainly.

Do you conceive the views you have been laying before us, fall under the description of High or Low Arianism?—I account myself a High Arian, perhaps one of the most so. I teach the doctrine of the atonement, and the forgiveness of sins through the Saviour of the world, and not the salvation of man through his own merits.

In whole, or in any degree?—I do not conceive that any works of righteousness we can do, considered in themselves, would have obtained the pardon of God without the merits and mediation of his Son.

Or that they form any part of the Atonement?—No, certainly not; but I agree with Calvin, when he says “Fides sola justificat; sed Fides non est sola.”

What do you understand by the term “Fides non est sola?”—That faith exists uniformly in connection with good works.

Is it your impression, that every minister of the Presbytery of Antrim is an Arian, according to your description of the term?—The general impression upon my mind is, that they are an Arian Presbytery; there are some of them whom, from their distance from me, I have never heard preach in my life-time.

Are the views of Christianity you entertain the same, or different from those taught by the professors of divinity, Dr. Hanna and Dr. Edgar?—Both Dr. Hanna and Dr. Edgar are Calvinists.

Are the ministers of the Presbytery of Antrim perfectly satisfied, that those young men who are to form their future ministers, should be educated in that Institution, where the only professors of divinity teach doctrines contrary to those the Presbytery approve of?—They have never objected to the general education in that seminary; several of those who have attended the professors of logic, moral philosophy, &c. and received the general certificate of the Institution, are Calvinists. I have never heard a single objection made by the Presbytery of Antrim, to the system of education of the young men in the Institution.

Does not it necessarily result, from this state of things, that the Presbytery is looking for Arian ministers at the hand of Calvinist instructors?—The Presbytery of Antrim consists of several very wealthy and respectable congregations, and they very seldom chuse their ministers from the young class of students; they rather prefer chusing men whose religious opinions and character have become in some degree known.

Then do they conclude, that they shall always have sufficient opportunity of choice to be able to supply themselves with Arian ministers, notwithstanding the instructions those ministers receive must be purely Calvinistic?—It is by no means a sine qua non, that a man in the Presbytery of Antrim should be an Arian; those are our general views.

Is the question of Arianism or Calvinism a question upon which the candidates for holy orders, in the Presbytery of Antrim, are examined?—Not at all.

What is the form of the examination of the students before you receive them into orders?—In all the introductory part we follow the same course as the Synod of Ulster; when we come to examine them on theology, we take the Greek Testament and Hebrew Bible as our text books.

Is it your impression, that any young men who have received the instruction of Dr. Hanna or Dr. Edgar have subsequently become Arians?—I conceive the great majority of those who have been either licensed or ordained, and were educated within the walls of the Institution, have been Orthodox men, in the popular sense of the word. I believe there may be one or two instances in which they have held different views; but in those cases their parents were themselves either Arian clergymen, or laymen supposed to hold those opinions. The great majority of those educated in the Institution have been of Orthodox sentiments.

Supposing the present state of things to continue, do you not foresee a contingent difficulty hereafter in the Presbytery of Antrim, in their being able to find a sufficient number of Arian teachers?—I have no fear of that nature, men's minds are so very differently constituted. I may be led to believe, that a very extended course of reading might lead men to entertain Arian sentiments. I do not see any contingent difficulty of supplying our congregations with moderate men; and I wish to see no others amongst us. We have no Socinians.

Do

249
 Examination of
 Rev.
 W. D. H. M'Ewen,
 A. M.
 13 October 1825.

Do you not conceive there would be a greater chance of Arianism resulting from a Scotch education than in the Belfast Institution?—The leading members of the Synod of Ulster have been educated in Glasgow.

Do you not think that more Arians proceeded out of the University of Glasgow for the Irish ministry than have proceeded, or are likely to proceed, from the Belfast Institution?—Comparing the number of students with the number of years, I conceive that Orthodox sentiments, in the popular sense of the term, have been generally adopted by students in Belfast, whilst, in corresponding number of years, many students have been induced to imbibe Arian principles at Glasgow.

Do you think that arose from the nature of the instruction they received in Glasgow, or from other causes?—It never came to my knowledge that Arianism was taught in the University of Glasgow.

You have mentioned that Orthodox principles were inculcated here; are they not inculcated also at Glasgow?—By the Professors of Theology, undoubtedly.

You were educated at Glasgow?—Yes.

Did you attend a course of theology there?—No, I did not; I was admitted to the ministry without having ever attended a theological class.

Did those gentlemen of the Synod of Ulster, who are now supposed to hold Arian principles, attend a course of theology lectures at Glasgow?—They did, generally.

Were those principles, which, in the common acceptation of the term, are called Orthodox principles, inculcated there as decidedly as in the Institution at Belfast?—During the period I was at Glasgow, the Professor of Theology held the situation till his faculties were very considerably impaired; his voice was quite indistinct, and from the information of those who attended, I must say, that the students were extremely inattentive; those who are acquainted with the University well know he held that situation till he was near eighty years of age.

In what Presbytery in Ireland did you receive orders?—In the Belfast Presbytery.

Is the Belfast Presbytery in connection with the Synod of Ulster?—Yes; my father had been a member of that presbytery.

When you were admitted to orders, did you sign any creed?—Yes; I stated that I believed the Westminster Confession of Faith contained the essential doctrines of Christianity; and so far I subscribed it. There was some difference among the members of the Presbytery; it was observed, that I might subscribe any creed in that way.

Were you examined, in any degree, upon the question in dispute between Arians and Calvinists?—I passed through a regular course of appointed subjects, and I delivered my opinions candidly before the presbytery who instructed me, and they expressed their opinions upon the doctrines I taught.

Did you hold then the doctrines you do now?—I did not; but I never held the principles of High Calvinism; I never believed in the doctrines of election and reprobation.

Did you then hold the doctrine of the Divinity of Christ as co-equal with the Father?—I had no subject given to me at the time which was calculated to bring out my sentiments upon that point, and I candidly confess I rejoiced at it.

You were not called upon to express any opinion upon the question in dispute?—I was not at that time. I then became a minister in the Dublin Presbytery, where I resided four years; I then became a member of the Dromore Presbytery, where I resided four years; and I have been eight years a member of the Presbytery of Antrim.

In any of those Presbyteries were you called upon to express any opinion upon those disputed points?—My opinions were known. The mode of subscription in the Dromore Presbytery is of the limited kind I have mentioned; there was a great disposition to avail themselves of the pacific act. A strict Calvinist would say, I believe the Westminster Confession of Faith contains the essential doctrines of Christianity, and I subscribe that as my confession of faith, which I would not have done. I said, I believed the Westminster Confession of Faith contained the essential doctrines of Christianity, and as such I signed it.

In how many and what Presbyteries is any subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith now required?—It is no longer imperative on any man to subscribe.

Although it is not imperative according to the laws of the Synod, is it not imperative according to the rules of some of the Presbyteries?—No Presbytery can insist upon a young man subscribing it in contravention of their code.

Can any Presbytery, although not requiring subscription to those articles, institute an examination upon each and every of those articles, and exclude a person who does not hold them?—They can enter into an examination upon every one of the doctrinal points contained; if they hesitate upon the sentiments of an individual, they can call upon him to state his own religious opinions in writing; that confession of faith is recorded in the presbytery book, and if it meets the approbation of two-thirds of the Presbytery, he is licensed; and if it does not meet the approbation of two-thirds of the Presbytery, his licence may be delayed.

Provided two-thirds of the Presbytery hold, no matter what opinion, the candidate may be licenced?—Yes, he must be licenced.

If two-thirds of any certain Presbytery happen to be simple Unitarians, by that term meaning Humanitarians, in that case might a Humanitarian be licensed and become a member of the Synod of Ulster?—I do not think we have a single Humanitarian in the Synod of Ulster; I know we have not in the Presbytery of Antrim.

Supposing that two-thirds of any Presbytery did happen to become Humanitarians, might they license a Humanitarian as a clergyman of that Presbytery?—Supposing that to take place, I conceive the discipline of the church would not be changed.

Examination of
Rev.
W. D. H. McEwen,
A. M.
13 October 1825.

It is not inconsistent with the discipline of the Synod of Ulster, that a Humanitarian might be admitted into that Synod?—I think he would find it very difficult; the simple rule is, that two-thirds of the Presbytery must agree touching the licence; and if that be the case, I conceive that the young man is licensed, as a matter of course. If the whole Presbytery changed their sentiments, that would not change their discipline.

Does the Synod, in any of its rules, lay down the course of examination to be pursued by each Presbytery?—Yes, every thing is prescribed from the examinations before going to college, and on the return of the student, the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth sessions, then extra judicial trials, and if he gives satisfaction, then he is put on judicial trials, and if he continues to satisfy the presbytery, he is licensed to preach the Gospel.

In the course of examination prescribed by the Synod, is any reference made to the question of Calvinism or Arianism?—Yes; I think very generally; it forms one part of their trials to explain a portion of the Greek Testament from the original, to state the doctrines, and state the objections opposed to the particular opinions mentioned in the text, and in those instances they are generally entirely of a doctrinal nature.

Then is it consistent, or is it inconsistent with the rules of the Synod, or the questions to be propounded in pursuance of the rules of the Synod, that a person holding Arian principles should be admitted to orders in the Presbyteries of the Synod of Ulster?—In several Presbyteries it would be deemed inconsistent.

How many Presbyteries are there altogether?—Lately they have founded the Presbytery of Connaught, which makes fifteen Presbyteries under the care of the Synod of Ulster.

In how many of those Presbyteries do you conceive an Arian would be admissible to orders?—I could not speak with precision upon that subject; I only speak of the four through which I have passed. I know they would be admissible in three. I think that Arminians or Arians would also be admitted in a fourth, perhaps in a fifth; but I should not wish to pronounce an authoritative opinion upon that subject respecting my brethren in the ministry.

Does the Synod possess or exercise the power of review, as to the ordination of a clergyman by the Presbytery; can they enter into the question, and confirm or reverse it?—Distinctly; if there be an appeal lodged against the ordination of a young gentleman, it stays the ordination till the Synod investigates the matter.

Must that appeal be offered by a member of the Presbytery?—Yes.

Can it be offered by another person?—A member of another Presbytery cannot prevent ordination by an appeal.

Can it be made by all of the members?—An elder might lodge an appeal to the Presbytery, but the appeal of an elder would not, I conceive, stay the license.

Would it be heard, if regularly brought before the Synod, in the same way as upon the motion of a clergyman?—Decidedly.

Is the question of Arianism a question upon which candidates for orders are examined in any of the Presbyteries?—I do not believe that question is put.

Are they examined upon any question involved in the question of Arianism?—They are examined, generally speaking, on theology, of course embracing that; but the practice of different Presbyteries differs according to the views the ministers entertain; in some Presbyteries the examinations would be very different from others.

In some Presbyteries, would it go closely to the substantial question in difference between Arians and Calvinists, and in others not?—There are some Presbyteries in which they would examine into the doctrines of original sin, and imputed righteousness, and other doctrines, and in others not.

Then the Synod of Ulster, as a body, at present lays down nothing specific upon those questions?—They have remarkably differed from their former practice by the passing of the late code; it is quite a new feature in the history of Presbyterianism in Ireland.

Superseding the necessity of subscription you mean?—Yes.

Is there any question of doctrine which would at present necessarily exclude the Presbytery of Antrim from a connection with the Synod of Ulster?—I really do not think there is; we agree with many Presbyteries, but old feelings and prejudices are still clinging around us. We could gain nothing in the Presbytery of Antrim, by submitting our decisions to the Synod of Ulster. We receive our bounty upon the same honourable terms, and are upon very good terms with many of the most enlightened members of the Synod. I have however seen no reason to keep us separate.

Have the Moderators of the Synod of Ulster been in the usual practice of visiting the academy in their capacity of Visitors, do they attend regularly?—Several of the Moderators live at a very great distance; but they are obliged by virtue of their office to have a pretty accurate knowledge of it, as their signature is necessary to the general certificate at the close of a student's studies; many who lived in the vicinity have been in the habit of visiting it very frequently, and others who have lived at a great distance, have been almost unavoidably prevented from attending.

It has been stated to us, as the belief of some persons, that Arianism principally prevails among the upper ranks in this vicinity; is that your own impression?—I have certainly heard that said; but I beg to state, that in Dr. Hanna's congregation, there are some of the wealthiest and most respectable members of society, who are Calvinists. The first and second congregations comprise a great proportion of the respectability of Belfast.

Is it your opinion, ceteris paribus, there is a somewhat greater tendency among the higher orders to adopt the Creed of the Arians?—Yes, I think there is; but there are many of the higher orders who are Calvinists.

Let us take the Managers of the Institution as an example; what is the number of acting Managers at present?—About twenty.

What

251

Examination of
Rev.
W. D. H. M'Ewen,
A. M.
13 October 1825.

What proportion of the twenty are Presbyterians?—There are three members of the Established Church, and the rest are Presbyterians of different denominations; to this I beg to add, that taking into consideration the Parliamentary Visitors, who (with the exception of the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster) are all members of the Established Church; the preponderance is even at present upon the side of the Orthodox party, using that term, in a popular, not in an invidious sense.

What proportion of the Presbyterians do you conceive to be persons entertaining Arian sentiments?—I think I could conscientiously state, there are six or seven of those who hold Arian sentiments.

Do you hold any situation in the Belfast Institution different from that of Visitor?—I lecture on elocution in the Institution.

Were you appointed to that office or situation by the Managers, or by any other authority?—By the Managers and Visitors. I was permitted to lecture in the Institution. It had always been a part of the education of students intended for the ministry, prescribed by the Synod, and on the removal of Mr. Knowles, I offered myself as a candidate for the situation.

Do you receive any emolument?—None excepting the fees of the students.

Do you hold that appointment during good behaviour, or upon any other terms, or at will?—I think the joint boards of Managers and Visitors might remove me. I do not hold my situation as a professor does.

Can you explain why you are not appointed under the same terms as the other professors are?—I believe they were guided in it by the practices of the colleges in Scotland; the lecturer on elocution there is not a member of the Faculty.

Do you conceive yourself subject to the jurisdiction of the Managers and Visitors, exactly in the same manner as the professors?—Yes, to have the class inspected, and the mode of my teaching reported upon.

Do you conceive there is any other difference between your situation and that of any other professor, except that they receive salaries, and you none?—Yes; I believe that the Managers and Visitors could remove me at their pleasure.

Do you conceive there is any other difference, except such as you have stated?—I am not a member of the Faculty.

How long is it since you were appointed to that situation?—I think I have delivered lectures since 1818 or 1819. I cannot speak with precision.

Do you see, yourself, any necessity or good sense in the rule that places the teacher of elocution upon a footing so different from that of the other teachers?—I know the liberality of the Managers so well, that I have never felt any uneasiness.

With respect to salary, and other things?—I cannot expect they would differ from the practice of the colleges of Scotland, in the present state of their funds.

What fees do the students pay for attending your course?—I lectured to eighty students last year.

What is the amount of the fee they pay?—One guinea; but I have never received a fee from a clergyman's son.

What is the amount altogether you receive in the course of a year?—About sixty guineas.

Is that the whole emolument attached to your situation?—Yes.

Will you describe particularly the nature of the course of instruction you deliver?—On the Monday in each week, I give a detailed account of the respective systems of Sheridan, Walker, Chapman and Knowles; on three other days in each week, I examine the students in The Elocutionist, requiring them to give an account of the principles that have been inculcated on Monday; and on Friday in each week they are in the habit of reciting.

What do they recite?—Passages from the work entitled The Elocutionist, Extracts from Campbell, the Pleasures of Hope, from Gertrude of Wyoming, passages from Shakspeare, and from other dramatic poets.

Is the distribution of premiums an incident to your mode of instruction?—Yes.

At whose expense are they provided, and what is the nature of them?—At my own expense, and, generally speaking, they are works of a philosophical or of a literary kind, such as Paradise Lost, the Pleasures of Hope, and so on; but I think I ought to state, that, on one occasion, I gave Enfield's Prayers and Price's Sermons, which was the subject afterwards of Synodical observation; it occurred in one instance. I had no intention of making proselytes at the time, but it is merely candid to state the fact.

Are Enfield's Prayers a separate book from Price's Sermons?—Yes.

Are those prayers marked by any Arianism in their character?—They are remarkably moderate; they are not certainly Trinitarian addresses to the Deity.

Are these addresses such as a Calvinist would object to?—Mr. Cooke did object to them, who is a very respectable man, and a strict Calvinist.

Is Price's Sermons an Arian book?—Yes, decidedly, but giving one of the most moderate views of the doctrine. It is distinctly opposed to Priestley.

Was that a single instance, in which you had given Price's Sermons?—It only occurred during one session, and it was scarcely done when I regretted it myself. I might mention, that a young gentleman actually applied to me, knowing the Presbytery of Antrim had republished the book; it was an act of inconsideration on my part.

The particular individual who obtained the book had asked for it before you suggested it to him?—Yes.

Had the other boy who obtained Enfield's Prayers as a premium, suggested it?—No.

Examination of
Rev.
W. D. H. M^cEwen,
A. M.
13 October 1825.

Did it occur to you that these had been inconsiderate acts, before they became the subject of remark by other persons?—No; the moment it became the subject of remark, I regretted it, and have since avoided it.

Upon the whole, was there more than one copy of Enfield's Prayers, and one copy of Price's Sermons given?—Yes; during that year there were, (I could ascertain the number), perhaps, two copies of Enfield's Prayers, and two copies of Price's Sermons; there could not have been more than three altogether.

Had the other boy, or boys, who obtained the other copies of Price's Sermons, applied in like manner?—No, they had not.

Was the boy who applied for it supplied first?—At that time I took eight students under my own care; he was in my own house during the whole of the session. I was so careful I would not permit an Arian book out of my own library to be admitted into his room. He knew I had Price's Sermons, and he asked me for a copy of them. I took eight students at that time; and, answering as I am upon oath, I would not allow an Arian book to be taken from my own library to their apartments.

Was it before or after his application to you that the other boy got the premium?—The distribution is on the first of May, so that the whole transaction takes place, perhaps, in four or five minutes.

Was it at the moment of distribution, or some time before, that the boy asked it of you?—Perhaps four or five days previously.

Was the other purely casual?—I had no intention of proselyting the individuals. I had the books in my library handsomely bound, and I may say it was accidental.

Were the persons to whom you gave those books intended for the ministry?—Yes, and moreover exceedingly opposed to my own religious opinions; that is, they are Calvinists.

The Commissioners have heard something of a visit paid by an individual of the name of Smethurst to Belfast, some years ago; will you explain the nature of that visit?—I understand he is a Humanitarian, who brought letters of introduction from a friend of mine in England, to me. He called upon me, and I rendered him any service in my power. I never asked him to preach in my pulpit, nor did he ever officiate for me. I gave him letters of introductions to two or three individuals, whose sentiments were more congenial to his own.

What did you understand to be his object in visiting the place?—To preach the simple doctrine of the Humanity of Christ. I told him that I did not agree with him.

Did he preach here at all?—Yes, he did, I believe at the Lancasterian school. I heard him once.

Did you collect from him at whose expense he came here?—At the expense of the Unitarian fund in England, I believe.

Did he express any wish to establish a congregation here?—Not to my knowledge; he would have met with no encouragement.

Do you know to whom application was made for permission to preach in the Lancasterian school?—I presume it must have been made to the members of the committee; I am not a member of it.

Was that application in any way forwarded by you?—I introduced him to two of the members of my congregation, who were members of the committee, and stated that his views differed from mine.

Did you ever state he came to preach "your doctrines"?—That has been stated by a very respectable gentlemen, but I do not believe I could have used that expression.

Or words to that effect?—No, because his doctrines are opposed to mine; that has been made a charge against me; but upon looking back, to the best of my recollection, I did not say so.

You say, in point of fact, his doctrine is opposed to yours?—Yes.

Did he bring letters of introduction to any other person in Belfast?—I presume he did, to a clergyman in the vicinity, and also from a Unitarian clergyman in Birmingham, to his father and friends here.

How long did he stay at Belfast?—A very short time; he was not asked to preach either in the first or the second congregation, and of course not in the third or fourth, and his labours were chiefly confined to Downpatrick and the vicinity of Saintfield.

Do you know what became of him afterwards?—He returned to England, and published a short account of his mission here.

What was the result of that account?—I should suppose that he had not met with much encouragement.

Did he preach in any of the pulpits of the Synod of Ulster?—I believe in point of fact he did; I believe he preached in Moneyrea.

Did you introduce him to any pulpit?—I think he brought letters of introduction to the minister of that congregation, and I introduced him to several other individuals.

Did you recommend him as an individual fit to preach in any of the pulpits of the Synod?—I spoke of him as a man most respectable, and well recommended to me, but I did not say I agreed with him in point of doctrine.

Did you mention that he held doctrines that were not yours?—Several years have elapsed, and I do not know that I have copies of the letters, but from my general habits I can affirm, that if he stated he was a Socinian, I would have taken care to state I did not identify myself with his principles.

Are we to understand that you recommended him to be allowed to preach doctrines you did not approve of?—No.

Did

253

Did you intend that your letters should be in any degree passports to the pulpits of the Synod of Ulster, or any of them?—I spoke of him as a respectable man, and I left to the minister the exercise of his own discretion, whether he would or not employ him; we are very cautious in interfering with the Synod of Ulster.

Did that gentleman preach in Dr. Neilson's pulpit in Downpatrick?—I believe he did.

Is that in connection with the Presbytery of Antrim?—Yes.

Is there any congregation there in connection with the Synod of Ulster?—No.

Is there any second congregation in which the principles of Calvinism are taught?—No; there is an attempt making to found one; but there is not one at present, and I beg to add, that the present attempt is altogether irregular.

There is no chapel or meeting-house in Belfast belonging to the Humanitarian body?—I never understood there was.

Did you ever hear him use these words when preaching, "that every Trinitarian was like the worshippers of Diana, and taught the divinity of the Saviour, not because he believed it, but because he got his bread by it?"—I never heard him state that.

If he had used those expressions should you have recommended him to your friends?—Certainly not.

If you had heard him make use of those expressions, what should you have thought of him yourself?—I should have thought him a very unfit persons to preach to any Christian society.

Did you understand that the gentleman referred to in the preceding questions, alluded to politics in the pulpit?—During the time I heard him, I think once or perhaps twice in the Lancasterian school, I have no idea he introduced politics; he would have disgusted a great number if he had.

Have you understood whether he introduced politics in other places in Ireland in the pulpit?—I saw him twice or three times in my own house, and I am not fond of introducing politics, nor did he introduce them in my house; what he did in other congregations I cannot say, but he did not introduce political discussions in my hearing.

Do you know of any Unitarian or Socinian meeting houses, as contra-distinguished from merely Arian meeting houses, in Ireland?—I do not know of a Socinian meeting house or chapel in Ireland; there may be in Dublin; but from long absence from that city, I cannot speak with certainty.

Which are they, High Arians or Low Arians, that preach in the Strand-street meeting house, in Dublin?—I presume Mr. Armstrong and Dr. Drummond hold nearly the same views of the Arian hypothesis that we hold in the Presbytery of Antrim, differing perhaps in some points from Dr. Bruce's theory, and agreeing with the writings of Dr. Samuel Clarke.

You do not conceive that Socinian or Humanitarian doctrines are taught in Strand-street?—I do not.

What was the name of your meeting house in Dublin?—Usher's Quay.

Does the body of Arians to which you belong hold that our Saviour was created by God the Father before all worlds?—Yes; and that he was the agent in the creation of the material world, which we contemplate; we hold most strictly, that in the fulness of time, he laid aside that glory which he had with the Father before the world was, and was found in fashion as a man, and that by him were all things made that were made.

Have you anything distinct upon the doctrine whether God the Father has communicated his own nature to him or not in any degree?—Holding as I do, that Christ is the first and the greatest of created beings, I must believe that there is a distinction between the nature of God the Father and the Son. What the nature of the relation is, that the Son bears to the Father, in common with many writers upon the Arian hypothesis, I never attempted to define.

At the time of the election of Mr. Bruce, was he supported or opposed by the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster?—Decidedly recommended by the Moderator at that period, Mr. Reid; and recommended in a manner I did not think quite Presbyterian or constitutional; he was recommended in the contemplation of the Parliamentary grant being renewed. It was stated by the Moderator, that this would reconcile all parties, and that he had it from high authority that the Parliamentary grant might be renewed.

Was the Moderator of that day a person of Orthodox principles or not?—I never heard him preach, and I only judge from his intimate acquaintance with Mr. Bruce, that he must have been aware of his sentiments.

He represented the Synod of Ulster upon that occasion?—Yes; he introduced himself to the notice of the meeting, by informing them he was the Moderator of that body and attended in his official capacity to give his vote.

Does the practice that is common in some of the Scotch Universities prevail here, of the students in the college forming themselves into societies, either for the purposes of debating or for literary purposes?—There is generally a society of that kind formed, but the condition is that it shall be formed under the inspection and with the approbation of the professors, and in no other instance.

Is there any matter, either as affecting your own situation, or concerning the interests of the Institution generally, you would wish to take this opportunity of expressing to the Commissioners?—No; I am perfectly satisfied with my own situation, and from the pledge given by the Board of Faculty, I am perfectly satisfied with their inspection and management of the seminary.

Is the character of the intercourse the professors hold with each other in the Board of Faculty marked by harmony, or by opposite sentiments?—Decidedly by harmony and

Examination of
Rev.
W. D. H. M'Ewen,
A. M.
13 October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
W. D. H. M'Ewen,
A. M.
13 October 1825.

cordiality; admitting on literary questions those differences that may be found in any university.

So far as your experience goes, does harmony also prevail among the students?—In a very great degree.

Appendix, N° 12.

Examination of Mr. John Stevelly, A. M.; Thursday, 13th October 1825.

Examination of
Mr.
J. Stevelly, A. M.
13 October 1825.

WHAT situation do you hold in the Institution?—I am Professor of Natural Philosophy, in general, including Chemistry, as part of it.

How long have you held that situation?—I was elected on the 5th of August, 1823.

Were you known to any or how many of the electors, previous to your appointment?—I never knew one of the electors previously to the 13th or 14th of June before my election, nor did I even then become more acquainted with them, than the passing circumstance of being called into the board-room, and introduced to some of them on my coming to Belfast, to inquire into the circumstances of the professorship.

Was there any competition with you?—Considerable; but from motives of delicacy I never inquired into the circumstances of the election, except that I heard there were two of the candidates that had received votes for the appointment; I became in some measure acquainted with the votes.

What was the nature of the testimonials you laid before the electors, as to your own qualifications?—My friends had sent testimonials to me to lay before the Boards.

State who they were from, and the nature of their contents?—I received a testimonial from the twenty-five Fellows of the University of Dublin; in fact, from all except the Provost, stating that I had received all the honours I looked for in my under graduate course, had got the mathematical premium, and the gold medal on leaving the college, had sat for a fellowship, and twice divided the Board at elections for a fellowship; I got equal votes at one time, four for me and four against me; and at another time, there was a majority against me. I had also testimonials from the Archbishop of Dublin, the Bishop of Ferns and Leighlin, Dr. Brinkley, Professor of Astronomy, T. C. D., Dr. Robinson, Astronomer at the Observatory, Armagh, and private letters from many of the fellows and ex-fellows.

Did you receive any particular testimonials, as to the particular qualifications necessary in a professor of chemistry or natural philosophy?—No; as to chemistry, I beg to state, that I had not applied myself particularly to it; when a boy I had amused myself with it; and I begged of those persons who gave me testimonials to state the fact, and that was one objection to me at my election; however I applied myself to chemistry very assiduously from the moment I conceived I had a chance of getting out of Trinity College, and I received a testimonial from Dr. Barker, the Professor of Chemistry there, stating, that from my anxiety to learn, and the ability I evinced, he considered I should make myself master of the science.

Did you receive any testimonial as to the practical part of natural philosophy?—I cannot say I did, as to the practical part; the Commissioners know how completely theoretical instruction is in Trinity College.

Do you conceive that you have at present supplied to yourself a sufficient quantity of chemical knowledge to enable you to discharge the duties of professor?—It is the part I am now most fond of; and considering the facilities I have here, I think I have made myself well acquainted with it, but they are very inconsiderable; there is no laboratory, and the principal preparations I am obliged to make in an oven at home; almost nothing of this kind is to be got in Belfast.

Do you not conceive that it is absolutely and essentially indispensable to the due discharge of your duties, that you should be provided with a laboratory?—Yes, if the funds were sufficient; but I could not call on the Institution for it now.

The question is put to show the necessity of providing a fund?—It is absolutely indispensable.

Have you any sufficient theatre in which to deliver chemical lectures?—There is a hall well adapted for some lectures; but it is not fitted for mechanical lectures or chemical lectures.

Do you deliver lectures on optics?—Yes.

Do you not conceive that a lecture-room for chemistry, or mechanics, or optics, should be constructed?—Yes; I have no place in which I can make experiments upon the sun's rays, unless I rise at six o'clock.

Do you not think such a lecture-room ought to be furnished with a certain number of different furnaces, and other things?—Yes; perhaps the furnaces should not be in the lecture-room, but adjacent.

Do you conceive there would be any indisposition, on the part of the Managers, to provide you with these means, if funds were in their power?—They have shown the greatest anxiety to do every thing for me; they have at all times answered any call I have made; but I am convinced that the professors have always, or latterly, held it as a rule to call for as little as possible. I have been at expense myself; I never call for any thing I can avoid. Of the money I lay out on preparations, I only call, in general, for sums which I expend in glass and and apparatus, and in things that would remain for them; but any thing I use at my own lectures, that is of a fleeting nature, I never call on them for.

What is the amount of your salary as professor?—I receive 150*l.* a year from the Institution.

How much from your class?—67*l.* the first year, and 87*l.* this last session, from the students connected with the Presbyterian Church; but there is another class I am bound to attend to in the summer, distinct from the former.

What class is that?—The students connected with the Presbyterian Church form a species of collegiate class, and I am not bound to give them chemical lectures; they receive only a species of collegiate education, fitting them for the ministry. I however am bound to give a popular course of lectures in the summer to any mechanics who shall comply with certain regulations; this lectureship being established by the Linen Hall, or recommended by it; and with that class I receive 5*s.* from each for one course, and 7*s.* 6*d.* for the other.

How much may that produce?—This year I got 65*l.* and perhaps a pound more for tickets. The Mechanics Institute came in a body, and gave me 65*l.* to attend my lectures this year.

Do you conceive, if you had every proper facility afforded you to give a proper course of chemical lectures, that there is in this town a desire to take advantage of it?—I think so.

Do you think it would be numerously attended?—I have a doubt, if the fees were made large, whether it would be numerously attended.

How many mechanics attended your lectures?—For the introductory lectures, for the first fortnight, before they were called upon to pay an additional sum, I may safely say 400 attended me; but when they were called on to pay their subscriptions, I found them gradually falling off, and at last they were reduced to a very low number; and since the lectures have ceased, I understand the Mechanics Institute has dwindled down to one hundred.

You are a clergyman of the Established Church?—No, I never took orders; I am a member of the Established Church.

Have you ever heard of any interference with the religious opinions of any pupils attending in the schools or classes of the Institution, by the professors?—Never; they are bound, distinctly, not to interfere; of course, I exclude the two Professors of Theology. I am quite convinced there has been no attempt, at least that has come to the knowledge of any person, of that kind.

So far as your experience and knowledge go, is there any feeling of disaffection to the Government of the country prevalent amongst the Professors or Masters of the Institution?—Quite the contrary; I am quite satisfied there is not in the country a more loyal body than the Professors, and all connected with the Institution with whom I am acquainted. I have never heard a disaffected sentiment in the Institution. I was particularly warned by friends in Dublin to be cautious how I embroiled myself in political opinions; in consequence of the name Belfast had got, I was afraid; I came here under feelings of fear, both as to theological disputes and politics also; but I found I had no cause to be afraid; I found them a perfectly loyal people.

Do you conceive that the Institution at Belfast might be considered as a fit place for candidates for the ministry of the Established Church to be educated in?—I could not exactly answer that question; I think Trinity College is the proper place for persons connected with the ministry of the Established Church.

The question did not imply the exclusion of Trinity College, but applied to the preparatory course which a young man goes through before entering the University?—I think it would be just as good as any other school they could be at.

You think there would be no danger of their religious principles being tampered with?—I think quite the contrary. Conceiving, as I do, the Church of England to approach nearer than any other with which I am acquainted to the true spirit of Christianity, I think it must gain by members of other creeds having an opportunity of becoming intimately acquainted with its tenets and practice. I know three young gentlemen who had been Presbyterians, who are now candidates for fellowships in Trinity College, Dublin; and many zealous clergymen of the Established Church could be named, who had been when they entered Trinity College, Roman Catholics. In Trinity College, in Dublin, Presbyterians and Roman Catholics are admitted without signature; and they afterwards find that the opinions of the Church of England men are not so very discordant with their own views as they were led to suppose; they find that there are very profitable employments which they can get into, and they begin to question whether they might not attend to those without hurting their consciences. In consequence of which, there are many Presbyterian families in this town, whose sons being sent to Trinity College, have become Church of England men, whilst the rest of the family have remained Presbyterians.

The question applied to the Institution of Belfast?—I conceive, what is true of one place is true of the other. In the English Universities no such practice is admitted, and no such consequences follow; and, consequently, I conceive the same remark would hold true, by similarity of reasoning, of the Belfast Institution.

You do not mean that Presbyterian students are excluded from the English Universities?—Yes, I conceive they are, unless they sign the thirty-nine articles.

From your experience of the Institution of Belfast, do you conceive that persons ultimately destined for the ministry of the Established Church, or the Presbyterian Church, would be perfectly safe in passing through the Institution, so far as the instruction they receive in the Institution goes, independent of the divinity lectures?—I conceive perfectly safe

Examination of
Mr.
J. Stevelly, A. M.
13 October 1825.

safe; I cannot conceive that there could be the least interference with their religious tenets.

Might the Roman Catholics pass through in the same manner?—Yes, I have no doubt they can go through in the same manner; I have heard there was a gentleman intended for the college of Maynooth, at the Institution lately. This young gentleman was, as I have heard and believe, adjudged a premium by the votes of his fellow students, which shows the kindly feeling that subsists.

Do the Professors in the Institution strictly abstain in the course of their lectures, or in their intercourse with their pupils, from any statement that might inculcate their particular religious principles?—From all that I have been able to collect, I do conceive, if any thing contrary to their own opinions occurred, they would tell them there were different opinions about it, and in all probability ask them to apply to others, if there was such a difference likely to exist as would be a material difference. I speak of one particularly, my old and respected schoolmaster and friend, Mr. Hincks; he is a most conscientious man in every respect.

You are of opinion, that no one professor would be likely to explain any particular subject, in such a way as to favour any particular view he might entertain?—It is a very hard thing for a man, holding a particular opinion, to avoid appearing to do so; but they would not do it designedly, and they have not many means of doing so. I am convinced they would conscientiously avoid it as far as human nature is capable of so doing.

Does any thing occur to you, which you would wish to suggest to the Commissioners as likely to benefit the Institution?—The room I lecture in during the winter is a most inconvenient room, and independently of the room itself, it is attended by, I believe, five different classes at different hours; I have a great quantity of apparatus to bring out from the apparatus room, and which I must bring out and take in myself. I have scarcely finished the last sentence of my lecture, when a troop of young lads, who have only just entered college, come in, meeting my class going out; the table is just inside the door, and it could not be placed any where else; the consequence is great danger to the apparatus, and next to an impossibility on my part, to give the degree of care to it that is necessary; the apparatus room is applied to different purposes; a kind of museum which is very imperfect; it is also the only repository that the Professor of Anatomy has for his bones and anatomical preparations, sometimes even subjects; the Professor of Mathematics makes use of it for his purposes occasionally, and many other persons have keys; the consequence of all is, that there are only two presses, and a few drawers for my apparatus, and they are all huddled together in such a way, that it is almost impossible for me to separate them, and no person could I entrust with the keys. I cannot properly classify the apparatus in any way. In mechanics, there are tall pieces of apparatus, and in chemistry the same, and I must put them together in the place which is spacious enough for them; and so also in other instances, and I have only my own house for preparing the corrosive liquids and preparations, the danger of bursting being very great; an accident once did take place; I was nearly smothered myself whilst endeavouring to secure the apparatus from injury. I should also like to mention to the Commissioners, some of the peculiar advantages of the course in the Institution connected with the education of the pupils. I conceive that the examinations at the end of the session, are most useful; they excite a spirit of emulation both in the teachers and in the taught, who are placed as it were before their friends and the country; we cannot make a secret of the proficiency of the students; the consequence is, we are all most anxious to attend to the students, and there is scarcely any student who has not obtained some knowledge of the business. The greater number consists of those who have made considerable proficiency, whilst the exceptions are those who have made little progress.

Are those examinations numerously attended?—Yes, they are; particularly on the closing days.

And by the parents of the children?—Yes, and the two Moderators, and many others also attend; the class premiums are of great consequence; the class assemble the day previous to the examination, and vote premiums in the proportion of one to five; the students vote it themselves to those who have been most attentive during the session; the consequence is, that they are obliged, during the entire of the session, to be on their guard even among their fellows. I also consider the medal examinations, that have been established, are of great consequence; for they excite emulation among the pupils to learn the higher branches of mathematics and natural philosophy; the prizes for composition enable us to prepare the pupils for afterwards becoming historians, and persons qualified to write statistical surveys. I consider all these matters of prime importance in the curriculum; there are many others, which, if time and opportunity permitted, could be insisted upon.*

Do they answer the purpose for which they were intended?—Yes; but there may be improvements, and most anxious are the professors, and all connected with the Institution, to seek out faults, and correct them if they exist.

So far as your experience goes, does perfect harmony exist among the professors and masters, and among the students?—I was never in so large a society where there was such harmony

* It has been objected in the public papers, that the emulation for honours in the Belfast Institution is not greater than in Trinity College for fellowships and scholarships. It would be strange if it were; a fellowship in college is worth, at least, 1,000*l.* per annum on an average; a scholarship, besides giving a vote for a member of Parliament, has considerable emolument and privileges attached to it. We can certainly hold out no inducements to the exertions of young men at all commensurate to these, and I am sorry for it.

257

harmony existing. I do not recollect any place, in which persons of such different sentiments, and such different pursuits, draw so well together. I recollect only one instance of an unpleasant occurrence; there has been, I think, an attempt to divide the professors, by praising some and dispraising others in the newspapers. I mean on the part of persons that have regularly shown hostility to the Institution, endeavouring to sow dissension among us; holding some of us up as examples where there was no particular distinction to be noticed.

And it has failed in its object?—Yes; I think it has even drawn the bonds of fellowship closer between us; those individuals disclaimed a wish to be praised in that manner. It has been objected to the Professors of the Institution, that although they did not, perhaps poison the religious opinions of the students, they starved them by entering into the unhallowed compact, that they will not interfere with religious opinions; now in my mind it is not a starving, where there is a person appointed to feed them. On board of ship, if all the sailors were to become cooks, neither the helm, nor the sails, nor the rigging, would be attended to; the ship would perish.

You consider that the several professors faithfully endeavour to afford that knowledge to their pupils, which the particular professorship is calculated to convey, independently of doctrinal matters?—I do.

Do you consider, that the exclusion of persons of any particular religious opinions, whether Arian or otherwise, would be beneficial or injurious to the Institution?—I think it is a most difficult question to answer satisfactorily; I conceive, if the Institution was like Trinity College, a place established to rear persons of a particular way of thinking, there it would be right to shut all others out; but where it is not for that object, and where those persons that cry out are the minority, I do conceive it would be very wrong to exclude.

You conceive, having regard to the particular principles upon which the Institution was founded, and not speaking in the abstract, such exclusion would be improper?—Yes, certainly; I am also Librarian of the Institution for this year, and I beg to lay before the Commissioners a catalogue of the books in the library.

The witness delivered in the same, and added—

The Commissioners will perceive books among the list, that they may perhaps conceive to be improper to put into the hands of students, for instance, "Hobbes's Leviathan," and "Mandeville's Fable of the Bees," and other books of that class; but Dr. Young considers it would be impossible to conduct the business of his class without such works. I would also add, that those persons who voted against me on my appointment, are those I am now in the warmest habits of friendship with; and they have stated, that the ground of their objection to me was my ignorance of the science of chemistry. I have also heard it asserted, that they have since expressed their full approbation of me, even in this department.

Appendix, No. 13.

Examination of Dr. James Lawson Drummond, M. D.; Thursday, 13th October 1825.

WHAT situation do you hold in the Belfast Institution?—That of Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.

Where were you educated?—At Edinburgh; I mean my medical education.

How long is it since you were appointed to your present situation?—I have been appointed since December 1818; seven years.

What are the emoluments attached to it?—I may say, that at present there are no emoluments whatever; my salary was 50*l.*; but two years ago the funds being very low, I made a voluntary resignation of it, till the funds may be in a better state.

Have you any emoluments resulting from fees from students who attend your class?—My expenses fully counterbalance it.

How much is the gross?—The admission fee is a guinea; the average number of students is about twelve; but this last year the clergymen's sons belonging to the Synod were admitted free.

How many students are there generally?—The number varies, the most I have had is fifteen.

Describe the nature of your course?—It differs in a very material degree from the courses of anatomy taught in medical schools; it embraces a very wide field of natural history and a good deal of natural theology; there is scarcely a fact in Paley's Natural Theology that is not explained and illustrated, and a great deal more of the like description.

Is there any thing of comparative anatomy?—Yes, a great deal.

Is there any thing of actual dissection of the human subject?—For several winters, at first, I had a little human dissection, but latterly it has been almost entirely given up.

Have you sufficient facilities for the illustration of so extensive a course as your answer describes?—No; I have been working completely in trammels for want of proper specimens.

Does it occur to you, that such facilities could at any moderate expense be supplied to you?—When this class was first established, I contemplated it myself as forming the beginning of a medical school, but my ideas on that subject have been very much changed, for I think there can be no efficient medical school in a provincial town; but still I think the course taught here is of very high consequence to young men first commencing their studies, even in the medical profession.

Examination of
Mr.
J. Stevelly, A. M.
13 October 1825.

Examination of
Dr.
J. L. Drummond,
M. D.
13 October 1825.

Examination of
Dr.
J. L. Drummond,
M. D.
13 October 1825.

Is not the subject of Physiology and Comparative Anatomy deemed of considerable importance, even in the preparation for the Presbyterian ministry?—I think it must be of great importance.

Is your certificate required by the Synod of Ulster?—No, it is not.

Are those facilities that you state you want there, such as could be supplied at a moderate expense, for instance, for a few hundred pounds?—I am sure it could; one of the greatest inconveniencies under which I labour, is the want of room; I know it is the intention of the Boards, when they are able to do it, to afford accommodations for the Professor of Anatomy, and for his museum and dissecting room. In the room I lecture in now, there are no less than five Professors lecturing in the course of the day; when formerly I was in the habit of getting human subjects or parts of them from Dublin, the museum of the Institution was obliged to be shut up; during the time the subject was there no strangers could be admitted. My opinion now is, that every thing necessary could be taught without having recourse to the recent human subject.

By preparations to be contained in the museum?—Yes; by a collection of injected and moist preparations, and of drawings and specimens of natural history; and it strikes me, that it would be here more desirable than the dissection of the recent subject, which sometimes gives an incurable disgust to the young students.

Is it your opinion if those increased facilities were supplied to you, there would be any considerable increase of attendance in your class?—I think it very probable there would; I have always, as it is, had a number of young medical men, apothecaries, apprentices and others, attending me.

Of what religious communion are you?—I am a Presbyterian; I attend Dr. Hanna's house.

From your attending Dr. Hanna's house, we may presume you are of Orthodox principles?—Yes.

How long have you been acquainted with the Institution of Belfast?—I have been connected with it since 1817: before I was appointed Professor, I gave a course of lectures upon anatomy, chiefly upon osteology and diseases of the bones.

From your acquaintance with the Institution, can you say whether, in any instances, the religion of the persons attending the several professors, or any of them, has been interfered with?—I believe never.

Has any professor, to your knowledge or according to your belief, ever taken advantage of the opportunities afforded him by his office to inculcate, or without inculcating, to instil particular principles into the minds of his students?—No; I never heard nor suspected such a thing, nor knew such a thing.

Are you intimately acquainted with the different professors of the Institution?—I am, with them all.

Do you conceive that any of them would be capable of availing himself of his situation as a professor, to extend his religious communion, by teaching or by supporting particular religious principles in the course of the instruction given by him to his pupils?—I certainly believe not.

So far as your experience goes, has the Institution advanced or receded in public confidence, in the last six years?—I think it has increased very much; I think it has every year been taking firmer root in the mind of the public.

Is it the habit of any of the professors to make a show or boast of their religious principles, whether Arian or Orthodox?—Not that I know of, with the exception of such as are clergy; of course they will, in their pulpits, preach their own doctrines.

In private society?—I am not aware that any of them are at all jealous in that respect.

If you had a child, whom you were disposed to educate for the ministry, would you hesitate to commit him to the care of any of the masters or professors in the Institution, who are supposed to favour Arian principles, so far as the particular course of instruction, which it is their duty to communicate, goes?—No; I should not have the slightest fear.

Is there any thing peculiar to your own situation, or connected with the welfare of the Institution at large, you would wish to take this opportunity of stating to the Commissioners?—I may mention, that for two or three years past, it has struck me, that it would be a matter of great importance and utility as soon as my class can become efficient, from proper accommodation and specimens, that it should be laid open to all the students of divinity.

Is it not open to them?—No. My meaning is, that they should be allowed to attend the class, free of expense; it is not incumbent on, but altogether optional with the divinity students to attend it, and a number of them are not in circumstances sufficiently easy, if they had an inclination, to submit voluntarily to the expense, small as it is; I have had that only in idea, however, when the class will become properly efficient.

And you have a desire that they should have it afforded gratuitously?—Yes; I think it would be of very great utility.

Only the divinity students?—No; I would only throw it open to them; I would wish to observe further, that I have also taught botany in the Institution, and I would probably have gone on teaching it, but for the great inconvenience and difficulty I found in collecting specimens; my opinion is, that a sufficiently useful botanic garden could be established and kept up at a very small expense; the great number of hardy plants that have been introduced of late years would almost entirely do away the necessity for hot-houses, for which works, containing coloured engravings, would form a good and permanent substitute.

How many courses did you deliver on botany?—Only one.

Was it attended by others besides the students?—Yes; I disposed of about fifty tickets; of that course, I afterwards published an outline.

259

Appendix, No. 14.

Examination of Dr. John Young, LL.D.; Friday, 14th October, 1825.

WHAT office do you hold in the Belfast Institution?—Professor of Metaphysics and Moral Philosophy.

Examination of
Dr.

Are you a clergyman?—No.

J. Young, LL.D.
14 October 1825.

You are a native of Scotland?—Yes.

What time were you appointed to your professorship?—I was the first elected professor; it took place on the 2d September 1815.

Were you acquainted with many of the electors previous to your appointment?—Not one.

In what manner did you become recommended to their notice?—Chiefly by the professors of Glasgow University, and some other literary friends.

Was there any competition for the appointment?—There was.

Were there any Belfast candidates?—There were.

To what circumstance do you attribute that you were elected in preference to them?—It is rather a delicate matter for me to say, because it might seem to enter into my own merits. I did attribute it partly to one circumstance, which was, that although I was not acquainted with any of the electors, I learned there was a considerable number of my old college acquaintance residing in this town and neighbourhood. The first day I came, I was informed by several persons that I had no chance, but I found the next morning, that a very strong feeling had been raised in my favor by the kindness of my old college friends.

Will you describe the nature and particulars of the course of lectures you deliver?—The earlier part of the course is chiefly employed in explaining what is called Intellectual Philosophy; the general phenomena of the human mind, such as sensation, memory, and judgment; adverting to many of the theories, ancient and modern, which have been advanced upon that subject; more particularly those which have occupied the attention of philosophers for the last half century.

Do you advert to the systems of Locke, Berkeley, Hume, Reid and Stewart?—Yes, to all of them.

We believe that you are an Orthodox member of the Church of Scotland?—Yes, I am a member of the Church of Scotland.

Orthodox is contra-distinguished from Arian principles?—Entirely so.

Is it your own impression, that a person possessed of the talents, and having the same sentiments on the subject of religion that David Hume is known to have had, would be a dangerous person to the cause of religion, if filling your situation?—I think he would.

Do you think it would be extremely undesirable that such a person should at some future period be elected to your chair?—Yes.

Describe in what manner you think his appointment would operate disserviceably to religion?—I think he could not display the same zeal in favor of some important truths as a person of Orthodox sentiments. The word Orthodox does not apply so well in the present case; but I mean to compare Hume, as a Deist, with a believer in revelation.

But, adverting to the peculiar nature of the subjects about which you have described your lectures to be conversant, do you think such a person could, if he was conscientious, execute his duties as a professor, without either intentionally or unintentionally rendering that disservice to religion to which the question has alluded?—I think he could not. I mean to say, the subject would not be safe in his hands.

Could he well avoid doing mischief, if he were so disposed?—I think he could not, taking it in the strongest point of view; but I would like to add, that Hume himself, through all his metaphysical works, has scarcely taught any one doctrine as true, but has represented all doctrines upon which he entered as nearly equally uncertain, which is the worst of all consequences.

Are we to collect it as your opinion, that it is of importance to the cause of religion, and to the welfare of the Presbyterian church in Ireland, that a sincere Christian should at all future times hold your office?—Certainly.

Do you think that it is in the same, or in any degree, important that the person holding your situation should be an Orthodox member of the Presbyterian church, as contra-distinguished from the Arian?—I would much prefer it.

Will you state the reasons upon which you would prefer it?—It is not so much that he must necessarily advance Arianism, or the contrary; for I think that subject does not properly come before a moral philosopher; but for the sake of the influence arising from his character, and the confidence of the public in him, I should wish him to be of Orthodox opinions. Perhaps other points may, though I cannot well see how, be connected with such discussions as might be favorable to Orthodoxy, but chiefly I would place it upon his general influence. As the great body of the people are Orthodox, I think it would be more desirable that the majority of the professors should be of their own sentiments.

Do you think that a man of considerable talents in your situation, would create a certain degree of respect and possess a certain degree of influence on the minds of his students?—Yes, some influence.

Do you think there would be in the circumstance of his being a known Arian, any thing likely to create a respect for those principles in the minds of his hearers?—My mind is so filled with previous opinions and discussions upon this subject, that I feel some difficulty in answering the question. I do not believe that a man who is not called Orthodox, in any

Examination of
Dr.
J. Young, LL. D.
14 October 1825.

of the colleges, in Scotland or here, while there is a predominating number of Orthodox members, has ever had any sensible influence in altering the Orthodox opinions of those under him. I have been under the tuition of those not supposed to be Orthodox, and it rather rendered the students more vigilant, and produced many essays in contradiction to what was supposed to be not Orthodox opinions.

Essays from the students?—Yes.

Are we to collect then that you think there is, in consequence of a moderate infusion of Arianism in a large establishment like Belfast, a tendency to do good as well as mischief?—I do not conceive that my professorship here is at all concerned in teaching Arianism, or the contrary. I have no business with it.

Have you ever in point of fact, in the execution of your duties during ten sessions, endeavoured to render your lectures subservient to the cause of Orthodoxy, rather than Arianism?—Never, with that view I think; but there may be some principles, for aught I know, that have a tendency of that kind; but I would maintain the same principles although they had no connection with the doctrine of the Trinity.

Do you, in the constitution of the Belfast Institution, as it stands at present, feel any alarm as to its being auxiliary to the propagation of Arian sentiments?—Not till the population of the country change their sentiments.

Do you see any danger of it, so far as the young men are concerned, who are in it?—I feel the contrary.

Will you explain the view in which you have seen it?—There has been more attention paid to the students in the divinity class by Dr. Hanna, and the majority of them go to his meeting house; he has had religious meetings where they engaged in devotional exercises, and they have been employed by him, with their own free consent, however, in making speeches and prayers before the Missionary meetings.

Do you consider Arianism to be on the advance or on the decline in the Institution, at present?—I never knew that there was any Arianism in the Institution, except that there were two professors appointed who are believed to be Arians.

Do you think there is any tendency to imbibe Arian sentiments among the students?—That depends upon their previous connections in the Church; I have never had much intercourse with the young men on such subjects; but it must depend upon their previous education, the Presbytery or minister they have been connected with.

Do you think Arianism is on the advance or decline, among the adult population in Belfast or its vicinity?—My opinion is, that at present Arianism is unpopular, more unpopular of late in this town and neighbourhood than it was.

To what do you attribute that?—To the publication of certain books in favour of Arianism, which excited inquiry and opposition.

Which have defeated their own object?—In the society I mix with, I have found several people that attend Arian congregations, who express surprize at some of the doctrines contained in those publications.

Have you known any individuals who have been Arians, who have become what you term Orthodox?—I am not sure of that; I know one instance of a person of some learning who has become a member of Dr. Hanna's congregation, but I do not know the grounds that led him to it.

Do you know whether it is the practice of those ministers who hold Arian principles, to explain and expound them in their pulpit?—I have heard that one of them did so in a course of lectures; I never heard of any other.

One of the clergymen of Belfast was it?—Yes.

Does it sometimes happen, that from their mode of preaching, it may be unknown to their congregation that they entertain those sentiments?—That is their general mode of preaching, I believe; but I do not go there much; I am very seldom at Arian meeting houses.

Have you observed any feeling of disaffection to the British constitution, among those persons who are professors or masters?—Quite the contrary. I find an admiration of the constitution, and generally speaking, an approbation of the measures of Government. I speak without any regard to the denomination of Whig and Tory. And I beg leave to state, as so much has been said upon this point, that it is impossible for me to state any thing that would be more false than such a charge against the professors and managers.

Do you include the masters?—Certainly.

Have you been acquainted with the Managers of the Institution for the last two or three years?—Yes.

Is there any individual among them whom you would say, entertained any feelings of disaffection towards the constitution?—None.

Is it your feeling, that the restoration of the Government grant to the Institution, would have a beneficial effect in strengthening that good feeling you describe to prevail?—I believe it would have that effect most materially over the whole province of Ulster, particularly among influential people connected with Presbyterians.

Is there any connection between the Government and the Institution you would be prepared to recommend or approve?—No particular plan; I never allowed myself to think of it, as it is out of the line of my duty.

Do you consider, in the abstract, it would be desirable there should be some such connection formed?—Most desirable that the Government should have some efficient influence; but not so much as to give them the command of elections. I would consider that very dangerous.

Would you consider it dangerous to give to the Government the power of disapprobation of any particular professor upon his election?—From the universal experience of the liberality

261
Examination of
Dr.

J. Young, LL. D.
14 October 1825.

liberality of the Government in such cases, I would not feel the slightest fear in giving them the veto.

Would it be dangerous that Government should possess a partial share in the election, to a certain extent, though not the exclusive controul?—I should think not; I should think voting by proxy would be a bad thing; I think that Government at present has very considerable influence.

What kind of influence do they possess at present?—There are a number of persons who have votes at the elections of professors, who may be considered to be in the confidence of Government, as holding high official situations; the Provost of Trinity College, the Lord Bishop of Down and Connor, and of Dromore, the Members for Belfast and counties Down and Antrim, and the Sovereign of the town.

Has the Provost of Trinity College ever been present at an election, and voted?—I believe not; he has corresponded with the Institution; some of the Bishops have been present; I believe the Bishop of Dromore voted on one occasion, and the Bishop of Down and Connor was present once at a meeting of Managers.

Taking all the circumstances of the Institution, its character and objects into consideration, which do you think most desirable, that the professorships, other than those of Theology, should be left open to persons of all religious denominations as at present, or confined to persons of a particular religious denomination?—I think, in the present circumstances of the country, it is better that they should be left open to all classes of Christians. The divided state of the religious sentiments of the community seems to demand this, especially as their appointment will always be influenced, in a great degree, by the prevailing sect in this part of the country, which is Orthodox.

Do you therefore consider, that the true security of the prevailing sect, and that upon which it relies, is its own superiority rather than a monopoly?—I do not think that a monopoly would succeed at present. It might, perhaps, with Government aid have succeeded at the commencement of the college, but not now, when the question has been agitated, and the system has succeeded so well. I think, however, from my own experience, that Orthodox doctrines, suppose I were an Unitarian or Arian, would necessarily be safe before the class, because I know that there are always persons belonging to various denominations of Christians. I have had, on several occasions, members of the Church of England in my class, once a Quaker, and always some Seceders, whom I believe to be Orthodox. Besides the greater part of the Synod of Ulster are Orthodox; and the impression upon my mind, that I have many different sects listening to me, would limit my instructions to the great topics of general philosophy just as much, and more, as you would not in a mixed company, obtrude the doctrine of the Trinity upon the attention of Arians.

Then is it your opinion, that the general principles you have described, are, all things considered, sufficient to guard against the possibility of the danger of Arianism being taught in the Institution?—It renders it exceedingly improbable.

Do you consider that the security is as perfect as, considering the imperfection of all arrangements, could well be expected?—That is exactly what I mean.

Have you any recollection of the circumstance ever having been brought before the Faculty, of Price's Sermons having been given as a premium book?—I am aware, that such a book was given, but it was not by a member of the Faculty. When the fact was reported to the Faculty, they made a resolution in their books, that no professor in future should give away any prize books without previously submitting a list of them to the Faculty for their approbation, and this has been generally done since.

Did they express any disapprobation of the thing having been done, except by that resolution?—I know that Members of the Faculty spoke to the individual who had made that mistake, and from conversation I am aware he was resolved not to do it again; and although I do not approve of giving away a theological book of that kind in this town, I must say, that it is scarcely possible to select books in my own department, for instance, which do not contain a portion of error; Hume's Essays are generally given in many colleges, and it is a very good book, although containing much error.

In what way is it good?—It contains much sound philosophy, with much scepticism. No man can thoroughly understand the grounds of sound philosophy, without studying such works.

Do you know any instances of its having been given as a premium in the College of Glasgow?—I could not swear to the fact, but I fully believe it has been given frequently.

Is there any thing you would wish to suggest for the improvement of the Institution?—I could not offer any suggestion myself, but it might be well for the Commissioners to consider what kind of relation should exist between the Managers and the Faculty, whether the Faculty should have any power at all directly from Government, or should derive all their power from the Proprietors or Managers.

You have stated you are yourself a native of Scotland; have you any decided opinion as to which is the better place of education for the Irish students, Glasgow or Belfast?—I am perfectly certain, from much experience, that Belfast is better by far for the Irish students than Glasgow.

Will you explain the grounds of that opinion?—Because the students are fewer, and are far more frequently examined by their teachers; partly because we are a young Institution, working ourselves into notice and public confidence, and have to come in this respect, into competition with the Glasgow College itself: our rules as to the attendance in classes, and submitting to examinations previously to receiving a certificate in arts, are much more strict, and above all, the invariable practice of having the professional students at least examined publicly in every department at the close of each session, in the presence of their ministers,

Examination of
Dr.
J. Young, LL. D.
14 October 1825.

of the colleges, in Scotland or here, while there is a predominating number of Orthodox members, has ever had any sensible influence in altering the Orthodox opinions of those under him. I have been under the tuition of those not supposed to be Orthodox, and it rather rendered the students more vigilant, and produced many essays in contradiction to what was supposed to be not Orthodox opinions.

Essays from the students?—Yes.

Are we to collect then that you think there is, in consequence of a moderate infusion of Arianism in a large establishment like Belfast, a tendency to do good as well as mischief?—I do not conceive that my professorship here is at all concerned in teaching Arianism, or the contrary. I have no business with it.

Have you ever in point of fact, in the execution of your duties during ten sessions, endeavoured to render your lectures subservient to the cause of Orthodoxy, rather than Arianism?—Never, with that view I think; but there may be some principles, for aught I know, that have a tendency of that kind; but I would maintain the same principles although they had no connection with the doctrine of the Trinity.

Do you, in the constitution of the Belfast Institution, as it stands at present, feel any alarm as to its being auxiliary to the propagation of Arian sentiments?—Not till the population of the country change their sentiments.

Do you see any danger of it, so far as the young men are concerned, who are in it?—I feel the contrary.

Will you explain the view in which you have seen it?—There has been more attention paid to the students in the divinity class by Dr. Hanna, and the majority of them go to his meeting house; he has had religious meetings where they engaged in devotional exercises, and they have been employed by him, with their own free consent, however, in making speeches and prayers before the Missionary meetings.

Do you consider Arianism to be on the advance or on the decline in the Institution, at present?—I never knew that there was any Arianism in the Institution, except that there were two professors appointed who are believed to be Arians.

Do you think there is any tendency to imbibe Arian sentiments among the students?—That depends upon their previous connections in the Church; I have never had much intercourse with the young men on such subjects; but it must depend upon their previous education, the Presbytery or minister they have been connected with.

Do you think Arianism is on the advance or decline, among the adult population in Belfast or its vicinity?—My opinion is, that at present Arianism is unpopular, more unpopular of late in this town and neighbourhood than it was.

To what do you attribute that?—To the publication of certain books in favour of Arianism, which excited inquiry and opposition.

Which have defeated their own object?—In the society I mix with, I have found several people that attend Arian congregations, who express surprize at some of the doctrines contained in those publications.

Have you known any individuals who have been Arians, who have become what you term Orthodox?—I am not sure of that; I know one instance of a person of some learning who has become a member of Dr. Hanna's congregation, but I do not know the grounds that led him to it.

Do you know whether it is the practice of those ministers who hold Arian principles, to explain and expound them in their pulpit?—I have heard that one of them did so in a course of lectures; I never heard of any other.

One of the clergymen of Belfast was it?—Yes.

Does it sometimes happen, that from their mode of preaching, it may be unknown to their congregation that they entertain those sentiments?—That is their general mode of preaching, I believe; but I do not go there much; I am very seldom at Arian meeting houses.

Have you observed any feeling of disaffection to the British constitution, among those persons who are professors or masters?—Quite the contrary. I find an admiration of the constitution, and generally speaking, an approbation of the measures of Government. I speak without any regard to the denomination of Whig and Tory. And I beg leave to state, as so much has been said upon this point, that it is impossible for me to state any thing that would be more false than such a charge against the professors and managers.

Do you include the masters?—Certainly.

Have you been acquainted with the Managers of the Institution for the last two or three years?—Yes.

Is there any individual among them whom you would say, entertained any feelings of disaffection towards the constitution?—None.

Is it your feeling, that the restoration of the Government grant to the Institution, would have a beneficial effect in strengthening that good feeling you describe to prevail?—I believe it would have that effect most materially over the whole province of Ulster, particularly among influential people connected with Presbyterians.

Is there any connection between the Government and the Institution you would be prepared to recommend or approve?—No particular plan; I never allowed myself to think of it, as it is out of the line of my duty.

Do you consider, in the abstract, it would be desirable there should be some such connection formed?—Most desirable that the Government should have some efficient influence; but not so much as to give them the command of elections. I would consider that very dangerous.

Would you consider it dangerous to give to the Government the power of disapprobation of any particular professor upon his election?—From the universal experience of the liberality

261
Examination of
Dr.

J. Young, LL. D.
14 October 1825.

liberality of the Government in such cases, I would not feel the slightest fear in giving them the veto.

Would it be dangerous that Government should possess a partial share in the election, to a certain extent, though not the exclusive controul?—I should think not; I should think voting by proxy would be a bad thing; I think that Government at present has very considerable influence.

What kind of influence do they possess at present?—There are a number of persons who have votes at the elections of professors, who may be considered to be in the confidence of Government, as holding high official situations; the Provost of Trinity College, the Lord Bishop of Down and Connor, and of Dromore, the Members for Belfast and counties Down and Antrim, and the Sovereign of the town.

Has the Provost of Trinity College ever been present at an election, and voted?—I believe not; he has corresponded with the Institution; some of the Bishops have been present; I believe the Bishop of Dromore voted on one occasion, and the Bishop of Down and Connor was present once at a meeting of Managers.

Taking all the circumstances of the Institution, its character and objects into consideration, which do you think most desirable, that the professorships, other than those of Theology, should be left open to persons of all religious denominations as at present, or confined to persons of a particular religious denomination?—I think, in the present circumstances of the country, it is better that they should be left open to all classes of Christians. The divided state of the religious sentiments of the community seems to demand this, especially as their appointment will always be influenced, in a great degree, by the prevailing sect in this part of the country, which is Orthodox.

Do you therefore consider, that the true security of the prevailing sect, and that upon which it relies, is its own superiority rather than a monopoly?—I do not think that a monopoly would succeed at present. It might, perhaps, with Government aid have succeeded at the commencement of the college, but not now, when the question has been agitated, and the system has succeeded so well. I think, however, from my own experience, that Orthodox doctrines, suppose I were an Unitarian or Arian, would necessarily be safe before the class, because I know that there are always persons belonging to various denominations of Christians. I have had, on several occasions, members of the Church of England in my class, once a Quaker, and always some Seceders, whom I believe to be Orthodox. Besides the greater part of the Synod of Ulster are Orthodox; and the impression upon my mind, that I have many different sects listening to me, would limit my instructions to the great topics of general philosophy just as much, and more, as you would not in a mixed company, obtrude the doctrine of the Trinity upon the attention of Arians.

Then is it your opinion, that the general principles you have described, are, all things considered, sufficient to guard against the possibility of the danger of Arianism being taught in the Institution?—It renders it exceedingly improbable.

Do you consider that the security is as perfect as, considering the imperfection of all arrangements, could well be expected?—That is exactly what I mean.

Have you any recollection of the circumstance ever having been brought before the Faculty, of Price's Sermons having been given as a premium book?—I am aware, that such a book was given, but it was not by a member of the Faculty. When the fact was reported to the Faculty, they made a resolution in their books, that no professor in future should give away any prize books without previously submitting a list of them to the Faculty for their approbation, and this has been generally done since.

Did they express any disapprobation of the thing having been done, except by that resolution?—I know that Members of the Faculty spoke to the individual who had made that mistake, and from conversation I am aware he was resolved not to do it again; and although I do not approve of giving away a theological book of that kind in this town, I must say, that it is scarcely possible to select books in my own department, for instance, which do not contain a portion of error; Hume's Essays are generally given in many colleges, and it is a very good book, although containing much error.

In what way is it good?—It contains much sound philosophy, with much scepticism. No man can thoroughly understand the grounds of sound philosophy, without studying such works.

Do you know any instances of its having been given as a premium in the College of Glasgow?—I could not swear to the fact, but I fully believe it has been given frequently.

Is there any thing you would wish to suggest for the improvement of the Institution?—I could not offer any suggestion myself, but it might be well for the Commissioners to consider what kind of relation should exist between the Managers and the Faculty, whether the Faculty should have any power at all directly from Government, or should derive all their power from the Proprietors or Managers.

You have stated you are yourself a native of Scotland; have you any decided opinion as to which is the better place of education for the Irish students, Glasgow or Belfast?—I am perfectly certain, from much experience, that Belfast is better by far for the Irish students than Glasgow.

Will you explain the grounds of that opinion?—Because the students are fewer, and are far more frequently examined by their teachers; partly because we are a young Institution, working ourselves into notice and public confidence, and have to come in this respect, into competition with the Glasgow College itself: our rules as to the attendance in classes, and submitting to examinations previously to receiving a certificate in arts, are much more strict, and above all, the invariable practice of having the professional students at least examined publicly in every department at the close of each session, in the presence of their ministers,

Examination of
Dr.
J. Young, LL. D.
14 October 1825.

friends and fellow students, produces a degree of diligence and emulation greater and beyond all comparison more general than I have known at any other college. Besides, the Irish students are generally introduced to some respectable acquaintance in town; they have personal intercourse with the minister of their own religious persuasion; they have frequent opportunities of waiting even on their respective Presbyteries while at college, and upon the whole, there is a degree of respectability attached to Irish students when they are among their own countrymen, which very few of them ever experienced at Glasgow. The expense also of their education is much less, and the numerous advantages arising from a nearer vicinity to their friends, must be very obvious; I have, however, the highest respect for college education as it is conducted at Glasgow; but I think that this is the best place for Irish students.

Were the Irish students when at Glasgow, according to your experience, subjected to any and what moral superintendence?—I know of none; I was eight years in Glasgow College; at that time the students generally came late and went away soon; so much so, that the back part of a particular class room was left open for them till they arrived. They generally speaking came late in the session to college, and went away early.

Having regard particularly to the Orthodoxy of the students, according to your own notion of Orthodoxy, where do you conceive students would be safest, in the college of Glasgow, or the Institution at Belfast?—I think them equally safe in both.

Which mode of education has produced the greatest number of Arians in a given time?—I cannot answer that question; I was not very much acquainted with the Irish students at Glasgow. There is far less of politics at present in this town than there is at Glasgow.

Do you mean among the inhabitants?—I mean among the professors and among the students. From conversing with the students, I find they never have any discussion upon those points, no regular discussion; whereas there are regular parties annually at Glasgow, in consequence of the election of the Lord Rector, for instance; and this makes the students take a side in politics.

You allude to Glasgow particularly?—Yes, and to Aberdeen; and with regard to the politics of the town of Belfast, I think the opinions of the inhabitants are in general as favourable to Government as any other town, as favourable as Glasgow at least. There is a greater degree of warmth of temper generally shown in this country upon such subjects; but I never met a company of any size where politics were discussed, in which there was not found a person to defend the ministry; and as to any Radicalism, I do not meet with it in the society which I frequent. Some may go further in their notions of Parliamentary Reform than other persons might do; but I do not find any Radicalism, meaning by that, a wish to overturn the Government and embroil the peace of the community; I do not know a single man of my acquaintance who entertains those opinions.

NOTE to DR. YOUNG'S EVIDENCE.

AFTER reflecting on the Evidence which I gave before His Majesty's Commissioners of Education Inquiry, respecting the supposed danger of Arianism being taught in the Institution, I am afraid that I have not been so explicit as I might have been. The conclusions I would support are the following:—

1.—Supposing it to be desirable that there should be a College for Presbyterian Dissenters in the North of Ireland, it appears to me to be a measure inexpedient and impracticable to give to those called Orthodox the entire monopoly of its professorships.

I do not mean to affirm that a moderate, or indeed any infusion of Arianism, would do good in the Institution; but I think that a person of that denomination may be safely elected to any of the literary or philosophical chairs. There is a marked distinction between a minister of the Gospel, who may feel himself bound to teach the whole of its doctrines, and a professor, who has a distinct and separate line of duty chalked out to him. In the present distracted state of religious opinions in this country, if the fear of every imaginable and possible evil is to prevent all accommodation among parties, there is an end at once to any system of general education.

2.—That the doctrine of the Trinity is not a proper subject for discussion in any class, unless it be a theological one. That, except in the divinity classes, I have never known of its being either defended or opposed in the Scottish Universities, and that the introduction of it into the Belfast literary and philosophical classes would be highly injurious, and would indicate a degree of imprudence which can scarcely be anticipated.

3.—That it is manifestly against the pecuniary interest of any professor, except the Professors of Theology, to teach sectarian opinions on religion in this Institution; and that, were he to do so, he would forfeit his chair.

4.—That the solemn pledge (it might be an oath) of the professors to abstain from such discussions, involves the whole of their moral reputation, and is in the present case tantamount to the subscription of a creed, which it is notorious could do nothing more than secure neutrality. That we have as ample security against the introduction of infidelity as any college whatever; and that it is certain, although an infidel or heretic might be supposed to attempt to do injury here, as well as elsewhere, he could not do it with less impunity than in any college of the empire.

5.—That I am satisfied the Synod of Ulster, as such, has no just claim to demand a uniformity of sentiments amongst us, which it has not for more than half a century pretended to enforce on its own ministers.

6.—That I am confident the Members of Faculty, both from a sense of duty and a feeling of self-interest, would be the first and most zealous to oppose any attempt to interfere with the religious sentiments of their pupils.

Belfast, 28th Oct. 1825.

John Young.

203

Appendix, No. 15.

Examination of the Rev. Dr. Samuel Edgar, D. D. Saturday, 15th October 1825.

Examination of
Rev. Samuel Edgar,
D. D.
15 October 1825.

WHAT office do you hold connected with the Belfast Institution?—I teach the young men committed to my care in that society to which I belong, the Seceders.

You are Professor of Divinity in the Institution, appointed by the Seceding Synod?—Yes.

What number of young men are at present attending your lectures, who intend themselves for ministers of the Seceding Synod?—Last year there were thirty-two; the number has varied from fifteen to thirty-two.

How long have you held your situation?—Ten sessions.*

What number of young men have passed into the ministry from under your care in the Belfast Institution?—Fifty-one in all; namely, twenty-one ordained ministers, twenty-one probationers in Ireland, and nine have emigrated to America*.

Your own views of religious truth are strictly Calvinistic?—Yes.

And all of the seceding ministers subscribe the Westminster Confession of Faith?—They do; all in that connexion to which I belong; it is essential to the licensing of a young man to preach, and also to the ordination of a minister.

Is it your opinion, that notwithstanding the formal subscription of that Confession, there may be in point of fact at present any individuals among the seceding ministers who are Arians?—I think there are none; I feel morally persuaded there are none.

Are you aware of any instance having occurred of a young man who has attended your lectures, afterwards turning out an Arian?—Not any.

Have any of the young men who have attended your lectures become ministers of the Synod of Ulster?—Some of them have connected themselves with our Synod, and afterwards left it.

Is there any rule that makes it improper that a young man who has attended your lectures should become a member of the Synod of Ulster and not of your Synod?—There is nothing to prevent him.

You do not consider he has done wrong?—That is another thing.

Would he not in fact necessarily abandon the connection with the Seceding Synod, if he became locally connected with the Synod of Ulster?—He would; he would not be entitled to their privileges.

You are aware there are some Arian ministers amongst the Synod of Ulster?—So it is said.

Are you aware of any difference in doctrinal matters, as contra-distinguished from matters of mere church government between the Seceding Synod and the Orthodox part of the Synod of Ulster?—I believe they are in substance the same as to the leading points of faith.

Have you had occasion to consider the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England?—I am not intimately acquainted with them.

Have you read them?—Yes.

Upon reading them, has it occurred to you that there is any part of the doctrines there laid down, not meaning by the present question to refer to any thing connected with church discipline or government; but is there anything in the doctrines there laid down you would feel obliged to dissent from?—Not as to the substance of them; there are some expressions in them I might consider exceptionable, or favouring Arminian sentiments, and not expressed in the same manner as I would express them.

Are we to understand, that any difference that would exist between you and them is, because they do not go quite far enough, according to your views; but as far as they do go, do they contain anything according to their plain import, contrariant to your notions?—There are constructions put upon the Thirty-nine Articles that would make them go to express themselves different from the Articles of the Westminster Confession of Faith; but I believe them to be in substance the same, and in that sense I understand them.

The question is not, what construction other persons may put upon them, but according to your own plain understanding, of what appears to you to be their literal import, do they contain any thing upon doctrinal subjects, from which you feel yourself called upon to differ?—Nothing further than that I have just now stated.

Have you understood that Arian sentiments are very prevalent amongst the ministers of the Presbytery of Antrim?—I have.

Is that your belief?—My belief is, that the ministers of that presbytery are all Arians.

Have you any definite opinion; we do not ask, whether you have any positive knowledge, as to the probable proportion of the ministers of the Synod of Ulster, who are Arians?—No; I have no particular knowledge; I could not be able to number them.

Have you any well defined opinion, as to whether Arianism is increasing or decreasing among that body?—I think it decreasing.

To any considerable extent?—I think the late discussions that have taken place in this country have been against the increase of Arianism.

What discussions?—The discussions in the Synod of Ulster.

Do you think the public feeling in the North of Ireland is against Arian principles?—Those of the Presbyterian laity.

Do you extend the observation to the upper ranks of society as well as the lower?—Yes; so far as I have had opportunities of knowing them.

Do

* See the list at the end of this Evidence.

Examination of
Rev. Samuel Edgar,
D. D.
15 October 1825.

Do you think there is any greater disposition to favour Arian sentiments among the higher ranks of society in the North of Ireland than the lower?—I cannot answer that.

To what do you attribute the decline of Arianism you have referred to?—It not being popular among the multitude, that is one reason.

That might be a reason for its non-existence, or being confined within narrow limits; but why do you conceive it is growing less?—I am of opinion the people misunderstood their ministers till of late; that the people did not know their ministers were of Arian sentiments; and that when it has become more public the people have felt alarmed; and that the consequence is, that Arianism has been more discountenanced.

Are we right in supposing that the choice of a minister depends materially upon the taste of the congregation?—Yes.

Of course, then it would appear to follow, that if the congregations should generally become alarmed, they would be more cautious in selecting their ministers?—Yes.

Do you conceive that the congregations in the Presbytery of Antrim are disposed to Calvinism rather than Arianism?—Yes, the great majority.

Should you think it likely that it would even decrease in the Presbytery of Antrim?—Yes, I think so; I beg leave to state, that I have heard that a gentleman of this town did preach in Dr. James Nelson's congregation, and said something as to Arian sentiments before the people, in consequence of which the people applied to Dr. Nelson, to know if they were his sentiments. They felt very much alarmed that those sentiments should be preached among them.

Do you know what answer he gave?—Yes; but I have only hearsay, that he did not feel himself at liberty to give them any satisfactory answer.

Have they any power of dismissing him from his ministry?—They have an opportunity of making an appeal to the Presbytery; they may say they are dissatisfied with his opinions, and lodge what is called a libel.

There is no superior court?—No; I believe they disclaim the authority of the Synod, and there is no appeal from the Presbytery.

May it be inferred from that, that the gentleman to whom you alluded has not preached those doctrines in the pulpit?—The people did not think he taught those doctrines.

Will you have the goodness to state, whether you heard it from any of the congregation of the clergyman whose people objected to it?—I could not mention the persons from whom I heard it, but I have heard that the Synod of Ulster are about forming a new erection in Downpatrick, as a number of persons said to be dissatisfied with Dr. Nelson are about to leave his congregation.

Do you not think an Arian minister may be as well known and almost as dangerous by the silence he observes upon some topics as any thing he can say upon others?—I think a silence with respect to important doctrines of religion is very bad, because it is not declaring the whole counsel of God.

And do you think that an Arian minister, even if he should have the prudence not to put forward his own views of religion, must, if he is a conscientious man, be absolutely silent upon those points you consider vitally essential to Christianity?—Yes.

We shall be obliged to you to lay before us your views of the tendency of the Belfast Institution to encourage or repress the growth of Arianism?—I think it is not in its present arrangement calculated to promote Arianism.

Are you aware, that two out of the last three professors who have been appointed are Arians; that the two schoolmasters who are alone permitted to receive boarders in the Institution, are also Arians; and that a considerable proportion which has been stated to us to amount by one witness to an actual majority of the managers are Arians?—I cannot say as to the managers, but the teachers are reputed Arians, and also the two professors.

Do you not see in that circumstance somewhat that you would wish to guard against from becoming more extensive in future?—No; I would not draw that conclusion.

Do you conceive there is any danger or no danger in having Arians in those situations?—No; I do not see any danger.

Will you explain the grounds of that opinion?—I am of opinion, that there should not be strictures upon religious liberty, with respect to the principles of Calvin or Arius, and that one should be eligible as well as another to a public seminary like Belfast. I have upon that drawn up two or three sentences upon paper, which I wish to read in your presence if you will allow me; for this reason, that I have never had an opportunity before, particularly upon oath, of declaring my sentiments.

We should be obliged to you to do so?—1. When the Seceders separated from the Communion of the Church of Scotland, owing to the proceedings of a corrupt judicature, and conceived it necessary to testify against the errors of Simpson and Campbell, professors in Glasgow College, they never once proposed to withdraw their students from that seminary, on account of Arian principles being taught in it.—2. Nor do the Seceders in Scotland yet express a fear, or use precautions, as to the education of their students in Scottish seminaries, though it is pretty evident that errors of the worst kind are maintained by some teachers.—3. To exclude men from teaching school or lecturing on classics and science in a college, because of their religious principles, is to use a weapon in support of religion, which the Scriptures do not seem to warrant, and of which weapon truth has no need.—4. There is no danger from Arianism in the Belfast College, because,—First, The Faculty are pledged against interference with religious principles, and what stronger bond than such solemn pledge can be had of men?—Second, To violate this obligation would be to renounce principle and conscience, and oppose that private interest which has so strong

265
 Examination of
 Rev.
 Samuel Edgar,
 D. D.
 15 October 1825.

an influence upon all men.—Third, For teachers of language and philosophy to become teachers of any peculiar creed, would be to depart from their particular professions, intermeddle with that which is solely the province of professors of theology, and expose themselves to ridicule.—Fourth, If there were any interference with religious principle in the Belfast College, the influence would be in favour of Calvinism, because there are many more Calvinists than Arians in the Institution.—Fifth, Catholic youth have not become Protestants by being under the tuition in general education of a Protestant schoolmaster, et vice versa; Dr. Bruce appears, from his sermons, to be an Arian of the worst description, yet ushers and schoolmasters have been under him of the strictest Calvinistic sentiments, and no charge was ever heard of his interference with their religious opinions.—Sixth, Suppose Arians should use influence or interfere, Orthodoxy has nothing to fear, because all attempts to promote error issue in establishing and confirming the truth. The Arians in the Institution do not express the same anxiety or concern for their principles as the Orthodox, nor do they require the same precaution and pledge against interference in religious principles,—and why? Either they are more liberal in sentiment, better understanding the doctrine of religious liberty, or they do not attach the same essential importance to the subject that the Orthodox do. My opinion is, that both these reasons operate in making them less concerned. It is perfectly right for religious bodies to avow their abhorrence and condemnation of error, and especially of the heresy of men's denying the Lord that bought them; but suppose they had the power, and were to proceed to exclude men from literary seminaries, merely on account of religious opinions, they might as consistently proceed a step farther if they could, and imprison or take away life. Religious bodies may have what terms of communion they conceive to be scriptural, and may receive or reject in their own ecclesiastical communion as they think proper, but the Belfast Institution is no part or portion of any distinct and exclusive religious community, and is therefore properly under the control of none. General literary education is a civil privilege common to all men, without regard to sects in religion, and no one sect has more right than another, or rather none has any right, to prescribe articles of faith, or modes of worship, to the conductors of such general education. The Belfast Institution appears to be founded on the most upright and tenable principles, because it leaves religious communities to make what regulations they please as to polemic divinity and peculiarity of creeds, and only requires that masters and professors be competent to teach languages and science, and be men of moral rectitude. Were a Quaker, a Seceder, a High Churchman, an Arian, or a Roman Catholic, to be excluded from it, it would at once become an exclusive religious establishment; its fundamental principles would be perverted, and its very constitution destroyed. It seems strangely inconsistent, that the Synod of Ulster should desire to have influence in excluding Arians from the Belfast College, when they do not exclude them from ministerial or christian communion in their own church. They have fellowship in the most solemn privileges and services of religion, in the ordination of men to sacred office, and in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper with Arians, and yet would refuse to hold literary connexion with them in the promoting of that general education which is common to all sects. They claim a variety and opposition of sentiments in religion to themselves, though a sect, which they would deny to a great national seminary, interfering with the religious tenets of no sect.—These statements are made by me as an individual, expressing my own views, and not as the representative of that religious body with which I stand connected, or as declaring what may be their opinions.

Do you think the Arians ought to be allowed to have a professor of divinity of their own in the Institution, if they wished it.—If there were so many of them as to require a professor, the principles of the Institution could not prevent them.

We wish to know, whether you would be prepared to follow out the principles you have stated, so far as to say, that you would yourself approve to see the Presbytery of Antrim allowed to found a professorship of divinity in the Institution?—I could not object to it upon the principles I have stated.

Should you have any objection to see an avowed Atheist of great learning and talent in the professorship of moral philosophy?—I would object to it on these grounds; because I think that society has no moral bond upon an Atheist, and that Atheism disturbs the peace of civil society, and is cognizable by the laws of the land, and by the civil magistrate; and I think he would be bound to prevent their holding any place of trust in the state.

Would you object to a pure Deist holding the same office?—I would for the same reason.

Do you think he is also cognizable by the law and the civil magistrate?—Yes, on account of his creed, and being a disturber of the peace of civil society.

Would you object to seeing a Socinian in that chair?—I could not object to him more than the others, upon the principles that there should be religious liberty.

Do you consider Socinians to be Christians?—I think the principles of the Socinians are directly opposed to the principles contained in the Bible.

We can understand that you do not conceive a Deist to be a Christian; in the same way, do you conceive the Unitarians to be Christians or not?—It would follow as an inference, that they subvert the principles of Christianity as contained in the Bible.

You would object to a Deist, but not to a Unitarian?—I would not to the Unitarians, they being a sect of religion; the Deist rejects divine revelation, but the Socinian acknowledges divine revelation, and puts a certain construction upon it.

Examination of
Rev.
Samuel Edgar,
D. D.
15 October 1825.

Do you conceive, that men should study the Scriptures, and studying and receiving them, as containing the revealed will of God, should form their own religious creed?—Yes.

Do you conceive, that a person who so reads the Scriptures, and forms his own conclusion, and comes to a conclusion upon the question between the Calvinists and Arians different from your's, should therefore be subjected to any exclusion from teaching youth in a mixed seminary?—No.

Do you not conceive, taken in the abstract, and without reference to other religious communities or their feelings, that it would be desirable that all the professorships should be filled by Orthodox persons?—I would like that they were Orthodox, and if my opinion was asked by the electors, with respect to the choice of professors, I would give my opinion, that it would not be well for them to chuse Arians or Socinians, and I did say so, upon the election of Mr. William Bruce, because my opinion was asked.

Then are we to understand, that though you would prefer having the professorships filled by Orthodox Christians, yet that the advantage you think would be gained by that, is not sufficient in your mind to countervail the objection you feel to the principle of exclusion?—I think there ought not be a principle of exclusion.

Your objection to the principle of exclusion is so strong, that you would not purchase the advantage of having the chairs filled by Orthodox Christians exclusively, at the price of that objection?—I would not.

Do you approve, under any circumstances, of the principle of requiring subscription to certain tests, as to the religious opinions of persons?—I think, in any particular body of the church, there ought to be a test of principles; there should be some creed.

You approve of the regulation in the Seceding Synod, that requires its members to subscribe to the Confession of Faith?—I do; and I disapprove of the Synod of Ulster, for not having so explicit a creed as they ought to have; I should wish to state what a creed or confession of faith is; that it is the sense in which we profess, or any body of men profess, to understand the Scriptures, and that is the simple idea to be attached to our creed, that it expresses the sense in which we understand the Scriptures; for instance, if any man asks me my particular views of the Bible, I refer him to the Westminster Confession of Faith, as to the sense in which I understand the Scriptures.

At what university were you educated yourself?—Glasgow.

Do you consider it an object of considerable importance in a religious point of view, that the future Presbyterian ministers of Ireland should be educated in Belfast rather than Glasgow?—I think home education is one important thing, and that the Institution is useful, not merely considering it as connected with certain religious bodies, but useful in promoting general literature.

Which do you conceive, the moral superintendence exercised here or in Glasgow, is to be preferred?—I think there is not the same control in the college of Glasgow as there can be in the Institution here, from the children being nearer their parents.

We wish you to refer to what the facts are; is it your experience that the moral superintendence exercised here is less or materially greater than you observed in Glasgow?—I would not like to say any thing reflecting upon Glasgow, or any other college; my opinion is, that the students in the college at Belfast have not the same opportunities of dissipation that they may have in Glasgow, though that opportunity may not arise from any fault in the college, but merely from local circumstances and distance.

Is there not something in the circumstance of being among their friends and connections, that in itself affords a greater guarantee than if they were in the midst of strangers?—I think there is much.

Do you consider that the houses and families in which the young men who attend the collegiate course of the Belfast Institution are domiciled, are generally speaking respectable.—I cannot say precisely; I warn my own students at the commencement of the session, to be cautious where they take lodgings, as to the character of the people.

Is it your impression, that there is any feeling of disaffection towards the Government prevalent in any degree, however small, among the professors or masters of the Belfast Institution?—I think the very opposite is the case; that is my strong conviction, that there is nothing of that kind among them, either masters or professors.

Would you extend that to the students?—Yes.

Is it your conscientious feeling there is no such disposition among your own divinity class?—It is.

Can you recal to mind any instance of any students having subsequently fallen into habits of vice, who had attended your course of divinity lectures?—I would merely mention, that one student for improper conduct was excluded from my class since my commencement.

With your approbation?—I was the organ of doing it; it was for forging a gentleman's name connected with the Institution; and when I came to ascertain the matter he was excluded.

Have you known any instance of any individual who has attended your lectures, and entered the ministry, who has ultimately become an improper person for that ministry?—One instance.

What was the nature of the impropriety that marked his conduct?—The presbytery thought proper to license a young man, and afterwards withdrew that license.

For what species of impropriety?—I cannot say precisely, I think it was for immorality.

You have stated, you would not wish to see any of the professorships filled by Socinians or Arians?—No.

Would you wish to see them filled by Arminians?—No, I would rather have them filled by people of my own sentiments than others.

That

267

That feeling would suggest to you an objection to others of different principles to yourself?—Yes, if I had a vote.

Do you understand the Hebrew language yourself?—Not well, I do partly.

Do you advert to it in your lectures?—I do.

Do you see any objection to an Arian professor of Hebrew instructing the students in the explanation of such words as Elohim or Adonai?—I think he should not explain them, as to the peculiarity of his own sentiments by any means; if he did, he would give up his own pledge.

The question is, whether he can answer the questions that may occur to the mind of an intelligent student, without expressing his own opinion?—He might say there is a difference of opinion upon the point; some men hold one way and some another; that is not an interference; but he should interfere as little as possible.

Do you think it important that the same check should be exercised as to the Professor of Hebrew that should be exercised as to the Divinity Professor?—No, because language is not the same as peculiar sentiments of religion.

Should you dislike seeing the Seceding Synod endowed with the power of expressing their approbation or disapprobation of whoever might be selected for the Hebrew professorship by the managers?—I think it would be giving up the principles of the Institution; I would think, that the Seceding Synod, or any other Synod, who are attached to Orthodox principles, should declare their sentiments of disapprobation of Arian sentiments in their own ecclesiastical courts, but further than that, they should not go in interfering with a literary seminary.

But you think the pledge given by the professors is not inexpedient?—I think it is proper.

You have no apprehension that that pledge might be deserted, and considered very much as a matter of form, or be explained away?—No.

Do you believe, in point of fact, it has always been faithfully observed?—Yes.

Should you consider giving to two boys two volumes of Arian sermons a violation of that pledge?—I think it would be departing from the pledge; I know what you allude to; a certain gentleman connected with the Institution has given books which he should not have given.

Had he given that pledge?—I believe not in times past.

Would there be any objection to his giving that pledge as to the future?—I apprehend that is one defect connected with the Institution, that any man should be allowed to teach there, without signing the pledge, whom the public might conceive belonging to the college, though he does not.

Did you ever hear any thing of a missionary sent forward by the Unitarians or Socinians in London, to preach their peculiar doctrines in Belfast?—I heard of a Mr. Smethurst coming here, and preaching his doctrines.

How do you reconcile that with the opinion you have expressed, that persons entertaining those views had but little anxiety to propagate their sentiments?—I mean as to the people in the Institution; that they have not said any thing. The Synod of Ulster and the Seceding Synod have published something; but Arians have not said any thing; they have not expressed any fear as to Calvinism.

Can you describe sufficiently the situation of the persons who were the introducers of Mr. Smethurst to the Presbyterians of Belfast?—I do not know; I heard that he asked for liberty to preach in some of the houses in this town, and was refused; that is all I can say.

Do you know whether he ultimately obtained leave any where?—He preached at Moneyrea and Saintfield.

Do you think, if any one of the teachers belonging to the Belfast Institution should turn out to be the person who procured him the liberty to preach in those pulpits, that such a person would be proper to continue there as a teacher of youth?—I should apprehend no objection would lie against a minister in the Institution, if he preach his own sentiments in the pulpit, or in any other way promote them, if he does not bring those sentiments into the Institution.

Should you have no apprehensions on your own mind, for the general character of the Institution, and for the estimation it would obtain in society, if all the professors, except the two professors of divinity, should eventually at some future period become Arians?—I think there is no danger of the fact arising. I think instead of that, the number will probably be less; I reason in that way; I think they will be more cautious in electing in time to come.

Are we to understand, in your opinion, in the event of another election, the circumstance of a candidate being an Arian would rather operate against him?—I think it would, for this reason; that the declaration of the two Synods, who furnish the chief number of students, upon the subject of Arianism, would not be dismissed by the electors, but that they would pay attention to it.

Suppose an Arian Moderator of the Synod of Ulster existed, what would be the effect of that Synod's recommending one person, and the Seceding Synod recommending another; a difficulty not unlikely to arise?—I could not say.

It is possible, according to the present constitution of the Synod of Ulster, that it may become substantially Arian itself?—It is possible it might. I believe there is at present no fixed creed as a sine quâ non of ordination in that church.

Do you conceive, that the possibility of the Institution of Belfast becoming Arian, is such as to render it proper, that it should be made positively and exclusively Presbyterian, in the Orthodox sense of the word?—I do not think it ought; I think it would be better as it is; religious liberty is the best way of promoting religion.

Examination of
Rev.
Samuel Edgar,
D. D.
15 October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.

Samuel Edgar,
D. D.

15 October 1825.

Do you consider it a fundamental principle of the Institution, that persons of all religions should be educated there?—That is the principle.

Do you conceive it would be consistent with that principle, or with fairness towards persons of all religious sentiments, that professorships should be confined to persons of only one religious persuasion?—I think they should not.

Upon the whole, what is your opinion upon the question, whether it is essential to the maintenance of Orthodox principles in the respective Synods, that the professorships should be left as they are, open to all, or confined only to persons of a particular religious opinion?—I think the better way is to leave them open.

You of course understand the question, as not including in it Theology?—Yes.

So far as your knowledge goes of the Synod of the Seceders, is that, or is it not, the prevailing opinion among them?—There may be different opinions among them; I could not answer that question; I am afraid to say any thing to express the opinion of a body, about which I may be mistaken.

So far as your knowledge of the body goes, does it in general approve or disapprove of the system pursued at the Belfast Institution?—I think they approve of it.

Do you think that the body entertain any apprehensions, that it may become or has become a seminary of Arianism?—I do not think they do.

Do you mix much with people in general in Ulster?—We do; our congregations are over the whole of the counties in the province of Ulster.

So far as your knowledge goes, does the Institution enjoy the confidence of the body of Seceders?—I think it does.

So far as your knowledge goes of the public in general, does it enjoy the confidence of the public in general?—It does.

Have you until lately had any fears expressed, that it might become a seminary of Arianism?—Not until lately.

Has the practice of the Institution undergone any change lately?—Not that I know of.

Were there any apprehensions expressed, so as to attract any degree of public notice with respect to Arianism, prior to the election of Mr. Bruce?—It has been principally since that.

Was not his predecessor of Arian principles?—He was said to be of those opinions.

And no objection was made during his time?—There was no public talk of it, as there has been of late.

Is not Mr. Montgomery, the master of the English school, an avowed Arian?—I believe he is; I do not know it.

Was there ever any apprehension entertained in consequence of his appointment, so far as you know?—I never heard of any.

He has had one of the boarding-houses in his hands from his original appointment?—He has.

Will you state the nature and extent of your emoluments as professor?—I have 50*l.* a year only, and this paid by the students.

Do you receive nothing from the Seceding Synod?—Nothing; I am clerk to that Synod, and receive a salary in another way of 50*l.* from the Government, as clerk.

Speaking of it as an abstract principle, do you think it desirable that the collegiate professors of divinity should continue to be paid by the students and the Synods, or by the Institution?—I think they ought to be paid by the Institution; and if any application is made for any endowment, I see no reason why the professors of theology should not be included in that endowment as well as the other professors; I have said so to some gentlemen connected with Government.

Are the two Synods, the Synod of the Seceders, and the Synod of Ulster, in spiritual communion with each other?—They are not in visible communion.

Do they communicate at their respective tables?—They do not.

Do they preach for each other occasionally?—Sometimes Seceders have preached in houses belonging to the Synod of Ulster when asked, upon the authority of preaching the Gospel to every creature.

Do the ministers of the Synod of Ulster preach in seceding congregations?—Very seldom.

Do you think that the two Synods would be likely to draw together in expressing approbation or disapprobation of particular candidates for professorships, supposing there was that power of control given to each?—I am not sure of that; sects do not often draw together.

What is the ground of separation that divides the Seceders from the Synod of Ulster?—The commencement of the separation was not in this country, it was in Scotland; the Seceders departed from the establishment in Scotland, not from the principles of the Presbyterian Church, but from what they conceived to be improper proceedings in the Scotch Church, and it extended itself to Ireland, and we remain a separate body in this country, for the same reasons as existed in the formation of the Secession.

Do you consider that the doctrine or the discipline of the Synod of Ulster is erroneous or corrupt?—One of the reasons we stand apart is, because of their difference of sentiment, some of them being Calvinists and some Arians, and some Arminians; and we conceive there is with some of them not that attention to what is called visitation and other parochial duties, that there should be, though we are well convinced some of them are very faithful ministers.

In the Synod of the Seceders you have stated, that a minister does occasionally preach in the pulpit of the Synod of Ulster?—Yes, if asked.

May an Arian preach in the pulpit of a minister of the Synod of Ulster?—I do not know how that is. I know in some pulpits some gentlemen preach very different opinions; one comes comes forward in the morning, and preaches sentiments directly contrary to another, who comes forward and preaches in the afternoon.

269

Do you conceive that that might happen in your body?—It never has; I do not know what may be.

What is the number, as far as you recollect, of the Synod of Seceders in Ireland?—One hundred and eight ministers.*

Was not one principal cause of the original secession, the state of patronage, and the practice and discipline introduced into the church, without consulting the voices of the people?—That was one in Scotland.

Of course, that does not prevail here?—No, it does not; patronage was an additional reason; and I believe that is one chief cause why the secession has succeeded to a much greater extent in Scotland than in Ireland.

The election of a minister here is quite the same in the two Synods?—Yes.

What occasioned the first connection with the Institution by the Seceding Synod?—It was from a deputation in the year 1815 coming from the Belfast Institution to the Synod; Dr. Drennan and Mr. William Magee appeared in the Synod, and were introduced as a deputation from the Belfast Academical Institution.

What did they state, shortly?—The substance of their application was, to have our Synod to recommend the students to attend the Belfast Institution.

What reply was made to them?—I will read it, as follows:—“After judgment of all the members was taken on this very important subject, the Synod unanimously resolved to recommend to their students to attend the Belfast Academical Institution, and hereby do recommend; and that they will pay every respect to the certificates of the Institution which young men may obtain for their progress and proficiency in literature.”—This was the foundation of the connection.

Then was it arranged at the same time, that there should be a professor of divinity appointed by the Seceding Synod?—Yes, that was understood; and it was in that year I was elected, and allowed to teach in the Institution; it was optional with me in the first year, whether I should teach in Ballynahinch or in Belfast, but it was understood that I should afterwards teach in the college.

Did the withdrawing of the Government support from the Institution excite any dissatisfaction among the members of the Seceding Synod, so far as you have observed?—They were grieved it was withdrawn.

Do you think the restoration of a similar bounty would now be gladly received by them?—I am sure it would.

Do you think it would create any good feeling to the Government?—I think it would; my judgment is, that that alone would be a sufficient guarantee for the peace and good order of the Institution; that it would be a sufficient motive that would secure any attachment they might wish to the Government of the country.

Has there been any alteration in the nature of the connection between the Synod and the Institution, subsequently to the time you have referred to?—None, except that we declared our disapprobation of Arianism immediately after the election of Professor Bruce.

Have you got any minute containing that declaration?—I have.

Be so good as to state it?—I have not a copy of the minute, but the substance of it is, that though we declare our abhorrence of Arian principles, we do not conceive that the pledge given by the Faculty had been in any degree violated, or that the Institution has broken faith with the Synod in that election.

In what year was that?—At Newry, in 1823; at the last election, we expressed the opinion which I take the liberty of reading, namely; “It was asked, whether the committee of superintendence had any grounds to believe, that the pledge previously given by the Faculty had in any degree been violated, viz. That there should be no interference on the part of professors with the religious opinions of the students. To this question answers as follow were given:—First, “From such investigation on the purport of said question, as I had the opportunity of making, I am of the opinion, the pledge of Faculty referred to has been hitherto honourably redeemed.” (signed) “William Moorhead.” He expresses his own opinion, not as the president. “Second, we have not discovered any violation of the pledge given by the Faculty.” (signed) “Joseph Lowry.” He was the secretary of the committee, and expresses the opinion of the whole committee.

You are aware that some anxiety has been expressed by the Synod of Ulster to obtain an increased influence in the appointment of professors?—I am.

Can you state, whether any corresponding feeling exists among the Seceding Synod?—I think not.

How do you account for the difference between the two Synods in that particular?—I could not say; I attended the meeting of the proprietors, and my opinion was, that the Synod should not interfere, and I am very glad our Synod has not interfered.

Do you think there is any probability, that if that wish of the Synod of Ulster should be altogether resisted, that they may withdraw from their connection with the Belfast Institution?—I should not apprehend any danger; my opinion upon that subject is, that owing to peculiar circumstances of late, and perhaps owing to the opinions and proceedings of some individuals in their connection, that all those resolutions were got up with respect to influence; but that they really do not express the deliberate judgment of the body at large.

Do

* See note at the end of this Examination.

Examination of
Rev.
Samuel Edgar,
D.D.
15 October 1825.

Do you conceive, that the Synod of Ulster, if seriously and anxiously desirous, as we must presume they are, of promoting the welfare in general, and the Orthodoxy in general of their pupils, could entertain a desire to send them to Glasgow rather than Belfast, under the present state of things?—I think they would be in as much danger in the one place as in the other, if not more.

Do you therefore think, that any change in their rules, that should send their candidates for the ministry to places of education in Scotland, instead of Belfast, would be injurious, and not beneficial to them?—I think it would not be beneficial.

The Presbyterian Synod of Ireland consists of 108 ordained Ministers; of these, 21, as follow, were Students in the Belfast Academical Institution, and under the care of the Rev. Dr. Edgar:—

Rev. Samuel Malcolmson,	Tassah,	County Armagh.
Isaiah Steen,	Ballicopland,	Donaghadee, Down.
William Niblocke,	Donegal,	Donegal.
James Green,	Lisbellaw,	Fermanagh.
Josias Wilson,	Drogheda,	Louth.
Samuel Dunlop,	Garmonney's Grove,	Monaghan.
Samuel Dunlop,	Hillhall,	Down.
James Wilson,	Lecomper,	Derry.
Andrew Wilson,	Dungannon,	Tyrone.
John West,	Newton Hamilton,	Armagh.
Robert M'Cleane,	Drumbanagher,	Armagh.
William Lyttle,	Coothill,	Cavan.
Robert M'Mehan,	Tyrone's Ditches,	Armagh.
Andrew M'Culloch,	Caledon,	Tyrone.
John Coulter,	Gilnahirk,	Down.
David Longmoor,	Castleblaney,	Monaghan.
Martin M'Dowel,	Creeve,	Monaghan.
James Mayne,	Balliroshane,	Antrim.
Joseph Thomas,	Dunbo,	Derry.
Alexander M'Ilwain,	Balliblack,	Down.
John Edgar,	Belfast,	Antrim.

The young men licensed to preach, and not yet ordained, who have been Students in the Belfast Institution, and under Dr. Edgar, and who are under the Synod's inspection in Ireland, are twenty-one, as follow:—

James Renton, jun. of Moy,	County Donegal.
Dawson Crawford,	Monaghan.
John Simson,	Antrim.
Alexander M'Cahan,	Derry.
Alexander Boyd,	Tyrone.
David Boyd,	Antrim.
Robert M'Cormick,	Antrim.
David Martin,	Armagh.
John Martin,	Armagh.
Andrew Graham,	Down.
Samuel Mitchell,	Antrim.
Samuel Hendrin,	Armagh.
David Donaldson,	Armagh.
William Foreland,	Monaghan.
Alexander Henry,	Tyrone.
James M'Millen,	Tyrone.
James Lowry,	Tyrone.
David Patter,	Tyrone.
James Aston,	Tyrone.
William Kennedy,	Tyrone.
William M'Alister,	Down.

Nine licentiates, as follow, were Students in the Belfast Institution, under Dr. Edgar, and they have emigrated to America:—

James Douglas,	Monaghan.	Thomas Johnson,	Antrim.
James Harris,	Monaghan.	Isaiah Nibblock,	Monaghan.
James M'Auley,	Down.	David Kirkpatrick,	Down.
Joseph Penny,	Down.	John Gray,	Monaghan.
John Niblock,	Monaghan.

271

LETTER from Dr. Edgar to the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, dated Belfast, January 21st, 1826.

Gentlemen,

THE Rev. Mr. Montgomery, one of the Board of Masters, in an interview with you in Dublin, last Christmas, states his having suggested certain regulations respecting the professorship of Hebrew, in the Belfast College, and respecting some veto on the election to that professorship, on the part of the General Synod of Ulster, and of the Presbyterian Synod of Ireland.

Examination of
Rev.
Samuel Edgar,
D. D.
15 October 1825.

Upon this important subject I feel constrained to trouble you with a few observations.

The Presbyterian Synod of Ireland, distinguished by the name Seceders, have asked no influence or veto in the election of a Professor of Hebrew, either from the Government of the country, or from the proprietors of the Belfast Institution; nor have they suggested to the gentlemen, His Majesty's Commissioners of Education Inquiry, that they wish any such influence. My decided opinion is, that they want no such veto or influence; nor, considering the latitude of tenets allowed to exist in the communion of the Synod of Ulster, can I be persuaded that they want any such veto, notwithstanding the noise raised in the north of Ireland about Arianism by some individuals in that Synod, and the consequent resolutions, hastily adopted in June 1825, by that respectable body, requiring some influence over the choice of professors in the Belfast College.

A Moderator of the Synod of Ulster, at a late election in the Belfast Institution, voted for the Rev. William Bruce, who holds Arian sentiments, and recommended that gentleman to the notice and choice of the electors. To this conduct of their moderator, the Synod in their official capacity, as a court of review, attached no blame. Several ministers of that Synod are stated to be Arians, on the oath of a reverend member of the body, and with these ministers, the strictest Trinitarians in the Synod hold ministerial communion in the very solemn act of ordaining to sacred office, and in all other presbyterial proceedings; keeping these facts in view, it seems altogether inconsistent, if not incredible, that this Synod should desire a veto, for the purpose of preventing the election of an Arian to teach Hebrew or Greek, in a seminary promoting general education, and interfering with no distinctions of communion among Christians.

Conceiving myself as solemnly bound by the obligations of my office, in conformity to the divine word, steadfastly to promote the maintenance of the doctrine of the Trinity, of the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ, and other important doctrines of pure revelation; I would infinitely prefer leaving the election of professors to the candid and unbiased judgment of the present electors in the Institution, than have that election put, in any way, under the control of the General Synod of Ulster. In the election of any one professor, and especially a Professor of Hebrew or Greek, were a veto granted to the General Synod, and to the Synod of Seceders, it would only be an occasion of endless jealousies, if not of contention, between the Synods, and would serve no purpose, either for the maintenance of truth or the promotion of peace among the Presbyterians of Ireland.

My decided conviction is, that to leave the electors in the Belfast College unshackled and unbiassed, as they now are, will be found to be the best way for reconciling all parties connected with the Institution, the best way for the maintenance of truth and peace, for the prevention of party spirit and faction among ecclesiastics, and the way most consistent with those principles of union and affection among Christians of all denominations, which you Gentlemen Commissioners, from your Report already published, seem anxious to promote.

By the constitution and laws of the Belfast Institution, the Synods have full liberty to choose whom they please to teach divinity, to set aside a professor if he do not please, and elect another in his room; and this power seems to be a sufficient security, and all that needs be reasonably required for the maintenance of those religious principles which they wish to have inculcated on all the candidates for sacred office under their care.

The professors who compose the Faculty, excepting so far as official duty in the professorship of divinity may require, have given to the Synods a pledge not to interfere with the religious opinions of any of their pupils; and, in consistency with the principle of religious liberty, this solemn engagement, publicly made and entered on the Synod's records, should surely be more than enough to satisfy the most zealous defenders of the "Faith once delivered to the Saints." Even on the supposition that a teacher of Hebrew or Greek were disposed, in biblical criticism, to give what might be judged to be an erroneous construction, truth has nothing to fear from such construction; besides, any stricture on the right of private judgment in matters purely religious, other than warranted by the word of God, would seem to imply, that those who would impose such stricture are unwilling or afraid to submit their creed to the test of free inquiry.

The Synods, in any public document, have never, so far as I know, expressed any alarm, lest the religious principles of their students might be corrupted in the college of Glasgow, though professors in that college, at different periods, have been represented as holding religious principles opposed to those which the Synods profess to reckon Orthodox.

You will please to observe, gentlemen, that in the above statements, I am not deputed to write in the name of that Synod to which I belong; yet the sentiments recorded, I am fully

Examination of
Rev.
Samuel Edgar,
D. D.
15 October 1825.

persuaded, are the sentiments of that body. You will also please to notice, that though a member of Faculty in the Belfast College, I do not presume to say anything in the name of that Faculty.

With sentiments of profound respect,

I have the honour to be your most obedient serant,

Sam' Edgar.

To His Majesty's Commissioners
of Education Inquiry.

Second LETTER from Dr. Edgar to the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, dated Belfast, January 23d, 1826.

Gentlemen,

IN answer to a letter of Robert Pauncefote, esq. from His Majesty's Commissioners of Education Inquiry, dated January 12th, 1826, the statements as follow are made:—

The support of the Professor of Divinity, enjoined by the Synod of Seceders, for the official duties of the appointment, is 50*l.* per annum. This sum is paid by the students, and the annual fee for each student is larger or less, in proportion to the number attending each session. No sum of money is paid me by the Synod, in addition to this annuity from the students.

This is the eleventh session for me to teach in the Belfast Institution.

In Session 1815 - - - 24 students attended my lectures.

1816 - - - 23 - - - - d°

1817 - - - 21 - - - - d°

1818 - - - 15 - - - - d°

1819 - - - 22 - - - - d°

1820 - - - 15 - - - - d°

1821 - - - 18 - - - - d°

1822 - - - 24 - - - - d°

1823 - - - 23 - - - - d°

1824 - - - 31 - - - - d°

1825 - - - 32 - - - - d°

1826 - - - 25 - - - - d°

This variety in point of numbers is not owing to any impression favourable or unfavourable to the Belfast Institution; but to circumstances altogether distinct from any increase or diminution of public confidence that might be supposed to exist respecting that Institution.

By the regulations of the Presbyterian Synod of Seceders, the students under their care must attend the instructions in divinity of their professor in the college, for four distinct sessions of three months each; and these sessions must be in four distinct winter seasons. They are allowed to attend the divinity lectures after being examined by the Presbytery to which they respectively belong, concerning their literary qualifications and fitness for attending; and also, after having been public students for two sessions of six months each; one of these sessions in the Greek and Logic classes, and the other in the Moral Philosophy and Mathematic classes. The student's collegiate course must occupy at least six years. During the progress of this course, they are frequently absent from college one session, and in attendance another. Some choose to stay a season from college, to improve in reading; some are engaged in teaching school, and do not wish to relinquish this teaching every successive half-year, for the purpose of attending college. Numbers obtain tuitions in the families of gentlemen in different parts of Ireland, and absent themselves from college for a season or two during the period of their curriculums, rather than lose a good situation.

These things, and sometimes want of health, want of means, and other accidental circumstances, sufficiently account for the difference of one season from another in number of students attending the divinity classes, or any other class in college.

No one is absent from any class this session, nor has any one been absent last session, or any session, so far as known to me, on account of any supposed diminution of public confidence in the Institution, or because two professors have been elected, one to teach Greek, and another Hebrew, who are reported to hold Arian sentiments.

I have the honour to be, your most obedient servant,

Sam' Edgar.

To his Majesty's Commissioners of Education Inquiry.

273

Appendix, No. 16.

Examination of Dr. Samuel Smith Thomson, M. D.; Thursday, 13th October 1825.

YOU are a practising Physician in Belfast?—I am, and have been upwards of twenty years.

And are now a Visitor of the Belfast Institution?—I am.

How long have you been connected with the Institution?—I think between three and four years only; I became a Proprietor, by subscribing to its funds, some time in the year 1821; I was elected a Visitor on the immediately ensuing annual election, which must have been 1822, as I go out of office by rotation in 1826.

Was there any particular reason why you postponed becoming a Subscriber till the year you have mentioned?—Yes.

What was that reason?—My reasons were in a great degree of a private nature.

Were they reasons flowing from the character of the Institution?—My private reasons were not connected with the Institution; I had, however, some that were.

You had no particular objection to the Institution, which became removed by any subsequent circumstance?—I had some objections at first, arising out of the nature of its constitution.

Were these objections afterwards removed?—They were in a great measure removed, by a more accurate knowledge as to its management and internal concerns; and since I have had personal experience in these points, by being a Visitor and Proprietor, my objections have been entirely done away.

What is your opinion as to the sentiment which has prevailed upon the occasion of elections among the electors; how far have they appeared to you to be influenced by private motives, or by reference to the qualifications of the candidates?—I have only been an elector upon one occasion, and I can express an entire and firm conviction, that the electors were then influenced solely by the qualifications of the candidates; and with respect to the history of former elections, I am persuaded that the same sentiments prevailed upon all occasions.

Does it appear to you there is a sufficient attendance of Managers and Visitors to secure the due management of the Institution?—When there is any business of importance to be transacted, there is usually a very full attendance of Managers and Visitors; when there is only the mere ordinary routine, the attendance is more lax. Such is my experience.

Do you consider that harmony or a difference of opinion forms principally the character of the meetings of the Managers?—The opinions of the Managers are perfectly free; there are, therefore, often shades of difference; but the most perfect harmony prevails, and no dissension has at any time arisen out of the decisions come to.

Have you observed any intermixture of political feeling prevailing, first, among the Managers?—Never; I have never known political feeling to mingle itself, in the slightest degree, with the concerns of the Institution; there are various political sentiments prevailing among the Managers, and also among the Visitors; but I have never known this to influence their conduct in the government of the Institution.

Do you think there is any peculiar tone or feeling that characterizes the Institution at present, either amongst the Proprietors or Visitors?—No, I am not aware that there is. If political feeling be meant, I beg to observe, that the Proprietors of the Institution form so large a portion of the respectable inhabitants, that describing their feelings would, in a great measure, be describing those of the town, which I conceive are well known to the kingdom at large. As in most large commercial towns, so there is here a considerable degree of independence of feeling on political subjects, and perhaps a general tendency to jealousy of power on the part of the Government. This, I think, constitutes the prevailing sentiment among the majority of the inhabitants of Belfast, and therefore, so far as the Proprietors of the Institution consist of them, such a tone may be said to prevail in it.

Do you conceive that that feeling proceeds beyond the limits which the constitution would not merely recognize, but approve of?—I have not the slightest reason to believe that it does, on my own personal knowledge; and as to the great bulk of the Proprietors, I am persuaded they are actuated by sound constitutional principles.

Do you conceive, that a spirit of disaffection to the Government, and to the constitution, marks any considerable portion of the students at present in the Institution?—I have no knowledge whatever on that subject; I may have formed a belief, but have no knowledge; I should think not; in fact, I do not believe any disaffection exists among them.

Have you sufficient knowledge to be able to speak upon that point, as to the Professors and Masters?—I think I have. With some I am in habits of greater intimacy than with others, but I am satisfied they are all men of sound constitutional feelings, and have no wish to subvert the present order of things.

We should be glad if you would state whatever may be your own opinion as to the expediency of forming any connection between Government and the Institution?—My own view of the matter has always been, that it would be a salutary measure to have a connection between the Institution and the Government.

Have you ever had any definite views of your own as to the nature of that connection, seeing at present there exists none?—I have not till lately; but in consequence of the conversation that took place here some days ago, as that question was thrown out in the course of the discussion, I have turned my thoughts to it, and some ideas have occurred to me;

Examination of
Dr.
S. S. Thomson,
M. D.
13 October 1825.

Examination of
Dr.
S. S. Thomson,
M.D.
13 October 1825.

I beg to say, they are purely my own ideas. In the event of Government determining on a restoration of the annual grant to the Belfast Academical Institution, should any check or security be deemed necessary on the part of the Institution, perhaps a sufficient one might be found in some such plan as the following:—That the Crown should be empowered, by Parliament, to appoint a Board of Control or Inquiry, consisting of such persons in number and quality as Ministers might think fit; that such Board should be invested with full powers to examine and inquire into the affairs and management of the Institution at all times; that they should be authorized to call for all minutes, records and correspondence whatever relating thereto, and to examine all persons on oath touching its concerns, and report thereon to the Crown; that this Board should be either permanent, to be called into operation on such occasions and at such times as Ministers might direct, or be temporarily appointed for the occasion. By a provision of this kind, I apprehend that Ministers could at all times ascertain the scope and tendency of its proceedings, and would be enabled to learn with accuracy how far its avowed objects, and those alone, were pursued. They would thereby be fully competent to determine on the propriety of continuing the annual grant, or if sufficient ground appeared from the report of the Board of Control for withholding it, they would be justified before Parliament and the nation in so doing. I believe that Government never sought any patronage or interference in the management of the Institution, except with a view to obtain a safeguard against any misdirection in the movements of a machine of such important influence in society; which possibly might arise out of the popular nature of its constitution. Under this impression, I conceive that the proposed plan might afford to Government a sufficient degree of surveillance; while, without interfering with the rights and privileges of the Proprietors, or touching in any degree on the independence of the Institution, the existence of such a Board must operate as a useful and salutary check on its proceedings, should any check be necessary. It may, therefore, be presumed, that such a proposition would be readily acceded to by the Proprietors.

We should be glad to know your opinion of the expediency of conferring upon Government the power of approving or disapproving of individuals who might be elected to the different Professorships; it being well understood, that it is in the highest degree improbable, that the Government should disapprove of any individual without there were good reasons for so doing?—I should not have the slightest objection to confer that power upon the Government, being satisfied it would not be exercised without good grounds, and I think it would be conceded by the Proprietors, because it was offered to the Government formerly, and I do not apprehend they would now refuse it.

Is it your opinion, that the Institution is universally acceptable and approved of by the aristocracy resident in Belfast and its neighbourhood?—I have every reason to think so at present; I do not know of any exception; I have not met with any gentleman who has expressed disapprobation. I think there may have been some time ago objections, such as I myself had, to its constitution; but I believe these have been done away altogether, by the experience of the good it has effected, and by a conviction that the errors it was supposed to possess in theory, have not been found injurious or dangerous in practice.

Do you not think there are several laymen in the vicinity, who rightly or wrongly are impressed with the feeling that it may be made the means of circulating Arian principles, and therefore object to it?—No, I do not, so far as regards laymen; such an opinion may exist, but not to my knowledge.

So far as relates to clergymen?—I think the majority of the clergymen I have had any conversation with in this neighbourhood, do not feel any objection to it on that ground.

Are you yourself a Calvinist?—No, I am not.

Are you a member of the Presbytery of Antrim?—I am a member of Dr. Bruce's congregation, which belongs to the Presbytery of Antrim.

Do you associate much with persons of Orthodox principles?—Yes, I associate with various classes of people, many of whom are of Orthodox principles.

With clerical persons of that persuasion?—Yes, I am on a footing of intimacy with the curate of the parish, and well acquainted with the vicar.

The question has reference not at all to the Established Church, but to the division of Presbyterians into what are called Arians and Calvinists; have you had much communication with clergymen of Orthodox principles?—No, I am not in particular habits of intimacy with any resident in Belfast.

Are you enabled to state what the feelings of the Orthodox Clergy of the Synod of Ulster are as to the Institution?—No, I am not, generally speaking; but as to the Orthodox Clergy of Belfast, I believe their opinions are favourable to it.

They do belong to the Synod of Ulster?—Some to the Synod of Ulster, and some to the Seceding Synod.

Have you had opportunities of understanding how far the Institution has the favourable opinion at present of the Established Church, as well as of the Presbyterian Church?—I think in the town and neighbourhood of Belfast, where it is best known, it has the general approbation of both.

Including all classes? Yes, so far as I know.

275

Appendix, No. 17.

Examination of Mr. John Barnett; Thursday 13th October 1825.

WHAT is your profession in life?—I am in mercantile business, and also in the tanning business.

And a Manager of the Belfast Institution?—Yes.

How long have you been connected as Manager or Visitor with the Institution?—I have been connected with it since 1815 or 1816; I have never been out but one year.

Have you given to the management of its concerns any considerable portion of your time?—A great deal.

Are you upon the whole, satisfied with the manner in which it has been conducted from the commencement?—I am.

Do you think that any material improvement has at any time been introduced into its constitution?—There have been very few alterations introduced since the commencement. I think that is an improvement, when you can satisfy literary men, that they were not to be removed at the mere pleasure of the Managers and Visitors, without having some particular fault to bring forward against them.

We understand perfectly the situation of the teachers and professorships; at present, we wish to know, whether you consider the institution of the Board of Faculty and the Board of Masters an improvement?—I do, a very great one.

Does it appear to you to be highly necessary or desirable, or admissible, to introduce any further improvement in the condition of the body?—I should have no objection to any thing being introduced, which they would consider an improvement.

Supposing, but not presuming, or implying it, that it should be thought proper to confer upon the Government of the country, the power of approbation of the professors after election, and subject to which they could only enter upon their office, should you yourself see any objection to such an arrangement?—Not the smallest; we could not expect the support of Government, unless they were perfectly satisfied with the characters of the persons elected.

Is it your own impression, that it would be desirable to form a connection with the Government, or would you rather continue independent?—I would rather form a connection with the Government of the country; I think, in an Institution, such as this is, it would give to it a dignity and consequence in the country, it could not otherwise have, without forming a connection with the Government; and I think if that connection was formed upon a liberal and wise scheme, it would very much promote the interests of the Institution here, and make it more extensively useful.

We understand distinctly, you would not yourself entertain any jealousy of the control of Government within salutary limits?—By no means.

Do you think those sentiments would be found to prevail among the Proprietors?—Yes, among the great majority.

Have you known of any attempts to interfere with the religious principles of any of the students?—Never; and if I did find it, I would consider it my duty as a Manager to bring before the Boards the conduct of such Professor.

Do you see yourself any objection to the occasional election of gentlemen holding Arian sentiments to the different Professorships of the Institution, always excepting the two Professorships of Divinity?—I think there would be more objection to them than to any others, and so long as the great majority of Professors about the Institution are Orthodox, I could not see that the election of one or two Arian Professors, particularly the teachers of languages, is such a particular matter as has been attempted to be represented; I would certainly, ceteris paribus, never vote for an Arian myself, but I would not like to be confined in such a way, that if an Orthodox man and an Arian should offer themselves for the situation, that I would prefer an Orthodox man, merely on account of his orthodoxy, without his being in every other way qualified for the situation.

What congregation do you belong to?—The Seceding Presbyterian.

Your views are Calvinistic?—They are.

Are you aware that the appointment of Arians to professorships, in two late instances, has excited considerable jealousy in the mind of many Calvinists?—I am perfectly aware of it; I know the state of the controversy pretty well.

Does not it occur to you, that the same motives and chances that have led to those elections, might eventually lead to the appointment of the great majority of Professors from persons professing Arian principles?—I think it never could, for this reason, that the Orthodox sentiments are the prevailing sentiments, and the popular sentiments; and besides, I know gentlemen who are Arians themselves, and yet would rather, ceteris paribus, lean to Orthodox persons as being more pleasing to the people at large.

Are you decidedly of opinion, that Calvinism is more acceptable than Arianism to the Presbyterian population at large?—I am perfectly persuaded of it.

We should be glad to know what proportion of Arians there are among the gentlemen who are at present the Managers of the Belfast Institution?—The only mode in which I could ascertain that, would be by the respective clergymen they worship under; I think the majority of the present Managers and Visitors are not Orthodox; but I do say, I have heard several of those gentlemen often remark, they would support Orthodox Professors, in preference to others, all things equal, because they found it and felt it their duty to give satisfaction to the majority of the people who send their sons there for education.

In what manner can you account for the result, that when the great majority of the population

Examination of
Mr.
John Barnett,
13 October 1825.

Examination of
Mr.
John Barnett,
13 October 1825.

population are Orthodox, the majority of Managers and Visitors are Arians?—It is only the Proprietors of the Institution who appoint the Managers and Visitors.

But it would seem naturally to follow, that if the great majority are Orthodox, some majority at least, out of any certain class of it would be Orthodox; here it appears a different consequence has ensued?—The only way I account for this is, that the Managers and Visitors are all or nearly so, inhabitants of the town of Belfast, and are selected by a class of people most influential, who have subscribed a certain sum.

We understand your answer to imply, that the higher classes are more generally Arians than the lower classes?—They are.

Can you account for that in any manner?—It is invidious for any person to say that the higher classes did not inquire so much for themselves as the lower; but my own opinion is, that there are very respectable men in Belfast and elsewhere, who know very little about the differences in religion.

But who are Arians, nevertheless?—Yes; I think they read the Scriptures too little, and sceptical works too much.

You, being a Calvinist, consider that inquiry would lead to Calvinism?—Yes, biblical reading and religious inquiry.

And therefore you conclude, that these persons are Arians, without making inquiry for themselves?—Yes, they take the word of the clergyman they hear; the Arian clergymen are not in the habit of preaching upon doctrinal points; they deliver moral essays, which are very good so far.

Would you not be able to judge of the Arianism of a clergyman as much from what he did not speak upon, as what he did?—Yes, and I should find fault with it equally.

Is it your opinion, that Calvinistic views lead to a greater strictness of observances than persons in the higher classes of life find it convenient to act up to?—I consider that a conscientious Calvinist ought to be as strict in works, and as moral and as cautious, to do nothing that would bring any reproach upon his particular views, as any man who depended upon the merit of good works.

But, in point of fact, which do you think leads to the greatest system of restraint upon actions; do you think a person who was desirous of enjoying the good things of this world, would find it less convenient to be a Calvinist than an Arian?—I think so.

Do you think that may account for Arianism prevailing more among the higher classes than the lower?—I think it proceeds generally, if not entirely, from the want of scriptural research; they take things upon trust.

Do you not think they may conceive just the same of you?—Yes, they do; but they judge us unjustly. I think we do inquire more.

We believe there is no Arianism among the body of Seceders?—No, that is impossible; the moment it was known, the minister offending would be brought before the Presbytery, and the thing made public; that is the great difference between the Secession body and the Orthodox part of the Synod of Ulster. The latter hold communion with men not Orthodox, but the Seceders would not do so; and there I think is the great line of distinction to be drawn. I would have no objection to join with any man to promote education and the good of the country at large, of any religious denomination, but I should have a serious objection to join in Christian communion with a man who was an Arian.

What do you understand by "Christian communion?"—To sit down at the Lord's table, and join in stated worship.

Supposing he were disposed to sit down at your table, without asking you to sit down at his, would you feel any objection to it?—Yes, unless he had the same views of the Redeemer that we have.

Should you feel any objection to the more serious or orthodox part of the Established Church sitting down with you?—No, I conceive they are Trinitarians, and believe in the atonement made by Christ, as well as we; and I think no person who holds these doctrines should be objected to.

Would you object to any member of the Established Church?—I would object to no man whom I did not know to deny the doctrines of the Trinity and Atonement.

What would you say of a Roman Catholic?—I would permit him to sit down with me. I think the Roman Catholics hold all the necessary doctrines to salvation, and perhaps more.

You think they sin from too much, and not from too little?—I do; I conceive their errors lie in believing too much.

Is it your impression, that the majority of the Proprietors of the Belfast Institution hold what are called Arian doctrines?—No, I do not think the Proprietors do; there is a number in the town of Belfast, and there may be one-half. They may be nearly equal; but those in the country are generally Orthodox.

Are they what you would call zealous Arians?—No, they are not much given to wish to make proselytes.

Do you think they would be likely to seek out persons who were Arians for professorships?—I have never found that; I think gentlemen who are Arians themselves, put as much confidence in Orthodox men as in Arians.

Have you any fears, as an Orthodox man, from the constitution of the Institution, that a larger number of Arians will now go forth than before?—No, I know the contrary is the case; I know not one-sixth or one-tenth of the clergy educated here who have gone forth imbued with Arian principles.

Do you not think the personal character of the Professors of Divinity is a sufficient mode of accounting for the Calvinism or Orthodoxy of the young men they have sent forth?—

That

277
Examination of
Mr.
John Barnett,
13 October 1825.

That is one reason. With respect to the Secession body, one can account for it upon every principle; because none other would be admitted, and the appointment of an Orthodox man by the Synod of Ulster, showed that the majority were of that way of thinking also.

Should you be perfectly content to see David Hume, with all his attainments, in the chair of moral philosophy?—No.

Do you think he would do great mischief?—He might do mischief.

Do you think it would be possible for him to deliver a course of lectures, of that nature, without doing the greatest mischief?—He might deliver lectures without its doing great mischief; but if he afterwards explained his own sentiments, of course he could do more. Some Professors do it, and others do not; some give both sides, without delivering their own sentiments, and others give both sides, and then add their own sentiments, (as I understand.)

Do you conceive that Arians feel any anxiety, or are led to entertain any distrustful anxiety as to the salvation of the Calvinists?—No; they seem to have little anxiety on that point.

Have the Calvinists any fear as to the ultimate fate of Arians?—I do not wish to dwell, even in thought, upon that point; it always carries me into a labyrinth upon the subject.

Do you not think a conscientious Calvinist has a great deal more of apprehension about an Arian friend, than an Arian has about him?—Yes.

Then do you think, therefore, that an Arian would be more safe under a Calvinist Professor, than a Calvinist under an Arian?—I think he would be safer.

Do you mean, that an Arian would be in less danger of having his Arian principles interfered with by a Calvinist, than the Calvinist would be of having his principles interfered with by the Arian?—I think the Professors have not the power of setting the different systems before the students in a striking light, except the Divinity Professors; and I think you cannot conceive that a young man goes to the Institution like a blank sheet of paper, without any religious principles; that is the greatest libel that can be offered upon their parents or respective pastors.

Are you extensively acquainted with the feelings and views of the Synod of Seceders, as to the Institution of Belfast?—Yes.

What is their opinion?—They would rather, certainly, that no Arian Professors were there, but they do not apprehend any danger from the gentlemen already appointed.

What, in your opinion, has given rise to the alarm which has been felt upon this subject?—In my opinion, the alarm could be traced to an individual, supported by a few others. The motives of men are not easily ascertained; but it does appear to me, in this case, that the objections have proceeded from private hostility or personal pique, rather than from real principle; for the gentleman I allude to, himself belongs to a body among whom there is a number of reputed Arians, and amongst whom there exists a difference of religious sentiments as great as there possibly can be between the Professors of the Institution; and whilst he can feel no reluctance in holding ministerial communication with such a body, it cannot but strike every unprejudiced person as inconsistent, that he should insist that all the professors and teachers in the seminary should be of one mind, thereby prescribing for others a different rule of action from that which he adopts himself; and besides, such objections appear to me quite idle; for I know not a college where Arian principles may not be imbibed. Where have the Arians in the Synod of Ulster received their collegiate education? In Glasgow, from whence a much greater proportion of Arians have sprung in the same time than from the Belfast Institution; for I do not believe, nor have I heard, that above two students supposed to hold Arian principles have been educated there during a period of nine years.

Do you think there are Arian principles in either of the chairs at Glasgow?—Yes; I have been told so by several clergymen of the Synod of Ulster, that they went first to college when young men, sixteen or seventeen, with Calvinistic principles, and came home with other principles. There was a gentleman who has lately died in this town who told me so; he told me he was bred one of the most strict Presbyterians, what are called the Covenanters. "My father (said he) was an Elder among them, and I went firmly attached to the Larger and Shorter Catechisms and Confession of Faith, and I came home with reverse sentiments, and have held them ever since." It may be upwards of thirty years ago since he was at Glasgow.

May not that circumstance be accounted for by other circumstances besides those of peculiar Arian principles being inculcated by the Professors; may it not have arisen from the circumstances in which he was placed in the university?—Yes; but I think there would be a considerable bias of Orthodoxy on his mind, and that it required considerable struggles to give it up, and therefore I consider it was the result of the lectures.

Whatever may have been the cause, of the fact you have no doubt?—None at all.

That Arianism has ensued from Scotch education more than in Ireland?—Yes; so far as respects the Presbyterian clergy.

Two recent elections have been particularly adverted to?—They have.

Before those elections had any persons professing Arian principles been elected professors?—Yes; Dr. Nielson, my particular friend, not professing but known to be so; I have no doubt of it; he was my schoolfellow.

Was he the predecessor of Mr. Bruce?—Yes? he held Mr. Hincks's situation as Head Classical Teacher, and he was also the Professor of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew.

Was he the first Professor?—No; the Rev. Andrew O'Beirne, afterwards Dr. O'Beirne, who was of the Church of England, and since removed to the Diocesan School in Enniskillen,

Examination of
Mr.
John Barnett,
13 October 1825.

Was any objection made to the election of Dr. Nielson?—Not the slightest.

About what time was he elected?—The 27th January 1818; he died in 1821. I was the principal agent in bringing Dr. Nielson here from Dundalk. I stated I had no doubt he was competent to the situation then vacant; and although Dr. Nielson's views did not accord with my own, I was so satisfied with his conduct, that he would never attempt to disturb the religious principles of the young men under his care, that the Managers and Visitors delegated Dr. Hanna and me to give him an invitation, which we did.

You were both Orthodox?—Yes; and we thought it would be a compliment paid to the Synod of Ulster to place one of their own body at the head of the Institution.

Did Dr. Nielson unite in himself the two offices which are now in Mr. Bruce and Mr. Hincks?—He did; and only for Dr. Nielson's great literary attainments the students would have lost a session at college, for we had elected a gentleman from the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, upon the recommendation of several ministers of the Church of Scotland, but particularly we were led to elect him upon the recommendation of an eminent scholar who taught the High School there, and certainly of high literary fame; but we found he was a person by no means qualified; he was an Orthodox man, at least he professed to be so; we had to dismiss him before the end of the session; and Dr. Nielson took his place.

From your knowledge of the Proprietors do you think a person who was likely to interfere with the religious principles of the students would be chosen a Professor?—I do not think any man would be chosen under such circumstances.

At the time that Dr. Nielson was there, was there any other gentleman of reputed Arian principles?—I think not as Professor.

As Professor or Master?—As Master I cannot say; it is rather delicate to speak of gentlemen; I have heard that Mr. Montgomery is an Arian.

How long has Mr. Montgomery been a Master?—He was appointed on the 7th of October 1817.

Did you ever hear any objection made to his appointment on the ground of his being an Arian?—No, not the smallest, till the year 1822, which was the year after Mr. Bruce was appointed.

There are two Masters within the walls of the Institution, who are permitted to receive boarders; and is it not the fact, that they are at this moment both of them Arians?—They are so reputed, and my belief is so.

Is that a state of things that you yourself feel perfectly satisfied with as a Manager?—For myself, as a Manager I have not the smallest fear upon the subject, because the interest of the men binds them not to attempt to disturb the faith of any young man under their care; I have had two nephews, one under each of these Masters, and no attempt was ever made by them to disturb their religious sentiments, which were and still are Orthodox. Mr. Hincks has been long in the habit of teaching, and he has had the sons of a great number of the Establishment under his care, and Roman Catholics too; and he has never attempted to proselyte any of them; his eldest son is a staunch Calvinist, as I am informed, and he has one a Socinian preacher in England, and another in the Established Church, residing at Antrim.

Who is no Calvinist?—I do not know precisely what he is; he may perhaps be an Arminian.

Without any direct attempt on the part of the Professors or Masters to proselytise, is it not natural that the children should take up the sentiments of the person by whom they are taught?—Yes, if religious subjects were discussed, and arguments were resorted to, but all such things are avoided.

In ordinary conversation, in conveying that moral and religious instruction which a teacher or the head of a family might with propriety do?—With respect to moral instruction there could be no objection to a Calvinist hearing what an Arian could say; a question of that sort was brought forward in the Synod of Ulster in 1823, in Armagh, and it was attempted to be supported by saying some conversation of that kind had taken place by Mr. Montgomery in his house after school hours; but Mr. Montgomery dared them to the proof, and they failed in the proof, or in other words produced none.

Would you yourself, as a Calvinist parent, feel perfectly satisfied that your child should board in the house of an Arian schoolmaster at a distance from you?—I should have no objection in the world to place him under Mr. Hincks or Mr. Montgomery, knowing them as I do.

The question is put in the abstract?—If I did not know the gentleman I would not, unless I were satisfied my child's principles were so well formed they could not be shaken.

Would you put your child under the care of any gentleman, without first knowing his religious sentiments and moral character?—Certainly not.

Had Mr. Hincks's predecessor the boarding house as Mr. Hincks now has?—He had.

Then the only two boarding houses in the Institution have been under the direction and government of persons who happened to be Arians, since 1817?—They have.

Has any objection been made to that circumstance by the Synod of Ulster?—Not to my knowledge; the first objection by the Synod that I am aware of, was made in the year 1822, at the next meeting after the election of Mr. Bruce.

Can you form any opinion, as to whether the majority of parents who have children in those boarding houses are Calvinists or Arians themselves?—I could not pretend to say, for generally the boarders come from a distance, from the country around Belfast, from the south and west of Ireland, and some from England and America.

Do you think that the danger that Orthodoxy may be exposed to through the possibility of Arian principles being insinuated through Arian professors, as to lay subjects, is guarded against against by the consideration that Orthodoxy will be inculcated by the Divinity Professors?—Yes, and the majority of the other Professors being Orthodox also.

279

Is there any other matter connected with the Belfast Institution, you may think of importance to bring under the notice of the Commissioners?—The most material considerations I should now propose to the Commissioners, connected with the Institution, relate to the various and conflicting opinions of the different Moderators of the Synod of Ulster since 1821, when Mr. Bruce was appointed Professor of Greek and Humanity. The Moderator of 1821 attended the election of Mr. Bruce, and supported him with great zeal and ability, informing the electors that nothing would gratify the body he had then the honour to represent more highly than to appoint Mr. Bruce; and at the same time he said, he had it from a person holding a high official situation, that the restoration of the 1,500*l.* would soon follow his appointment. The Moderator for 1824 says, that the Directors of the Institution have broken faith with the Synod, and ruined the seminary by this very appointment, so strongly recommended by his brother then in office; the Moderator of 1824, also denounces the Presbytery of Antrim from having any connection with the Institution, saying none of its members should hold any place or situation there. The Moderator of 1823 (his predecessor) holds a different opinion; for he thinks the Presbytery of Antrim might have a vote in the election of Professors, consequently giving to that body a degree of influence which the other deprecates; the Moderator for 1823 objects to the Secession body having a vote (which the Proprietors resolved to bestow, but found they could not), and insists that if the Seceders should get a vote in the appointment of Professors, the Synod of Ulster should have at least five votes, although the number of the latter is not double that of the former; I take the liberty of bringing these circumstances before the Commissioners, to show the great difficulty the Directors of the Institution have experienced in the management of their trust. For three years past the Institution has been teased with the vexatious clamours and complaints of the Moderators of the Synod of Ulster for the time being, (with one honourable exception, the Moderator for 1822, who conducted himself towards the seminary in every respect as became a divine, a scholar, and a gentleman); for these reasons I was very desirous, as an early and steady friend to the Institution, that an arrangement with the Synod of Ulster should be made, which would permit the seminary to have peace and rest; and preferring any thing from the body at large in a tangible shape to the whim or caprice of every Moderator who chose to be dissatisfied; I supported a late overture, brought before the Proprietors by a Committee of the Synod, and which I hoped would have reconciled all former differences. But as the proposition from the Synod was not precisely acceded to, and lest attempts might be made on this account to injure the Institution (in the eyes all the Commissioners), I deem it my duty to bring these papers under their notice. I have now to make a few observations upon the importance of the Institution; first, giving to this part of Ireland a taste for a higher degree of literature than existed before its commencement; second, the education of the clergy of the different Presbyterian bodies, who are the spiritual guides of nearly one million of the Irish people; third, in preparing a class of persons (next in importance to ministers of the Gospel) as teachers of youth, who after being instructed in the Belfast Academical Institution for their several duties, and receiving a certificate of their possessing the requisite qualifications, are spread over the whole province as schoolmasters; about two hundred such persons have received instructions for this purpose since the Institution was founded; many gentlemen in the south of Ireland also, have obtained young men from the Belfast Institution, as tutors to their families, and I have never learned an instance in which they did not give general satisfaction; all the students of Divinity belonging to the Synod of Ulster, (say from 15 to 20), who have been educated in the Institution, and are now placed in congregations, besides a greater number of licentiates are Orthodox, with the exception of one or two; their names can be forwarded, if the Commissioners should wish to examine them, to the point of whether any attempt was ever made to subvert or disturb their private and particular religious opinions, which they had embraced from their parents, guardians or respective pastors, and to inculcate Arian principles in their stead; many members of the Established Church, as well as Dissenters, are receiving and have received in the Belfast Institution their preparatory course of studies, to fit them for entering into Trinity College, Dublin; they are destined for all the learned professions, and in many cases have obtained the highest honours that ancient seminary could bestow upon the successful competitors for the prizes for which they contended; many Roman Catholic young men likewise receive their classical and scientific education before resorting to study theology at Maynooth; two subjects, religion and politics, have been for ever excluded from the boards of Managers and Visitors, among whom there is at all times a difference of sentiment upon both; nor do the religious or political opinions of any individual in my mind form the least inducement to the Proprietors to elect him. I beg leave further to direct the attention of the Commissioners to the following resolutions, entered into by the Synod of Ulster in 1824:—

“Resolved unanimously; That this Synod, having long and deeply felt the important advantages that would result from a home education of the candidates for the Presbyterian ministry in the province of Ulster, and having experienced its happy effects in the literary progress and moral deportment of their students at the Belfast Academical Institution for the last nine years, learns with very high satisfaction, that the Parliamentary Commissioners appointed to investigate the state of education in Ireland, have been instructed to inquire into the utility, administration and resources of the Institution, and to report their opinion concerning the same to his Majesty.” The Synod hails such a measure, as likely to terminate in the permanent connection of the Institution with the Government of the country, by which the continuance of public confidence would be insured, and

Examination of
Mr.
John Barnett,
13 October 1825.

Examination of
Mr.
John Barnett,
13 October 1825.

adequate means afforded, not merely for securing the inestimable blessings of a liberal and virtuous education to the students of this church, but also for extending them to the north of Ireland in general, being so fully sensible of the merits of that rising seminary, and the eminent attainments of its Professors, the Synod has only to regret, that the Institution wants those collegiate privileges, which would enable it still further to excite the emulation and reward the labours of its students.

(signed) W. Porter,
Clerk of the General Synod of Ulster.

Overtured, and unanimously agreed to; That whenever the Moderator of this Synod shall be called on to vote at the election of a Professor in the Belfast Institution, he shall in due time convene the General Synod's fixed Committee; and cause to be laid before them, the names of the several candidates, with their recommendatory testimonials; and shall afterwards communicate to the electors the opinion of the Committee.*

Appendix, No. 18.

Further Examination of Mr. John Barnett; Monday, 3d July 1826.

Examination of
Mr.
John Barnett,
3 July 1826.

ARE you a Presbyterian?—Yes.

Arian or Anti-arian?—Anti-arian.

Are you well acquainted with the Belfast Institution?—Yes, very well.

Will you describe the connection between the collegiate department and the schools?—They are quite separate; the Schoolmasters have their houses free of rent and accommodate boarders, but interfere not with the college; the Professors have houses of their own, and pay rent.

Are not most of the young men intended for the Ministry in the Presbyterian Church, taught at these schools?—Very few of the students of divinity are taught in these schools; some of them (perhaps many) may have been taught by masters educated and prepared for such duties, in our schools.

The primary importance of your Institution seems to be in educating the young men destined for the Presbyterian ministry?—Undoubtedly; and in the next place, in preparing a great many schoolmasters, who are scattered over Ulster as teachers; and in the last place, in giving to that part of Ireland a taste and tone for literature, comparatively unknown before its commencement.

Was it the intention of the original founders, that the Institution should become a college?—A place for educating the Presbyterian clergy in their native country, had been a desideratum long and anxiously looked for by that body; and the founders of the Institution had this in view as soon as circumstances would permit the carrying their wishes into effect; the Directors, however, turned their attention to this part of their plan sooner than they would have done, in consequence of a letter from Government, in reply to an application for aid to the seminary.

What was the nature of this letter?—The Directors stated what they had done in expending a very large sum, for the purpose of affording to the north of Ireland an extensive and liberal system of education, classical and scientific, founding their claims thereon, and praying for parliamentary assistance; to which Government replied, that for a mere school, however respectable and extensive, they were not disposed to afford aid; but if the Institution should at any time assume a collegiate form, that then they might consider it proper.

You then turned your attention to that part of the plan?—Instantly.

The Synods are in connection with the Institution?—They are.

They have each a Professor of Theology, chosen by themselves?—They have.

You are aware, that objections have been made to some of the Professors in the Institutions being Arians, or holding Arian principles?—I am.

Are you of opinion that these principles are increasing or decreasing?—I think they have been on the decrease for a considerable time past, and that much fewer young ministers, who have been educated in the Belfast Institution, in proportion to their numbers, hold these principles, than those who have studied in Glasgow, prior to its commencement.

Do you not consider it dangerous to have any Arians Professors in the Institution?—I never did, nor never will, as a Director, vote for the appointment of a Professor, because he is an Arian; ceteris paribus—I will ever vote for an Orthodox man; yet holding Calvinistic views firmly as I do, I should be sorry to see a law made, to exclude a man from the Institution, for no other reason than his holding Arian principles. The great majority of the Professors being opposed to Arian principles, the doctrine being quite unpopular throughout Ulster, as well as the interest of the two Professors, who are said to be Arians, being so much at stake, is quite sufficient, in my opinion, to afford perfect security on that point.

Are not both the Head Masters in the Institution Arians?—They are.

Do you conceive there is no danger arising to the boarders from this circumstance?—I was asked the same question on a former occasion, in Belfast; my reply was, that I had
no

* The preceding overture was acceded to by the Managers and Visitors of the Institution, and the Synod was duly informed thereof in the usual way, and at the regular period of communicating with that body.

21
Examination of
Mr.
John Barnett,
3 July 1826.

no fear on that head; that I had never heard or known of any attempt being made by these gentlemen to disturb the private or particular religious creed of any of the young men under their care; that I had sent two nephews as boarders to the Institution, one of them to each of those gentlemen; that both were Orthodox going to the seminary; both were so, leaving it, and remained so.

Mr. Hincks and Mr. Bruce are said to be Arians?—They are.

They were not appointed because they are Arians?—By no means; their election would have been as sure had they been Calvinists or Arminians.

What recommendation had they, or by whose support were they appointed?—Mr. Hincks was elected in consequence of the numerous and powerful testimonials he had from dignitaries of the Church of England, one of whom is now the Lord Primate; and also from many of the Fellows of Trinity College, certifying his eminent literary acquirements, his long practice, and his ample qualifications for the situation of head classical teacher in the Institution.

Was not Mr. Bruce principally supported by Arians?—Mr. Bruce was supported by some Arians, and opposed by an equal number, if not more, and therefore owes not his election to his being an Arian, but to the support he received from those members of the Church of England, who are honorary visitors of the Institution by Act of Parliament, and have a right to vote on all elections for professors and teachers, as well as to the circumstance of the seminary being poor at the time, and the arguments founded thereon, of his election bringing an accession of funds to the Institution, and by attaching his friends, who had hitherto stood aloof from it, thereby uniting all classes and parties to the establishment; but above all, to the support he received from the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster, who stated, that the Directors of the Institution would give the highest gratification to the body he had the honour to represent, by appointing Mr. Bruce; and that he had the authority of a gentleman in the confidence of a person holding a high official situation, to say, that a restoration of the Government grant of 1,500*l.* per annum would soon follow his election. This declaration, coming from such a source, had so great an effect, as to induce several who intended to vote against Mr. Bruce, to vote for him, and by these means he had a majority.

Did you approve of his appointment?—No; I opposed Mr. Bruce's election, not on the sole ground of his being an Arian, but because I thought another candidate better qualified; at the same time admitting him to be well qualified. Still I think his appointment was a measure of expediency, more than choice; for had the Institution enjoyed the 1,500*l.* per annum at the time, he would not have had the benefit of the adventitious considerations above stated, and, in my opinion, would not have been elected.

Is it not desirable the Institution should have at all times a good understanding with the Synods?—Most assuredly.

Has there been any difference between the Synods and the Institution at any time?—Between the Institution and the Synod of Ireland, or Secession body, there has been perfect harmony at all times; but with the Synod of Ulster, there has been some unpleasant differences.

Would it not be for the interest of the Institution, that these should be reconciled, and that a good understanding should ever exist between the parties?—The Directors have anxiously manifested, upon all occasions, a desire to meet the wishes of the Synods, officially communicated to them, and they ever must, as they know it could not be a college at all, without their patronage, as no other college is wanted in Ireland, except for the education of Presbyterians. Members of the Establishment must study theology in Dublin, and the Catholics in Maynooth; the Belfast Institution can merely prepare them by a classical and philosophical course of studies for divinity elsewhere; so that the only theological students who attend the Institution are Presbyterians, with a few other Dissenters, and without these, there can be no college; it would only be a school of a high order.

Is the Professorship of Hebrew not intimately connected with Divinity?—It is.

Would it not tend to give satisfaction to the Synods, if they had the appointment of the Professors of Hebrew as well as Divinity?—I, as an individual, can see no objection to such an arrangement, except the expense.

But suppose the expense paid by Government?—In that case I can anticipate no solid objection; and I can inform the Commissioners, that it was part of the original plan to have a separate Professor of Hebrew and other oriental languages, but hitherto not acted on for want of funds.

Have you a copy of the resolutions lately entered into by the Synod of Ulster at Ballymena?—I have.

Do you apprehend those resolutions will facilitate an amicable settlement respecting any difference which existed between the Institution and the Synod, and are the resolutions likely to be pleasing to the Proprietors?—I, as an individual, am exceedingly satisfied with the resolutions; they, in my mind, are deservedly complimentary to the Directors, and manifest a spirit of conciliation and amity on the part of the Synod, which I am happy to see, and which I think will produce a corresponding degree of good feeling on the part of the Proprietors.

Do you think there would be any objection to ratify the first resolution by a bye-law?—The resolution breathing nothing dictatorial, but on the contrary, confidence and kindness towards the Directors, I think it highly probable there would be little objection to pass it into a bye-law.

Do you think the second resolution calculated to afford general satisfaction?—I consider

Examination of
Mr.
John Barnett,
3 July 1826.

it a most judicious and salutary advice; it has been my own wish and opinion, for a considerable time past, as well as others of the Directors with whom I act, that such a regulation should take place, and I did intend to submit a motion to that effect at no very distant day to the Proprietors.

What sum do you think might be expected by the friends of the Institution from Government (supposing any given)?—I can only speak for myself. If the former grant of 1,500 l. per annum were to be given, with an adequate sum for buildings (which are indispensable from the quantity of business done), I should be perfectly satisfied, or even with less, as it is not, in my opinion, the quantum of pecuniary aid the friends of the seminary are and ought to be most solicitous about, but the countenance and protection of Government.

What salary would you recommend to the Professors?—I am a friend to economy, and would make their income in a great degree depend on their own exertions; at the same time it is necessary, that the fixed salary, together with the fees of classes, should amount to such a provision as to induce respectable literary gentlemen to apply for the situations when vacant; from 150 l. to 200 l. per annum, I should suppose enough, with the fees of the classes.

In what way would you prefer the money to be paid (if any) to the Institution; that is, would you think it desirable that the Government should pay the Professors, or hand over the money to the Directors?—I would prefer having the amount handed to the Directors; by which means that constant and friendly intercourse, which should ever exist between the Directors and Professors, would be cherished and kept up, without the Professors considering themselves entirely independent of the Directors; which feeling, in time, might be produced in case they were paid by Government.

Appendix, N° 19.

Examination of The Rev. James Carlile; Friday 14th October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
James Carlile,
14 October 1825.

YOU are a Presbyterian Clergyman?—I am.

And Moderator for the Synod of Ulster?—Yes, for this year.

Will you describe the nature and duties of the office of the Moderator of the Synod, and the extent of his authority?—Properly speaking, he has no authority further than presiding at the annual or any meeting of the Synod that may take place during the year, and his authority is merely to keep order, as the chairman of the meeting; he presides also at any committee of which he is a member. There are one or two committees of which he is a member officially.

How is he elected?—By the body; each Presbytery mention a person from their own body; and the votes of all present are taken upon the different candidates; and he who has the largest number of names or votes, is Moderator for that year.

Will you explain in as few words as you can, what is meant by the expression “the Synod of Ulster?”—It may be taken in different senses; sometimes it is taken for the whole body of the people, including the clergy and elders as presbyterially connected; but the Synod, properly so called, is a meeting of the whole Presbyterian clergy in that connection, with an elder for each clergyman. The elders are elected by each congregation.

The Synod is divided into Presbyteries?—Yes.

How would you define a Presbytery?—It is a division chiefly formed upon local districts; it is, I believe, always so in Scotland; but here a congregation is sometimes transferred from that Presbytery to which it would naturally belong by its situation to another.

The Synod is divided into Presbyteries, and the Presbyteries comprehend a certain number of ministers, and each minister has a congregation?—Yes.

Can you state how many congregations there are in the Synod of Ulster?—There are 197 congregations, according to the last minutes of Synod, exclusive of the Presbytery of Antrim, with which we are connected in our Widows Fund, in which there are eight congregations. A considerable number of the congregations of the Synod at present have not pastors, and on the other hand several of them have two pastors.

We have heard a good deal also of another Synod, the Seceding Synod; will you describe the difference between that and the Synod of Ulster?—The difference originated in Scotland, and was solely upon the law of patronage. The secession took place from the Church of Scotland, in consequence of the law of patronage being made absolute; it had previously been understood, that when a patron presented a person to a living, the people had in effect a veto upon the presentation, by there being required a certain proportion of the congregation to give their sanction to the election before it was valid. That privilege was systematically done away under the late Principal Robertson, of Edinburgh, who through his influence in the General Assembly, procured the establishment of the principle, that Presbyteries should ordain whomsoever the patron presented, whether the understood proportion of the congregation were in favour of the presentation, or not.

Which side was taken by the Seceders?—The Seceders complained of this, and they drew off from the Church of Scotland, upon the ground that the people had been deprived of their right to a veto upon the patron's presentation.

Did not the secession take place previously to the time you have spoken of?—It took place formally about 23 years before Principal Robertson became leader in the assembly; but the principle continued to be contested during the greater part of his public life, so that he and his coadjutors may be regarded as having finally established it, and thus as having given permanency and strength to the secession.

he

283

Is there any difference in point of doctrine between the Seceding Synod and the Synod of Ulster?—In Scotland there is no ostensible avowed difference; they both sign the Confession of Faith. For a long while the Synod of Ulster also required the signature of the Confession of Faith. In some Presbyteries the practice was relinquished of requiring signatures, and so far there was an ostensible difference. The matter as it stands at present is, that candidates for the ministry in the Synod of Ulster must sign the Confession of Faith, or state distinctly upon what points they object to it; but candidates are peremptorily required to sign the Confession of Faith in the Seceding Synod.

Is there any difference whatever in point of doctrine, between the members of the Seceding Synod and those you would term Orthodox in the Synod of Ulster?—None whatever.

Is there any difference in point of doctrine between the Seceding Synod and the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, according to what appears to you to be their plain and literal import?—I think not; there are points in the Confession of Faith that are stated more strongly; in substance they are the same.

The question is, whether there is any thing in the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England (so far as doctrine, as contra-distinguished from church government, is concerned), to which a conscientious and Orthodox Seceder, or a member of the Synod of Ulster, could not assent?—So far as I recollect the expressions in the Thirty-nine Articles, I think there is not; at the same time I think many of the Seceders would object to the Thirty-nine Articles being substituted for the Confession of Faith.

Nothing of that kind was contemplated in the question; but merely to know, whether there was such an agreement in point of doctrine, as that the Thirty-nine Articles contained nothing contrary to the opinions of the Seceders, so far as their doctrines were concerned?—I conceive not; there is nothing contrary to my opinion.

We are to understand you, that your views of religious truth are such as are expressed in the Westminster Confession?—Yes; and as I have already said, such as are held by the members of the Secession.

We understand, that the Presbytery of Antrim is distinguished in some way or other from the Synod of Ulster; could you in a very few words be so good as to state the nature of that difference?—I am not very familiar with the history of the separation; I was not a member till many years afterwards. I have always understood, that it was about the time when the practice began to be given up of signing the Confession of Faith by some Presbyteries. The Synod attempted to enforce the practice upon the Presbyteries, and the congregations that now form the Presbytery of Antrim, stood out against the measure, and then they were separated from it.

We have understood from some Clergyman of that Synod, that they consider every Minister belonging to the Presbytery of Antrim as holding the Arian doctrines?—The general reputation is so.

Is there not also some considerable proportion of the Ministers of the Synod of Ulster who are supposed to hold the same doctrines?—There are some; but as to what proportion I could not give any thing like a distinct answer; living at so great a distance as Dublin, I cannot be supposed to know them intimately; there are some who have the reputation of being Arians, and I have no doubt are so.

Is there any standard or test now resorted to in the Synod of Ulster, to ascertain whether the individuals are Arians or not?—The Presbyteries are not uniform; some of them do require the signature to the Confession of Faith, and some of them have given it up; the matter stands thus now, that by the law of the Synod every Licentiate must sign the Confession of Faith, or distinctly state upon what grounds he differs from it.

Are you well acquainted with the Belfast Institution?—I cannot say I am well acquainted with it, living at so great a distance, and happening to be absent at some meetings of the Synod, when a great deal was said about it; I cannot say I am.

Do you consider it an object of much importance, that it should be made subservient to the education of those intended for the Presbyterian Ministry?—I consider a home education a thing of very great importance. I consider from what I have seen in Glasgow, and what I have seen here of those who have returned from Glasgow, that it is highly desirable that our students should be educated in Ireland; and from what I have seen of the effect of the Institution I do conceive it is of great importance.

Were you educated in Glasgow yourself?—Yes; with the exception of two years, during which I was in Edinburgh.

Are you a native of Scotland?—Yes.

Describe the state of the students at Glasgow when you were there?—They were left with little check or controul over them; they seldom brought letters of introduction; they had no acquaintance, and they kept almost entirely by themselves; even in the divinity-hall they generally sat in a back place by themselves, and formed little acquaintance among the other students; besides what they did there was unknown to their parents or guardians here, and from what I have heard, I have no doubt many of them fell into practices that were very dangerous to them.

There was no accommodation within the walls of the college for them?—None.

Is it your impression, that when students are attending in such a place as the Belfast Institution, there is a sufficient moral superintendence exercised over them?—Much greater than in Glasgow. I have learnt since I came here, that even the students of the Seceders, who are considered a strict body, were in the habit of attending the theatre at Glasgow, and playing cards; and I am pretty sure they could not do so here.

Examination of
Rev.
James Carlile,
14 October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
James Carlile,
14 October 1825.

Is there any theatre at Belfast?—Yes.

They would not be permitted to attend it?—It would, I conceive, be a stigma upon their religious character if they did.

They were unknown at Glasgow, and are known here?—Yes.

It seems scarcely necessary to inquire, whether the same regard to their character would not restrain them from falling into the open pursuit of vice?—I have no doubt it does; the characters of the students and their education are highly advanced in respectability since I came to this country, which I attribute in a great measure to their home education.

It is scarcely necessary to inquire, adverting to your own religious sentiments, whether you would not consider it highly improper, that they should be exposed to the danger of imbibing Arian sentiments?—I should consider it a very great evil if they were to become Arians.

Are you acquainted with Dr. Hanna and Dr. Edgar, the Professors of Divinity?—With Dr. Hanna I am intimately; not with Dr. Edgar.

You are aware that both profess the same sentiments you do?—Yes.

Should you consider it a dangerous state of things, if at any future period persons holding the same situations should be Arians?—I should certainly.

You are aware that the appointment of those Professors rests with the Synod of Ulster and the Seceding Synod respectively?—Yes; entirely.

Do you consider that to be a sufficient safeguard against the extension of Arianism amongst the Presbyterian Ministers, supposing that all or a considerable number of the other professorships might eventually be held by Arians?—If a considerable part or all of the professorships were held by Arians, I should think it a dangerous thing for any seminary.

You are aware, that in point of fact there are some Arians at present of the number?—I believe there are one or two that are considered Arians; I am not acquainted with them sufficiently to know. I know there are more who bear that character connected with the Institution; but I distinguish between Professors and Teachers.

Does it occur to you, that any additional check, or any further power upon the part of the Synod, would be necessary or expedient in order to guard against such a contingency arising?—Permit me to distinguish in what I shall say on this subject, between my station as a Moderator, reporting the opinion of the Synod, and my own private sentiments. I might differ in some points in giving my own opinion, from what I should be called upon to state, as the expressed sentiments of a majority of the Synod.

We are distinctly to understand, that you are now to express your own sentiments, and not to be considered as speaking in any representative capacity?—I am not sure that the control of the Institution being transferred to the Synod, viewing it as a permanent measure, would have much effect, because there is the same danger of the Synod becoming Arian as the Boards of the Institution at a future day.

You mean perhaps possibility rather than "danger"?—Yes, possibility, it was understood that a great proportion of the Synod at one time was Arian, and it may be so again for what I know; and I do not see that there would be much gained by such a transfer.

Supposing the transfer were made to the Seceding Synod, do you not think there would be a pretty effectual check?—Yes, and so there would now be were it made to the Synod of Ulster, but what either of these bodies may become hereafter, it is impossible to say.

Is it possible for the Seceding Synod to become Arians while they continue signing the Confession of Faith?—Yes, quite so. It was when the Synod of Ulster was rigorous in requiring the signature, that Arianism was advancing most rapidly among its ministers.

Are we to understand, that it is your opinion there was a time when Arianism was more prevalent in the Synod of Ulster than now?—Yes, I have always understood so, and even since I became a member of Synod, the Arian party at one time seemed to feel the strength of their numbers more than they do now.

To what do you attribute that diminution?—In part to the dissemination of the knowledge of the Scriptures all over the country.

Do you consider that the distribution of the Scriptures tends to dispel Arian notions?—Yes, of course I do; but I allude more to the greater religious activity in the country altogether, that has reached our body as it has other bodies, as contributing to an advancement of true Scriptural sentiments.

You have attended a good deal to the progress of the Bible Society?—Yes, I am one of the secretaries.

Have you ever observed, whether there was any marked difference in the degree of support given to it by those members of the Presbyterian church who were Arians, and those holding opposite opinions?—I cannot give a decided opinion upon that point; I know that there were many Arians who were strenuous in support of it, and many of the Orthodox who were much less so than I should have expected.

Do you conceive it is supported in the same degree at present by such Presbyterians as are Arians, and such as are what you would term Orthodox?—It is a question I dare not answer, for not being on the spot, and not knowing how they respectively support it, I cannot give an answer, but I believe that the mingling of those that are coming forward to the ministry, and their parents, and the ministers, themselves, with that class of persons who generally take an interest in the Bible Society, and other similar institutions, has been one of the causes why religion has advanced amongst us, as it has among other religious bodies in the country.

Can you form any general opinion, as to what proportion of the ministers of the Synod of Ulster are Arians at present?—I really dare not; there was for example, one whom we used

Examination of
Rev.
James Carlile,
14 October 1825.

to consider an Arian, that disavowed Arianism upon oath before a Committee of the House of Lords or Commons; I have no means of knowing the proportion; we seldom divide upon questions in the Synod according to our theological sentiments; I have heard it stated upon hearsay, that there may be from a fourth to a third of the Synod, Arians, but I dare not say that it is so.

Nothing has occurred in the Synod to make it apparent?—No, and when a question of that sort does occur, it is generally compromised by some resolution of accommodation, that does not fully express the sentiments of any one.

Have you any wish that any alteration should be made in the constitution of the Belfast Institution, with a view to guard against the possibility of the extension of Arianism among its members?—No measure has occurred to me that was likely to be permanently useful; the measure proposed by the Synod does not appear a judicious measure in my opinion; it seems to have a tendency to affix a stigma upon that very Institution, in which we meant to educate our own students; it appears to me desirable to support the character of the Institution as highly as we can, and that there is no middle measure between maintaining its respectability and withdrawing from it; there is no college in Scotland that would submit to any proposal, even from the Established Church there, similar to that which was made by the Synod of Ulster to the Institution.

Would you think it unreasonable, that the election of such Professors as are connected with Theology, and attendance upon whom is made indispensable to the entrance into the ministry, should be made subject to the approbation of the Synod of Ulster?—I am not aware that there are any Professors of a theological character in the Institution except the Divinity.

For instance, the Professors of Moral Philosophy and Hebrew?—Those seem to me general sciences; and if a control was given to any particular religious body, it would tend to injure the Institution, and injure our own purpose.

Should you be perfectly at ease if a person possessed at once of the abilities and the religious sentiments of David Hume, were now filling the chair of moral philosophy in this Institution?—I should not; but I do not know how to prevent it.

Would it not be prevented, if the election were made subject to the approbation of the two Synods?—I do not know that it would; it might be at this moment; but persons have been elected to offices in the Synod holding theological sentiments different from the majority of the Synod; they did not take their sentiments into view, and the Synod might act on the same principles in electing a professor of moral philosophy.

If the persons who have the power of election in their hands, were likely to chuse a person of the sentiments of David Hume, should you suppose such an Institution calculated for the education of your young men?—It would then become a balance between that and other seminaries; there have, for example, been persons understood to hold those sentiments elected in the University of Edinburgh.

Although they are obliged to sign the Confession of Faith?—Yes; I do not look upon the signature of a confession of faith as at all a guard; it is rather sometimes a cloak, under which men creep into such seminaries, and we dare not question them; after submitting to such a test, we are obliged to take it for granted, that they are orthodox, because they have been put to their oath, and have avowed themselves so, whilst the whole of their conduct may aim at sapping the foundations of orthodoxy.

It has been stated to us, that the majority of the present Managers and Visitors of the Institution are all supposed to be Arians; if that supposition be well founded, do you not, in the existing state of things here, see an occasion for devising, if possible, some check upon the appointment of professors, in regard to the natural predilection which men must be supposed to have for the extension of their own sentiments?—If those Managers and Visitors were altogether without any control, and were at liberty to consult their own predilections, I should conceive they were very likely to chuse Arian professors; but they are merely managers, very much in a pecuniary sense, for with respect to the body of the proprietors of an Institution that depends upon public favour, their measures must be modified by the general opinion of the country; they dare not, at present, whatever their own sentiments may be, chuse a majority of Arian professors, because the Institution would be ruined by their so doing. The great check, and the only effectual check upon this Institution, or any similar body for the education of the young, is the individual zeal of those who hold the truth, endeavouring to disseminate their own sentiments. By thus operating upon the country at large, and directly upon the young, as they have opportunity, they will apply the only check that can be applied to the evil of error.

Are we to understand, that you are decidedly of opinion that the Arians form a small minority among the Presbyterian body?—Yes; taking the people as well as the ministers, they form a very small proportion; a great many of those who are under Arian ministers are not themselves Arians.

According to your experience, which is the doctrine most acceptable to the people?—The Orthodox, without any question; and vacant congregations, which have been under Arian ministers, almost all look for Orthodox ministers.

You mean upon the occasion of a change?—Yes.

And they are gratified by the change, from an Arian to an Orthodox minister?—Yes; and it appeared to me, that many Arian ministers have obtained congregations by keeping their sentiments out of view; they made accuracy of language, neatness of composition, and other embellishments of a similar nature, more their study than the Orthodox students, and thus became favourites with many of the upper class of society; but having increased to a considerable number, and feeling their own strength, they were encouraged to

Examination of
Rev.
James Carlile,
14 October 1825.

bring forward their sentiments more prominently; and then they began to decline, and to be looked upon with suspicion, and many withdrew from them when they knew their sentiments.

Have you observed whether there is any tendency in Arianism, to become more successful among the higher than the lower ranks of society?—Any tendency to advancement has been among the higher ranks.

To what do you attribute that very remarkable circumstance?—It was partly an adventitious matter with us. Arianism, when it was introduced, was the fashionable philosophy of the day; it came into Scotland from Dr. Samuel Clarke and his party in England; and it came from Scotland into Ireland, from some of the Professors there; it became fashionable for a time in this country also, and those who held Orthodox sentiments, were looked upon as men of little science or talent; but true religion is, from its nature, and from the circumstances of the poor, always most acceptable to them; the rich have many temptations to reject it, which the poor have not.

Do the Professors in the College of Glasgow and in the other Scotch Universities sign the Confession of Faith?—I understand they do, but I do not know personally.

Are you aware there is a statute that requires it?—I believe there is some regulation to that effect, but I am not acquainted with its precise nature.

Supposing, but not implying, that any arrangement should be made for making the election to any particular professorship, for instance, Moral Philosophy, subject to the approbation of the two Synods, do you think that either body would be inclined to express disapprobation at the appointment of any particular individual, except for very sufficient cause?—I think it would render the elections perpetual scenes of disputation and party work throughout the whole country, not merely in the Synods, but perhaps between the Synods; for by requiring the Synods to meet and give their approbation or disapprobation, application would be made in different quarters, and a tendency to rivalry between the two Synods, which it is not to be denied already exists, would be inflamed by such a measure, and thus elections to professorships might become the cause of altercations and disputes throughout the whole province; the approbation of one Synod might become a reason for the disapprobation of the other.

Do you mean by rivalry as to doctrine?—No; as to the number of congregations, the number of people attending them, the interest of ministers, and so forth.

We should be glad to know your opinion, as to the desirability of forming any further connection between the Government and the Institution?—I think it would add to the respectability of the Institution, and give Government a very salutary influence for its own purposes.

What do you mean by "its own purposes?"—I take it for granted, that it is the object of all civil government, to promote the welfare and contentment of the people, and especially to call forth from the people a filial reverence and regard.

Can you suggest any plan which you think desirable, for forming any such connection?—I have not turned my mind sufficiently to the subject to suggest a whole plan, but a certain proportion of Government assistance, along with a certain proportion of Government control, would be necessary; the Government might defeat its own purposes, by requiring too much control; but I conceive, that a certain degree of control would be useful, both to the Government and to the Institution.

A check, so far as relates to a mere donation of money, we can understand, but as to the control, we should be glad to have that explained?—The Government could not have a control without giving something, and upon the giving a donation, the Government have it in their power to make what stipulations they think fit.

What stipulations would you consider salutary, as not conferring a control too extensive upon the Government?—It is a matter that would require very serious consideration; suppose there was a veto to a certain extent; not an absolute veto upon the appointment of the professorships and masters; or a certain number of Government votes that would carry the weight of the Government sanction; even one person, as the organ of Government, permitted to vote, leaving the Government at liberty to withdraw their annual support, would I conceive, form a check quite as strong as the Government would require, perhaps even stronger than would be expedient.

The continuance of support would of course rest with the Legislature?—I understand so, and being at the discretion of Government, would give as much controul as the Government would require.

What would you think of Visitors being appointed by Government?—I think that might be a salutary measure.

Do you not think there would be a danger of its creating a re-action the other way, among those who did not concur with the Government?—I do not think there is likely to be any thing of that kind.

Should you think it inadvisable that the Government should have an absolute veto upon the appointment to the professorships, it being very well understood that that veto would not be exercised, except for a very special cause?—If that could be permanently fixed, it might not be objectionable, but giving such veto to Government, would be putting it in its power at any time, to take the whole election into their own hands; they would only have to give directions to their officer, that until a certain person were elected, no professor should be approved of.

Except that it must be understood, that no Government would think of pursuing that course?—There might be circumstances or influence that would induce Government to adopt that course deliberately, as matter of policy; for example, the jealousy of Trinity College, and the influence of the Established Church, which might prevail on the Government

287
Examination of
Rev.
James Carlile,
14 October 1825.

ment to assume the election of professor, for the purpose of keeping it in a subordinate state, and an absolute veto would put it into the hands of Government to do so at any time, a measure which would be ruinous to the Institution.

Are you aware the Institution offered that at one time?—Yes, but I think it was very injudicious, and that Government would be injudicious in accepting such an offer, as it would give rise to perpetual apprehensions and discontent. May I be permitted to offer one suggestion; in the event of Government connecting itself with the Institution, it would be well to suggest or to require, that the meetings of the Proprietors should not be held within the walls of the Institution, and that they should be held with shut doors; for it appears to me, that to permit a body of Proprietors, some of whom may be men of no literary talent, and others, persons holding religious and political sentiments, the very opposite of what the Government would be disposed to encourage, to make speeches in crowded audiences before many of the students, must derogate from the literary respectability of the Institution, and perhaps render it a vehicle of sedition and impiety. The Professors of the University of Edinburgh, are, I understand, elected by the Magistrates and Town Council of Edinburgh, and if they held their meetings for that purpose, within the walls of the College, and also in public, the speeches that might be made might be identified with the literary character of the College, and might fix a stigma upon it in the eyes of all Europe, but they wisely keep their discussions on such matters to themselves, and although not themselves officially a literary body, they have often elected men of the very highest talents and acquirements. I conceive it would be wise in the Proprietors of the Institution, both for their own sake, and for that of the Institution, to follow the example before them.

Who elect to the Professorships of the University of Glasgow?—The Professors themselves generally, but there are some elected by the Crown. It has, however, I believe, been disputed, how far the Crown had the power to appoint Professors, who shall become members of the Faculty, with the power of voting in it. But Professors, according to the regular curriculum of education, are appointed by the Faculty.

So far as your experience goes, are you satisfied with the result of the education in the Institution at Belfast, as evidenced by the conduct of the young men who have gone from it?—They have of late much improved.

Have you found them lately what you would call Orthodox?—They have latterly been more generally so.

With a view to Orthodoxy alone, and the exclusion of Arianism, which would you prefer, the education of candidates for the ministry at Belfast, under the existing state of things, or that of the Scotch Colleges?—In Belfast, under the existing state of things, at the same time, there are several things that may be taken into view, as influencing the young men; there is certainly a tide of opinion in the country, that may have influenced the young men in professing Orthodoxy; and how far the whole improvement is to be attributed to the academy, I do not know, but I have no doubt a very large proportion is.

At Belfast, the Synod of Ulster has the absolute appointment of a Professor of Theology?—Yes, but they have nothing from the Institution but a place to lecture in.

According to the pledge given by the several Professors, no Professor, except the Professor of Theology, is to interfere with the religious principles of any of the pupils?—I have always understood so.

The candidates for the ministry, educated at Belfast, return to their homes during the vacation?—Yes, they do, I suppose.

From their living in the neighbourhood, they generally return home?—Yes, there may be some that have tutorships that go along with the families where they are tutors, but I believe generally they do return home.

When they return home, do they not come under the eye of the Presbytery for which they are destined?—They do.

Do they undergo any examinations?—Yes; they undergo examinations at entrance; when a student proposes himself, he undergoes an examination at the commencement, and after every session at College.

Did the young men who went to Glasgow, when it was the practice for the candidates to go there, for the Irish ministry, return to their homes during the vacation?—Yes.

They were subject to the same control?—Yes, I believe they were; although I believe some of the regulations that have been made were since they went there, and that may be another cause of the improvement; there may be more examinations by the Presbytery; therefore I express myself hesitatingly, as to how far the Belfast Institution was the cause of the improvement.

Do you conceive that the securities afforded to the Synod of Ulster, that the persons educated at Belfast, should be by their education duly qualified for the ministry in the existing state of things, are adequate to the purpose?—I think they are.

Do you think that any possible danger to which the pupils might be exposed, through a deviation of the Professors from their pledge, if they were to wish to favour their own religious opinions, is guarded against by the security that the Synod enjoys in the assured orthodoxy of its own Professor, in the frequent opportunities of examining and inspecting the conduct of the candidates, and in the final ordeal the candidate must go through before he is admitted to the ministry?—I do not think any arrangement can absolutely secure the students against danger. The ultimate security rests in form at least with the Synod, and that may fail us; but I conceive they are better off than in any other establishment in the empire that I am acquainted with.

You are not to consider the preceding question, as implying the possibility of absolute and perfect and complete security, but a security to be taken with reference to any state of

Examination of
Rev.
James Carlile,
14 October 1825.

things that may be established?—I conceive the Synod is better off in regard to its students by having them educated in the Institution, than they would be in having them educated in any establishment in the empire at present; I do not think they could be so well off any where else as at this moment they are at Belfast.

Do you conceive, that any increase of security that might be afforded by such a change in the existing system of the Institution, as would give to the Synod of Ulster a more perfect control, would be worth the purchase of the discontent it might excite amongst persons who do not belong to that Synod?—The consideration of that discontent which any further control vested in the Synod would excite among persons of other communities, taken along with other considerations, in my private opinion, seems to me to render it ineligible both for the Synod and the Institution, that the Synod should ask any further security.

More especially as you consider that that security might not be absolutely effectual?—Certainly; the form of security asked by the Synod, amounted to a kind of negative confession of faith; it was, that they should, so far as their influence went, not be Arians, and the word Orthodox was introduced into the resolution, which is a word that may be made to mean any thing; with us it signifies generally Calvinistic; in the Church of England generally, it signifies Arminian; there is that kind of vagueness in the term, that a person of any sentiments might come in under it, so that I do not think the measure could have given security to the Synod, while it would have degraded the Institution.

As a member of the Synod of Ulster, would you consider it better and more to the character of the Synod, or the contrary, to trust to the assured truth of your own principles, and the strength of the evidence to be found for them in the Testament, and the certainty that the candidates will be strictly lectured in Orthodox principles by the Professor, than to seek further and other security against the possibility of other principles being introduced?—In my own private capacity, I do; I doubt not, however, that a considerable majority of the Synod are of a different opinion. I would rather have the Professors come in with a knowledge of what their sentiments are, by which those who understand the truth, would be put on their guard, and set at liberty to fortify students against their sentiments, than that they should come in under a confession, after which it must be taken for granted they believe certain doctrines, when it may be well known they do not. In Scotland Professors are admitted to colleges, by signing the Confession of Faith; the consequence is, that some are tempted to profess doctrines which it is well known they do not believe, and which they use all their influence to undermine, while yet by submitting to the test of signature, they stop the mouths of those who would be disposed to counteract their endeavours, and oblige them to take it for granted, that they believe and teach agreeably to the Confession of Faith; I would rather that Professors should come forward plainly and loudly, stating what their sentiments are, because then every man is put on his guard, and is at liberty to do justice to the truth.

You are of opinion, where there is an equality of capacity, truth must triumph?—Certainly.

And, therefore, those who have the truth on their side need not seek to shackle others, for the purpose of protecting themselves?—I believe if the truth has but fair play, it will overcome every thing.

Would that be a sufficient reason for indifference as to the opinions of the different candidates for the professorships?—If I could have children of my own, or under my charge, educated altogether by men of sound piety, I should prefer it, but I should not consider a man nearer to sound piety in consequence of his signing a creed.

By a former answer you may be supposed to have contemplated, that not only those Orthodox, but those not considered Orthodox, are to have the benefits of the Institution?—Certainly.

And therefore particular favour should not be shewn to one to the exclusion of the others.—We have been all along, I conceive, talking about favour for the truth, and my answers have been directed to the statement of my opinion, as to the most effectual method of maintaining the truth; and in this view I conceive that it would become eligible, as well as more conducive to the respectability of the Synod, that their young men should be educated at a general seminary, which was open to the whole world, and where all were admissible to the situations of Professors, rather than that they should be educated in a sort of cloister or monastery attached to our own body.

Are you aware, that it so happens, that two out of the three last Professors who have been elected are Arians; and that it also so happens, that the only two Masters who are permitted to receive boarders within the walls of the Institution, are also Arians; do you not in this circumstance, however it may have arisen, see some reason for wishing, if possible, to guard in future against a similar chance or similar design occurring in future elections?—When that circumstance was brought forward to the Synod of Ulster by the late Moderator, there seemed to be a disposition to put it down as a thing not at all to be attended to. I certainly seconded him; I felt a degree of alarm, that a confession might come into the Belfast Institution of an erroneous character. If we are to have a confession at all, I would rather have one of truth than of falsehood. The Arians have been so much in the habit of holding up their party, as almost exclusively possessed of talents and accomplishments, that it might become necessary to be an Arian for the purpose of obtaining a character for talent, and, therefore, I went along with my friend in exiting alarm and distrust in the Synod upon that point; but I question, whether or not the power which we have of always doing so, would not be more effectual than our requiring any such positive law as was proposed. The influence of Government also having a kind of veto upon elections, might be directed directed to the same object. The expression of the opinion of the Synod upon that point seems to me to be sufficient, and that similar elections would not take place now.

Are you aware that one of the two Professors alluded to in the preceding question came there recommended by the most distinguished dignitaries of the Established Church?—I have heard so.

Are you aware that the sciences divided between those two Professors were previously united in one, and which one was also an Arian, since 1817?—No; I do not recollect that circumstance; I may have heard it.

Are you aware, that since the year 1817, or for some considerable period of time, the two boarding houses of the Institution happen to have been in the hands of Arians?—I am aware of that; I am not indeed quite certain of one of the gentlemen; his sentiments were undergoing a considerable change, as it was understood, previous to his death. There seems, from various causes, a tendency in almost all literary institutions to have teachers unsound in profession, or what is quite as bad, men, who with an Orthodox profession, have no serious religion. One cause may be, that men of zeal for religion are not so disposed to qualify and to offer themselves as candidates for literary situations, as men who are ambitious of literary celebrity; in all the seminaries throughout the kingdom, it would appear, that there is a general tendency to have men, who if they be men of Orthodox profession, are just as dangerous to the students as if their profession were otherwise; and it is the duty of the guardians of youth to keep a watchful eye over such seminaries, both in regard to the election of teachers, and to their influence upon the religion of their pupils.

Notwithstanding the existence of the state of things that has been referred to, in point of fact, Arianism has not spread among the candidates for the ministry in Belfast?—It certainly has not.

289
Examination of
Rev.
James Carlile,
14 October 1825.

Appendix, No. 20.

Examination of Joseph Stevenson, Esquire; Friday, 14th October 1825.

YOU are Secretary of the Belfast Institution?—I am.

Do you receive any emolument for the discharge of the duties of your office?—None.

How long have you acted in that situation?—From the commencement of the Institution.

What extent of attendance do you give, and what may be the nature of your duties?—I formerly gave more attendance than I do now, which was once a fortnight, or oftener, if necessary; lately, I have become more engaged in my own business, but whenever it is necessary I attend.

Are you satisfied yourself with the present state of the Institution, or does it seem to you that its constitution would either require or admit of any amendment?—I am most perfectly satisfied with it; if there was any doubt on my mind, or any improvement I could point out, I would mention it.

Do you think it desirable that it should remain unconnected with the Government, as it is at present?—Very much the reverse.

Could you state any species of connection with the Government you would recommend?—I have had a great deal of communication; first, with Mr. Fitzgerald, then Mr. Peel, then Mr. Grant, and also with the present Secretary, and very often with the late Marquis of Londonderry, when Lord Castlereagh. A gentleman high in office in His Majesty's Government, in his letter to the Proprietors, or the Board, mentioned certain things, and I had a private communication with him upon some points, upon which he asked my opinion when he was in Ireland, as to whether they would be admitted; I told him I thought they would not; and in the interview with him, I took upon myself to say, that I thought a veto would be allowed; and on my return to the meeting of the Proprietors, it was agreed to; but that gentleman afterwards told me, he thought it would be an improper thing for Government to use that veto; for this reason, that if Government were to receive an incorrect opinion of any young man who had been elected, and a new election were to take place, if they found afterwards that their information was not correct, the words he used were, "this young man is damned for ever, and we will not accept of the Veto;" he proposed to have an equal number of votes by proxy, with the Managers and Visitors; that the Proprietors would not agree to; the warmest and best friends of the Government and the Institution would not hear of it. I really cannot say, that I am at present able to give an opinion upon what would be offered by the Institution to the Government.

We do not consider it as a subject of negotiation, upon which the Government is wishing to obtain as much as possible; but we ask you, what you yourself consider would be a salutary species of connection both for the Government and the Institution?—The connection for the Institution I conceive most desirable, is to be under the patronage of, and receiving an annual grant from Government.

We can easily understand the species of control arising from an annual grant; but is there any other kind of control that occurs to yourself?—No.

Should you yourself dislike to see a veto vested in the Government?—No, that was the suggestion to the Government.

Do you think there is any considerable proportion of the Managers who would object to a Veto being vested in the Government?—Not any among the Managers; I think some of the Proprietors might.

Examination of Joseph Stevenson,
Esq.
14 October 1825.

Examination of Joseph Stevenson,
Esq.
14 October 1825.

Do you think it would be much objected to on the part of the Managers, (and you will observe, that the question implies no opinion on our part), that a veto upon one, two or three of the professorships connecting themselves with divinity, should be confided either to the Synod of Ulster, or the Seceding Synod, or to both?—I cannot, for my own part, see any objection to the veto being with the Government; and people would rather see it with the Government than the Synod, for this reason; the Synod is a particular sect, and we wish to see the Institution perfectly open, and not to attach ourselves to any particular sect, because if one Synod requires it, another may; so that it might be a very difficult matter for us to meet it.

What sect do you consider the Synod to be of?—The Presbyterian body.

Has it occurred to the Managers, so far as you know, that perhaps their claim for Government assistance might be considered to rest upon a surer footing, if they were considered in the character of affording education for the Presbyterian ministry, rather than in their other character, of dispensing education generally to the community at large?—I think, generally.

Do you think they have a stronger claim in the latter character than the first?—I think they have.

Supposing that influential individuals should be found, who thought you had no claim at all in the latter character, but a very strong one in the former character, do you think there would be an inclination in the Managers to enter into those views, if it became necessary to assume to itself, not exclusively, but in preference to the other, the character of an Institution to prepare candidates for the Presbyterian ministry?—Really, that is a question I do not know how to answer; if it was to be exclusively for any one Synod, the Proprietors would object to it.

The question assumes, that it should be open for all the Synods, and still not excluding the character of dispensing general education, but considering that latter character as subordinate to the former one?—I think it probable that would be acceded to.

What do you mean by "all the Synods?"—There are two Synods, and a small body that go by the name of Covenanters, who as they increase, I have no doubt, will form a Synod.

Do you think the Covenanters are increasing?—I have been informed they are.

Do you consider the Presbytery of Antrim as belonging to either Synod?—They are connected I believe with the Synod of Ulster, and meet with them.

To which Presbytery do you belong yourself?—The Presbytery of Antrim.

Do you consider there is any danger of the religious opinions of the students being interfered with by any of the Professors, except by the Professors of Divinity?—I am decidedly of opinion, there is not the most distant risk of it.

Supposing the Professors and Teachers were at some future day all to become Arian, with the exception of the two Professors of Divinity, do you not think that that circumstance must exercise a tacit influence, however unintended upon the part of the Professors, upon the religious opinions of the students?—It is possible, if they were all to become Arians; but that is almost impossible.

What makes you think it an impossibility?—The number of Arians being small.

You consider the opposite opinions much more extensively to prevail among the Presbyterians?—Decidedly.

Do you think Arianism is upon the increase among the Presbyterians at present?—I cannot think that it is.

Do you think there is any feeling of disaffection towards the constitution of the country, in the minds of any of the Professors or Teachers at present?—I cannot for a moment suppose there is the most distant.

Do you think there ever was at any time since the formation of the Institution?—Never, to my knowledge; that has been a matter that we have been most particular in making inquiries about, as to their testimonials before elected.

Have there not been some of the Managers and Visitors who would be justly subject to such an imputation?—Certainly, there have.

Are we to suppose, that such gentlemen have been so very anxious to select none but Professors, whose testimonials should prove they entertained opinions contrary to their own?—I think they have been most particularly attentive to that, to choose Professors whose abilities and attachment to the Government were known.

Are we to understand, that Managers who have not themselves been attached to the Government, have nevertheless been anxious to select such Professors as had that attachment?—That is my opinion.

By what feeling have such Managers been led to a course apparently, we should almost say, so extraordinary?—From a particular wish to get men possessed of the greatest ability, and being extremely cautious lest any Teachers or Professors should get into the Institution, which in the smallest degree might create jealousy with Government; there has been a very strong wish on all occasions upon that point.

In point of fact, have there not been Managers, who at public meetings connected with the Institution and relating immediately to its business, have taken an opportunity of making speeches, which must have been in the highest degree offensive to persons attached to the British constitution?—Do you mean meetings at the Institution.

Not within the walls, but belonging to the Institution?—I have sometimes heard young men make use of expressions that were by no means sanctioned by the meeting, and frequently called to order.

Have

291
Examination of Joseph Stevenson,
Esq.
14 October 1825.

Have there been in times past any persons amongst the Managers and Visitors whom you yourself believed to be United Irishmen?—Yes.

Are there any such at present?—I dare say there are some who were United Irishmen; but who are as loyal men now as any of His Majesty's subjects.

To what do you attribute that change of sentiment?—They saw their error, and have acknowledged it in the most candid manner.

Do you believe there is at present among the Managers one individual disaffected to the British constitution?—Not one that I know of.

Do you conceive that there is in any influential members of the Institution any disposition to subvert the present Government, with a view to the establishment of a republican form of government, or with a view to the political separation of Ireland from Great Britain?—Not the smallest in the world.

Have you prepared any written statement for the Commissioners, of the History and the objects of the Belfast Institution?—I have.

[The witness delivered in a paper, entitled, "A Statement of the Utility, Administration and Resources of the Belfast Academical Institution."]

LETTER from Joseph Stevenson, Esq. to the Secretary of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, dated Belfast, 24th February 1826.

Sir,

IN the Appendix to the first Report of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, at page 417, fifth line from the top, it is stated, "But that interval may be most usefully employed in forwarding a measure of the highest importance to the success of any plan of national instruction; we mean that of preparing a sufficient number of teachers completely qualified to convey that instruction."

In reading this part of the Report it immediately occurred to me, that the Belfast Institution was better adapted for forwarding a measure of such vast importance, than any other seminary I knew of, and at a very small expense. The plan I should propose is; that the head-masters of the English, Writing, Arithmetical and Mathematical Schools, should appropriate a particular separate class for the instruction of persons of respectability for schoolmasters alone, so as not to mingle with the smaller boys. If the Masters could not devote sufficient time, they should be required to provide one or more well qualified assistants, according to the number of pupils. The sum for tuition to be small, half-a-crown a quarter, or half-a-crown a year, but not gratuitous; and as soon as the funds of the Institution would permit, let the Masters be remunerated. Should it be deemed advisable to extend the education of the intended Teachers to French, Latin, &c. then it could be obtained.

Young men who may already be teachers of schools, and not as well qualified as they should be, might not only be permitted but encouraged to attend the Institution, on the same terms as others. In many instances, books and writing materials might be provided for such pupils as were not well able to find them for themselves, and let those also be at the expense of the Institution. All pupils should find their own board and lodging.

In this Institution no jealousy exists of proselytism on the part of the Catholics, or any other sect, that I have heard of, Mr. Cooke excepted. At present, Mr. Hincks has nine Catholic boarders from the South of Ireland, many of the Established Church from the Southern and middle Counties, with Presbyterians, each sect regularly attending their own places of worship. It would be very desirable if young lads (Catholics) from the South and West were sent here to prepare as Teachers; they would be under the eye of our worthy Catholic Bishop, Dr. Crolly, from whose liberality much good would be derived. Should the number of pupils be too large for our present class-rooms, a temporary one for the purpose could soon be built. The fact is, there is no good in having schools, unless they are provided with teachers equal to the task and respectable.

These ideas having occurred to me (as a Proprietor of the Institution, not as Secretary), I take the liberty of communicating to you; and if you think them worth the attention of the Commissioners, you are at liberty to submit them to their inspection.

I may venture to say, for the Managers and Visitors, that they will adopt any such suggestion from the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, or any branch of His Majesty's Government. The truth is, every thing that will tend to promote improvement in education will most cheerfully be attended to in the Institution.

I am, Sir,

Your very obedient servant,

To R. Pauncefote, Esq.

Joseph Stevenson.

Appendix, No. 21.

Examination of the Rev. William Porter, Monday 17th October 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
William Porter,
17 October 1825.

YOU are Clerk to the General Synod of Ulster?—Yes.

How long have you held that situation?—I was elected in 1817.

Describe the duties annexed to that situation?—The duty of the clerk is to take down the different motions as they are made, and the resolutions as they are entered into; to take a fair copy of them, and superintend the printing and distribution of the minutes, and also to keep the records of the Synod. At present the records are not all in my possession. The early volumes of them are in the possession of Mr. Thomson, an aged clergyman, to whom they were, by the order of the Synod, given for a particular purpose; but I have the records of the last twenty-five years.

Without troubling you to produce the records at present, we should be glad of your own view of what they amount to upon some particular points: Will you be so good as to state the precise nature of the proposition made by the Synod of Ulster to the Belfast Institution lately, with respect to the appointment of the Professors?—The proposition made by the Committee of Synod to the Proprietors of the Belfast Institution, was as follows:—

“Resolved, That our Moderator be instructed respectfully to request of the Proprietors of the Belfast Academical Institution to authorize, by a bye-law, or by such other mode as may be consistent with the Act of Incorporation, the Joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, whenever a Professor is to be chosen in that seminary, to give notice of the day of election to the Moderator of the Synod, in sufficient time for him to convene a Committee of the Synod in Belfast; and to afford to the said Committee access to the testimonials of the different candidates, for the purpose of forming an opinion respecting the qualifications of such candidates, which opinion the Moderator is directed to communicate to the electors, specifying those candidates whom the Committee consider eligible.”

Be so good as to state what feelings induced the Synod to think it necessary to make that overture?—I cannot enter into the feelings of others; but I suppose it arose from an impression made on the minds of many of the Synod, that the students belonging to our body were liable to be infected with Arian principles in that Institution; the correctness of that impression is another question.

Have you had any means of forming any opinion of your own upon that subject?—I live at the distance of nearly 50 miles from the Institution; but I am acquainted with almost all the Professors employed in instructing the young men, and my opinion is, that that feeling on the part of the majority of the Synod, was not well grounded.

Is it the feeling of a decided majority?—I should think not, if they had been left to themselves.

What do you mean by “if left to themselves?”—I think that an alarm has been excited, which, in my opinion, is destitute of foundation. One of my reasons for the opinion I have expressed is, that there had formerly been at least one Professor in the Institution, who was supposed to entertain the same principles with the gentleman, whose election has given most offence, and no alarm was excited; at least I heard of none; I am not competent to speak with certainty with respect to the religious opinions of the gentlemen referred to; I know them only by report.

You mean, that according to general opinion, there was as much of Arianism in the Institution for years back, as at present?—Yes; Dr. William Nielson, I have always understood, was a person of decidedly Arian sentiments.

He was the predecessor of Mr. Bruce?—Yes; and Mr. Hincks is supposed to be an Arian; and his appointment to the situation of classical teacher took place prior to the election of Mr. Bruce, and so far as I know, excited no alarm.

Will you have the goodness to state, whether you are a person of Arian or Orthodox principles?—I set out in life with Orthodox sentiments; but upon mature reflection, I was led to change those sentiments, and I am what is usually called an Arian.

Is that known generally in the Synod?—I believe very generally; I do not think it necessary to perplex and puzzle the minds of a country congregation with abstruse and difficult disquisitions; I generally allow the question respecting the Trinity to remain in a state of abeyance; but it is well known to the respectable part of my hearers, and to my brethren in the ministry, that I am a person of Arian sentiments.

It is natural you would not have the same terror of the prevalence of Arian principles in the Institution, or of the Arian Professors, as persons of Orthodox sentiments?—Certainly; all I can say is, that I endeavour to make an impartial statement; believing that Arianism is the doctrine of the Gospel, I can feel no alarm or regret at its prevalence.

When you say there is no just ground of apprehension, do you mean that there is no just ground of apprehension of the principles being mischievous, or of their gaining ground?—It cannot be supposed that I should consider my own principles as likely to be mischievous; I mean to say, that those principles are as little likely to gain ground in the Institution as in any other seminary to which our young men go; indeed less so, for I am decidedly of opinion, that the religious complexion of the young men educated in the Institution is more decidedly Orthodox, than was the religious complexion of the young men educated in Glasgow. I think more young men of New Light sentiments came from Glasgow College, than I have known to be reared in the Institution; I account for this, by supposing that Orthodox sentiments, being the popular sentiments, and the creed of young men who pass through the Belfast seminary, being more open to public inspection, they are more under a temptation

293

Examination of
Rev.
William Porter,
17 October 1825.

a temptation to avoid the means of imbibing sentiments which may mar their success in life, or to suppress those sentiments, if they have formed them. Amongst us what is called Orthodoxy, seems of late to be taking the lead of Arianism.

Are you acquainted pretty extensively with the clergymen of the Synod of Ulster?—I am; from my situation of clerk, I have opportunities of very extensive acquaintance; I am personally acquainted with nearly all the aged members of the Synod.

How many members of that Synod do you suppose are of Arian principles?—I cannot positively say; but I will say this, that, in my opinion, there are more real Arians than professed ones amongst us. Arianism being an unpopular doctrine, I have no hesitation in saying, that our ministers in general are not fond of avowing it.

In your opinion, is Arianism gaining ground, or otherwise, at present?—In my opinion it is gaining ground amongst the thinking few; but amongst the mass of the population of this country, were I to judge from present appearances, I should say that it is losing ground. Did I not believe that truth must ultimately prevail, I should think that Arianism would decrease very rapidly.

Do you know any places where the congregations belonging to the Synod of Ulster are favourable to Arian sentiments?—A diversity in religious belief prevails more or less in all our congregations; and I do not know one in which Arian principles are exclusively prevalent.

The question is, whether you know any congregations in the north of Ireland, generally, to whom the peculiar doctrines of Arianism are acceptable?—At this moment I cannot call to mind any one in which they would be universally acceptable; but even in Orthodox congregations there are, I believe, persons of Arian sentiments, though these persons are very few in number.

But inasmuch as the appointment of the minister rests with the congregation, and inasmuch as the recent events, as well as the present investigation will necessarily direct considerable attention to the circumstance of Arianism prevailing to a certain extent, do you not think that that will lead to fewer Arian ministers being appointed for the future, than have been in times past?—The circumstances being as stated, I should think so; I think that Arians in the Synod of Ulster have perhaps been blameably indifferent as to proselytism; their sentiments are unpopular; they do not attach salvation to their peculiar tenets, and are naturally less anxious to propagate their creed, than men who think that salvation depends on such disputed points of belief.

Are you acquainted with the character of many of the Prebyterian ministers, who have been educated in the Belfast Institution?—I know a few. I was settled in the ministry before the Institution became a place of collegiate education; but with the exception of my own son, and perhaps one or two others, the young men educated in Belfast have all been Orthodox as far as I can learn. But we do not call all persons Orthodox who maintain the doctrine of the Trinity. There are other doctrines called Heterodox, or New Light, &c. &c. which many persons maintain who disavow Arianism.

Will you state any opinions not connected with Arianism that fall within the distinction?—The opinions inculcated by Arminius on the disputed points of original sin, absolute predestination, irresistible grace, particular redemption, and the perseverance of the saints; to these may be added, the doctrines of imputed righteousness and salvation, by faith alone.

Do you wish we should understand, that you hold the Arminian opinions as well as the Arian?—I do; but there are shades of difference among Arminians upon those points.

Are you what you would term a High or Low Arian?—A high one. I have a high opinion of the dignity of our Saviour in his pre-existent state; I believe that by him God made the world, and that by him we shall be judged; and I believe that his death is in some way or other efficacious in effecting our salvation, though I cannot embrace the doctrine of imputed righteousness, nor that of vicarious punishment.

There was a new code of laws adopted for the government of the Synod last year?—It received the sanction of the Synod last year, and that code, when compared with the sentiments of the Synod in 1726, at which period the members of the Presbytery of Antrim were expelled, shows, in my opinion, that New Light principles have been progressive amongst us. Unqualified subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith, is not now indispensably requisite for admission into the ministry; formerly it was.

According to the original constitution of the Synod, subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith was required?—Yes; and the persons who afterwards constituted the Presbytery of Antrim, though they did not, I believe, expressly disavow the doctrines of the Confession of Faith, refused on general principles to subscribe to any human formula of faith conceiving the practice of such subscription, to be injurious to the interests of religious truth.

Do you conceive that the object of the change made in the constitution of the Synod, by which subscription was dispensed with, was to admit persons who did not hold the doctrines of the Westminster Confession of Faith?—The practice of unqualified subscription to the Westminster Confession, had gone into pretty general disuse for many years before it was formally dispensed with. In some Presbyteries it still continued to be required, but not in the majority, and in some Presbyteries it was altogether dispensed with. I believe there were only three or four Presbyteries out of the fourteen of which the Synod is composed, in which implicit subscription was insisted on. It was well known that such subscription was not required by several Presbyteries, and no notice was taken of the circumstance. Latterly, the law of Synod has been made to conform to what had long been the practice.

Examination of
Rev.
William Porter,
17 October 1825.

Was the object of the relaxation to admit persons who did not hold the Westminster Confession of Faith?—Non-subscription came on so gradually that I cannot say exactly. Probably the leading members of some Presbyteries, began to entertain doubts respecting certain points in the Westminster Confession, and exerted their influence to have young men admitted into the ministry without signing that formula; or men of even Calvinistic sentiments may have been hostile to subscription on general principles.

It appears by the minutes of the General Synod last year, that when the code of discipline was proposed which omits the subscription, an amendment was moved objecting to it, upon the ground that it did not require subscription?—That is the fact.

Will you state, whether that amendment was supported, in point of feeling, by many members of the Synod?—The gentleman who made that amendment was originally supported by another individual, his own son-in-law; and, latterly, even that individual withdrew his support, so that that gentleman then stood alone.

Were you a member of the committee that composed that code of discipline?—No; my distance from Belfast, I suppose, was one reason why I was not. I was a member of a committee which met at Moneymore, and revised and made some important alterations in the code, as originally compiled by a committee which held its meetings in Belfast.

Were there any other persons in that committee who professed Arian principles?—Yes, I should think several. I have no doubt of the fact. With respect to two or three of its members I can speak with certainty.

Can you speak of others?—The committee was composed of elders as well as ministers, deputed by each. With respect to the latter, I have not the same means of judging.

In the Presbytery to which you now belong, would a person who held Arian principles be licensed?—I am convinced that he would, and a person holding Orthodox sentiments would also be licensed. We do not as a Presbytery enter into those disputed points.

An examination takes place before the person is licensed?—Yes; but with us the examination generally turns on the evidences of Christianity, and on those fundamental doctrines in which all Christians concur. Still something will depend upon the discretion of the individual appointed to examine. In the Presbytery to which I belong (and I believe in every other) there is no regularly compiled form of examination. We have licensed young men of decidedly Orthodox opinions.

Is that the case in many of the other Presbyteries?—I think there are not many who would act in this respect as we do; I believe there are some, but on this point I speak very much at random; I think there are few Presbyteries who would license an avowed Arian.

Does the examination generally go to the point of Arianism?—The person examining may chance to ask what arguments the Arians and Unitarians advance, just as he would ask the arguments used by Trinitarians.

Then in point of fact, according to the present constitution of the Synod of Ulster, Presbyteries may be Arian and not Arian?—There is no bar; but it is exceedingly unlikely in the present state of the public mind, that any considerable number of Presbyteries should assume a decidedly Arian complexion; the popular opinion is so decidedly adverse to Arianism, that ministers are under a strong temptation in early life, to fortify themselves against the arguments in favour of that system. Few men will be disposed to embrace a creed which will operate both against their popularity and their interest. And in my opinion, herein consists the most material disadvantage of our system of church discipline. A minister is so dependent on his people, for his original settlement as their pastor, and for his subsequent comfort and support, that he is placed under a temptation to succumb to their prejudices, and to follow, rather than to lead their religious belief. But there is no system of discipline, ecclesiastical or civil, that is administered by man, which will not partake, in some degree of man's imperfection.

Do you require a subscription to the Testament, as containing the Word of God?—Most unquestionably; we require young men solemnly to profess their belief in the Old and New Testament, as the revealed Word of God, and their determination to expound them faithfully to their hearers; we also require them to declare their belief in those fundamental doctrines, which are I believe universally received by Christians. In my opinion, the essential doctrines of the Gospel, are embraced by Christians of every religious denomination. If divines who appear to differ widely, would kindly and candidly explain their views and sentiments to each other, the difference would not be found so great as is generally supposed.

Are you extensively acquainted with what are called Orthodox Members of the Synod?—I am in habits of cordial intimacy with many of them, and I think I may say, that I owe my election to the office of clerk, principally to the support I received from my Calvinistic brethren.

Do you conceive, that if the Belfast Institution be continued under its present form of government and constitution generally, that the general body of the Synod of Ulster would withdraw its confidence from it, and send its candidates for the ministry to Scotland, or abroad?—I do think they would not; there has been an alarm raised, without in my opinion any just ground, and although this alarm has not yet subsided, I think the truth will be known in a little time. The Institution may suffer for a season, but people must soon come to their senses, and then it will be seen that there is less danger to be apprehended from Arianism in Belfast, than in Glasgow. The eyes, of the Presbyterian population of Ireland, are fixed upon the young men educated in Belfast. The great majority of the Professors are men of Calvinistic sentiments; our Theological Professor is, unquestionably

295
Examination of
Rev.
William Porter,
17 October 1825.

unquestionably Orthodox, and the few Professors who are supposed to be Arians, have pledged themselves not to interfere with the religious principles of the students, and they are men of well known honour; in fact, unless the Presbyterians of this country were in general to become Arians, they would destroy their own interest by violating their pledge.

You are not afraid of Orthodox Professors?—Not in the least; I believe truth is strong, and will in the end prevail; and as a proof that some Calvinists entertain no jealousy of the Institution, I would mention, that the Seceding Synod, who are supposed to be more unmixed with respect to Orthodoxy than the members of our body, are satisfied, so far as I can learn, with the existing constitution of the Belfast Institution; by some, it is deemed an objection to the Institution, that in consequence of the pledge alluded to, the students in it are not from the very commencement of their collegiate course, imbued with opinions on the disputed points of Theology; but in my mind, this is an advantage; I think the opinions on these points, which are early impressed on the minds of youth, ought rather to be called prejudices than opinions; a young man is more likely to arrive at the truth when those prejudices have not been early implanted, and when his judgment has been improved by a course of philosophical and mathematical study.

Arians allow a chance of salvation to all mankind, the High Calvinists only to the elect?—Calvinists differ upon that point; I know Calvinists who would spurn the idea of confining salvation to those who think as they do; the Arians have no established formulary of faith, and differ among themselves very materially; but I have never known an Arian who would confine salvation to his own particular belief; they are of opinion that no man will ever miss the divine approbation, because he has not happened to be successful in a sincere search after truth. I wish to maintain our connexion with the Institution, still more for the moral than even for the literary advantages which it affords to our young men; these moral advantages arise from students being placed under the eyes of ministers and other persons, who take an interest in their well-being; thoughtless boys are exposed to great moral danger, by being sent to a place in which they are utterly unknown, and where they may practise every species of folly, with comparative secrecy; with respect to literary advantages, the students in the Institution are so few, that it is in the power of each Professor to pay attention to every boy in his class, and to examine him every day; whereas I will venture to say, that while I was in Glasgow, one half of the students in each class, were not examined oftener than three or four times in the course of a session.

Do you conceive there are at Glasgow any Professors who hold Arian doctrines?—I have no personal knowledge, but as far as common report goes, there are.

You say an alarm about Arianism has arisen lately?—Yes.

Was there any thing said about it before the election of Mr. Bruce?—I never heard any alarm whatever expressed upon the subject, but it may have existed in the breast of some without my knowledge. As a proof that the alarm so industriously excited on account of members of the Presbytery of Antrim having anything to do with the education of our young men, is of comparatively recent origin, I would wish to mention, that in the year 1795, a deputation consisting of the Moderator of the Synod, who I believe was a Mr. Cochrane, Dr. Crawford, of Strabane, and Dr. Black, of Derry, was sent to wait upon the Irish Government, in order to procure the establishment of a place of home collegiate education; and the deputation was instructed to endeavour to have the projected seminary placed under the patronage and direction of the Ministers of the Synod of Ulster, the Presbytery of Antrim, (who was at that time supposed to hold as New Light sentiments as they do at present) and the Southern Association, now known as the Munster Synod.

Which is also understood to hold Arian sentiments?—They do not require subscription to any creed; but I believe they are almost to a man New Light, if not Arian,

[The witness was directed to furnish a copy of the minutes above referred to.]

EXTRACT from Minutes of the Proceedings of a Meeting of the fixed Committee of the General Synod of Ulster, which Meeting was held at Dungannon, on the 27th day of February 1795.

Instructions given to Commissioners appointed by the Committee.

“WE do hereby appoint you, the Rev. James Cochrane, our Moderator, the Rev. Dr. Crawford, and the Rev. Robert Black, or any two of you, to proceed forthwith to Dublin, in the character of Commissioners from the General Synod of Ulster. You are there to confer with Government, with our much respected friend, Mr. Stewart, of Killymoon, and with such Members of the two Houses of Parliament as are friendly to our interest, and to use your best endeavours to procure the establishment of a University for the education of youth, under the patronage and direction of the Ministers of the General Synod of Ulster, Presbytery of Antrim, and the Southern Association, subject to the control of Parliament, for the expenditure of any sum or annual grant of money which may be made to establish and support the said University.”

Examination of
Rev.
William Porter,
17 October 1825.

EXTRACT from Minutes of the Proceedings of a General Synod of Ulster, convened at Derry, on the 1st of July 1795.

Copy of a Letter to Mr. Secretary Pelham.

" Londonderry, 1st July 1795.

" WE, the Ministers and Elders composing the General Synod of Ulster, assembled at our annual meeting, take the liberty of informing you, as holding a place of high importance in the Government of this country, that under the late administration, we applied for the establishment of a University for educating the youth of our religious denomination, through the medium of Mr. James Stewart, of Killymoon, a gentleman of distinguished respectability, who has, with much kindness and zeal, interested himself in our behalf, on many occasions. We were particularly encouraged to use our endeavours to obtain this important object, by Lord Fitzwilliam's declaration to Parliament, "that it was his Majesty's wish, that a system of education should be adopted, favourable to the improvement of his subjects of all religious descriptions in Ireland."

Permit us, Sir, to acquaint you, that we had the pleasure to find, that those in the confidence of Lord Fitzwilliam were well disposed to gratify us in this matter. Our application was for a seminary of instruction, invested with the privileges of a university, to be placed under the patronage of the Ministers of the General Synod of Ulster, Presbytery of Antrim, and the Southern Association, and supported by the annual endowment of two thousand pounds. In this seminary, divinity, philosophy, rhetoric, mathematics, and the languages, were to be taught by a competent number of Professors, to which other branches of education were to be added, as circumstances might permit.

We understand, that on the late change of administration, this business was mentioned to you, and explained by Mr. Stewart, to whom you were so obliging as to say, "that you were well disposed to receive and attend to our communications on the subject;" informing him, at the same time, that a general plan of education was to be digested and carried into execution, and that Commissioners would be appointed for that purpose. We trust, Sir, that in framing this plan, regard will be paid to our application, which we request you will be so good as to lay before his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, and that proper measures will be taken to render it effectual.

At present, we constitute a large, and, permit us, Sir, to say, a respectable part of the people: When what we have been, what we are, and hope ever will be, in our attachment to the great principles of the constitution, and to the peace, the order, and the welfare of our country are considered, we trust that the confident expectations we have been led to entertain with respect to the establishment and support of a University, will not be disappointed.

This letter will be transmitted to you by Mr. Stewart, who has been so good as to consent to take charge of it, and forward it. We take the liberty to request, that your answer, and any farther communications on the subject, may be directed to the Rev. Dr. Marshall, our Moderator, at Ballymoney, whom, with Dr. Crawford, Dr. M^c Dowel, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Black, we have appointed our Commissioners to attend upon you in Dublin, when you may be pleased to call upon them for the purpose, and whom we have invested with full authority to act for us in all respects in this business, as to them may seem expedient.

We are, Sir, &c.

Alex^r Marshall, Mod^r.

Extracted by William Porter, Clerk of the General Synod of Ulster, 21st October 1825.

Appendix, No. 22.

Examination of the Rev. Thomas Heron; Thursday, 17th November, 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
Thomas Heron,
17 November 1825.

YOU are the Moderator of the Presbyterian Synod of Ireland, distinguished by the name of Seceders?—I am.

Is that an annual office?—Yes, it is.

When were you chosen?—In July last, at the meeting of the Synod.

Have you had any opportunities of becoming acquainted at all with the state of education in the Belfast Institution?—Yes, I have had some opportunities.

Have many persons been admitted into the ministry in your Synod, who were educated in that Institution?—In our Synod, twenty-one have been ordained and twenty-one licensed to preach, who have been educated in the Institution.

What number does your Synod consist of?—108 Ministers.

Do you happen to know where the remainder were educated?—I believe they were educated at Glasgow College.

Were

297
Examination of
Rev.
Thomas Heron,
17 November 1825.

Were you yourself educated at Glasgow?—Yes, I was.

Is there any rule upon the subject?—A degree from any of the universities would have been satisfactory to the Synod; but the young men were generally recommended to attend at Glasgow College.

Have you any cognizance of the young men intended for the ministry, before they go to a college?—Yes; every young man is examined by the Presbytery to which he belongs, before he enters college.

In what way is it made known to the Presbytery, in the first instance, that they are candidates for the ministry?—They apply for an examination, and they have not the liberty of attending on a college until they receive permission from the Presbytery to which they belong.

Do they undergo an examination, in the first instance?—They do.

Will you describe the course of that examination?—It is in the Latin and Greek classics, and in general as to their school education.

By whom are they examined?—By a person generally appointed by the Presbytery for that purpose; and a vote is then taken whether they shall be allowed to attend college or not.

At what age does that examination take place?—Generally from fourteen to twenty.

Are they examined as to their religious instruction?—Latterly they have been; they were not formerly.

Are they examined as to their religious opinions?—Yes, they are; and it is required they shall be members of the Secession Church, and have received the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Are all the young men in connection with your own Seceding Synod, or are any in connection with the Synod of Ulster?—They are all in connection with the Seceding Synod.

In all cases do they pay the expense of their own education, or do you contribute?—We do not as a body contribute to aid any young men in their course of education; but there may be cases in which individuals will aid young men coming forward to the ministry.

For what number of years were the young men at Glasgow?—Three sessions.

Is there one session in each year?—Yes, a six months session.

Do they undergo any examination by the Synod of Seceders while under instruction?—Yes, in every year on coming from college.

At what age are they admissible to the ministry?—There is no rule preventing a boy at any age, when he is conceived to be qualified.

What examination do they undergo after they have gone through their college education and taken their degree, if educated in a Scotch university, in order to ascertain whether they are qualified for admission to the ministry?—If the Presbytery be satisfied as to their literary qualifications, trials for license are prescribed to the young men, which if not approved of by the Presbytery, additional trials are prescribed; and if approved of, they are then examined particularly on divinity before they receive license.

By whom are they examined in divinity?—By any member of the Presbytery to which the students may belong.

Do they subscribe any test previous to admission?—Previous to the license they subscribe the Westminster Confession of Faith.

Is that a sufficient test to enable you to ascertain whether they agree in all matters of faith strictly with your Synod?—It is a very strong test and the most direct way we have of ascertaining it; there is a possibility that a man might sign what he did not believe, but on this subject I have no reason to judge in an unfavourable light of any minister in the Seceding Synod. It is required in all instances, and without it a young man would not receive license.

Is every young man, before he is licensed, required to give an exposition of the tenets of his faith?—No, not directly in any form prepared by himself; but there is a general examination as to his religious principles, and he is required, in presence of the members of Presbytery, to answer a formula of questions, relative to his belief in the doctrines of Christianity.

Do you hold it necessary that a person should be of what is called Orthodox principles?—Yes we do.

Do you believe that all the persons of the Seceding Synod, are Orthodox?—I do; I have no reason to think otherwise.

Do you mean by that, that they are believers in the Trinity?—Yes; that they are what are called Calvinists.

They profess Calvinism as distinguished from Arianism and Arminianism?—Yes.

In your opinion is the education the young men receive at the College of Belfast, as good as that which was given at the University of Glasgow?—I think it equally good.

Do you think it would be preferred by the young men of Ireland, to that of Glasgow?—I do think it is to be preferred.

Have the goodness to state the reasons why you think so?—First, from the local situation. The attendance, also, of the students is required until the end of each session, which was not always the case in the Glasgow University; a boy might leave it four weeks before the session closed; and the classes being smaller than in the Glasgow University, the student is more frequently examined by the professor in presence of the class; and I conclude, that the knowledge of this will necessarily lead to an increased attention to the business of the class.

Examination of
Rev.
Thomas Heron,
17 November 1825.

What is there in the local situation that makes you think it to be preferred?—The opportunity that parents and guardians have of judging of their progress and general character.

Are you satisfied that their general conduct is under better superintendence at Belfast than it could be if they were at Glasgow?—I think it is. I might also add, as to the comparative merits of the Institution and Glasgow University, that there is at the end of each session, in the Academical Institution, a general examination of every student before the Board of Faculty and before committees, who attend from the Synod of Ulster and the Seceding Synod; and if the parents and guardians of the students chuse to attend, they have an opportunity. Now the knowledge of this, on entering college, has a decided influence upon the minds of the young men in a diligent application to the business of the class, that they may be decently prepared for that general examination.

In point of fact, have you found that the young men who have been educated there, have been well instructed?—Compared with those who were educated at Glasgow, I consider them as having a better acquaintance with languages and science.

Have you had reason to believe, that there is any thing in the system of education in Belfast, that has a tendency to instil principles into the minds of the young other than those called Orthodox?—I do not think there is any thing in the system of education that has that tendency.

Are you aware that it has been said, that the Institution at Belfast has a tendency to disseminate Arian principles?—I have heard it stated.

Have you any reason to believe, one way or another, that it is true, or otherwise?—I have no reason to believe it true.

If it had any such tendency, must it necessarily be known to you?—It must be necessarily known to the Seceding Synod; when the thing was first mentioned, that professors reputed to be of Arian principles were introduced into the Belfast Institution, it excited, of course, a degree of jealousy among the members composing the Seceding Synod; but the Faculty gave a pledge, that they would not interfere with the religious principles of the students; and in addition to that, the Synod appointed a committee, not only to attend on the general examinations, but to inquire of the students and of their professor, Dr. Edgar, whether there had been any kind of interference with their religious opinions, or a tendency to it; and a general report is presented by the Committee to the Synod.

What have you generally learnt from such report?—That there has been no appearance of interference on the part of the professors with the religious principles of the students; I have a public document upon that subject, contained in the minute of last meeting of Synod.

Have the goodness to produce it?—

[The Witness produced a Minute of the last meeting of the Synod; and the same was read as follows:]—

“It was asked, whether the Committee of Superintendence had any grounds to believe, that the pledge previously given by the Faculty had, in any degree, been violated; namely, that there should be no interference, on the part of professors, with the religious opinions of the students. The answers, as follow, were given to this question:—

1. “From such investigation, on the purport of said question, as I had the opportunity of making, I am of the opinion, the pledge of Faculty referred to, has been hitherto honourably redeemed.”

(signed) “Wm. Moorhead.”

2. “We have not discovered any violation of the pledge given by the Faculty.”

(signed) “Joseph Lowry.”

Is there any thing, in the course of education at Glasgow, that would make it probable that the instruction given in the University would be more highly Orthodox in its character than the instruction given at Belfast?—No, I think there is no greater security in the Glasgow College, as to Orthodoxy, than at Belfast.

Were the professors in the Glasgow University strictly Orthodox, or did any of them entertain Arian principles?—I do not know that they did publicly avow themselves Arians; but there was an impression upon the minds of a number of the students, that they differed considerably in religious opinions.

Do you happen to know whether Arian principles are at all spreading in Glasgow?—I have had no opportunity, lately, of ascertaining that fact; I cannot say whether they may be or not.

By reference to the minutes of the Synod, held at Newry in 1823, it appears that one of the members of the Synod protested against the students belonging to the Synod studying the Hebrew language under the Reverend Mr. Hincks, in the Belfast Institution; was that protest followed by any other?—No.

Did that gentleman renew his protest in any subsequent session?—I believe not.

Are the Synod satisfied there is no ground of fear as expressed in that protest?—I think they are.

We believe there is a Professor of Theology appointed by the Seceding Synod to instruct the young men educated as ministers for their body?—Yes.

Do you think the power of appointing such an individual is a sufficient guard against the dissemination of improper principles on religious matters?—I look upon it as a considerable guard; and, connected with that, there is a Committee of Superintendence that particularly

299
Examination of
Rev.
Thomas Heron,
17 November 1825.

particularly inquires whether there is any interference with the religious opinions of the students.

Do you know whether there is any wish on the part of the Synod of the Seceders to extend their control over the appointment of professors in the Institution?—I am not aware that there is.

Do you yourself consider it expedient that there should be any interference in the nomination to the Hebrew professorship?—It might, in this degree, be desirable, as it might be gratifying to the members of the Synod if they had such a power, but I do not know that they feel such an interference necessary.

Would that give any security that they think they do not now possess?—I do not suppose it would give any stronger security; but supposing a doubt to exist in the minds of a portion of the members of Synod, it might be the means of removing that doubt.

Do you mean it would remove a doubt as to the security of the students from Arian doctrines?—Yes.

That the Synod would not allow Arian professors to be appointed?—Yes.

Do you think if the Synod had that power, it would have exercised it by giving a veto upon the appointment of the present Professor of Hebrew?—I think it would.

With regard to the expense of education, is the expense greater at Belfast than at Glasgow?—I suppose the difference would be very trifling; but I would consider it in favour of Belfast.

Is the difference greater than the necessary difference in the length of the journeys?—I think not.

Are they maintained at Belfast for less money than at Glasgow?—I am not aware that they have an opportunity of living cheaper at Belfast than at Glasgow.

Can you state what is supposed to be the necessary annual expense of a young man at Belfast, educating for the ministry, during the three years he must necessarily attend?—That would depend very much upon the means the young man would have; but as to what is absolutely necessary, I think about 25*l.* each session would be required.

What do you consider would be the average of the 21 admitted to your Synod?—I should think about 30*l.* each session they were in attendance.

Including the fees?—Yes, but not including what may be expended on dress, books, &c.

Is there any thing in the education at the Belfast Institution, that has a tendency to instil into the minds of the young men educated there, principles hostile to the constitution established in these realms?—I think not.

In point of fact what have you found to be the general political principles of the young men educated there?—So far as I have had any opportunity of conversing with the young men educated there, I think they are well affected to the Government.

Do you think, the education in Belfast is favourable to the North of Ireland?—Yes.

Do you think it stands in need of assistance from Government, to enable it to continue in its present state, or to improve it?—I think it would require it.

Would a grant to the Belfast Institution be favourably received in the North of Ireland?—I think it would.

Would it excite a feeling of gratitude on the part of the inhabitants?—I think it would.

Is there a general interest existing on the behalf of the Institution, or is it confined to members of the ministry?—I think there is a general interest among the Presbyterians.

In what part of the North of Ireland do you reside?—Near to Cookstown, in the county of Tyrone.

What distance is that from Belfast?—About thirty-four miles.

Have many persons gone from that neighbourhood to Belfast, to be educated as laymen?—No.

None whatever?—None that I know of.

Is the existence of the Institution pretty well known in the county of Tyrone, near where you inhabit?—Yes, it is.

To what do you attribute the circumstance of none going there; is it from want of means?—Not in all cases; but I attribute it generally to that cause.

Has the Synod of Seceders ever expressed any wish as a body, to have any control over the appointment of the Hebrew Professor at the College of Belfast, or over the appointment of any of the professors?—I believe there has never been any such wish expressed by the Seceders, as a body.

You do not understand the question as applying to the Professorship of Theology?—No; the Board of Managers have no control over the appointment of the Professor of Theology. The Board of Managers, at one time, agreed that the Moderator of the Seceding Synod should be a Visitor in like manner as the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster; it was understood in law this could not be done, but the Synod never expressed a wish upon the subject.

If a veto were given to the two Synods, the Synod of Ulster and the Synod of Seceders, upon the appointment to Professorships, do you think the Synods would be likely to concur in the exercise of that veto?—I think in many cases they would likely disagree.

Are you aware that an application has been made, by the Synod of Ulster, on the subject?—Yes, I am.

Would such an arrangement as would put into the hands of the Synod of Ulster an absolute veto, or any strong interference in the appointment of the Professors, be approved of by the Seceders?—I think not.

Can you state for what reason it would be likely that they would disapprove of it?—I would suppose generally, the Seceders would rather that the Institution would not be too much controlled by any particular religious sect; and that the fundamental principles of the

Examination of
Rev.
Thomas Heron,
17 November 1825.

Institution, and the course of education, should be of a general nature, giving to all sects equal advantages.

You have stated, that your Synod are agreed among themselves in religious opinions; do you believe that the Synod of Ulster is so?—I think not.

What opinions do you think preponderate in the Synod of Ulster at present?—I have heard it stated, that Calvinism is increasing in the Synod of Ulster; Arminianism is supposed to be prevalent also; it is reported, there are Arians in it, but I am not aware that any ministers of the Synod of Ulster have publicly declared themselves Arians.

In the possible case of the prevalence of Arian principles, among the Synod of Ulster, would any interference of theirs, in the appointment to professorships, be peculiarly unacceptable to the Synod of the Seceders?—Yes, it would.

The clergy of the Synod of the Seceders receive the Regium donum?—Yes, they do.

Do you think if a power were vested in each of the Synods, of objecting to the appointment of any particular person, to any one of the Professorships, the Hebrew Professorship for instance, that that would practically have the effect of excluding any one except upon the score of Arianism?—If an Arian was not a candidate for the Professorships, and that among the candidates there was an avowed Arminian and a Calvinist, owing to the difference in their religious opinions jealousies might be awakened, and the vesting of such a power in the Synods, might in time, (if the subject of Arianism was set at rest) practically tend to the excluding of one or other of them on the score of religious opinions.

Should you consider it objectionable under all the circumstances of the Institution?—Yes; I think it would be a departure from the principles of the Institution, inasmuch as religious opinions are not the ground of choice, but literary qualifications and moral character.

Do you think it objectionable that the two Synods should have the power of appointing their own Professors of Theology?—No, I think that desirable; and I feel satisfied it is a right they will always wish to exercise.

According to your view of the principles of the Institution, is it not a violation of those principles to entrust the appointment of professors to a body like your own, who will not, it is well understood, appoint any but a Calvinist?—With the exception of the appointment of the Professor of Theology, which is a right exclusively belonging to the Synod, I think it is.

Are you not aware that an impression has gone abroad, that the Belfast Institution is an Institution that has become more or less subject to Arian principles?—I have heard the thing stated; but so far as I have had an opportunity of judging, I have never been able to discover that tendency.

Do you not think, in general report at least, that the subject of Arianism connects itself unpleasantly with the character of the Belfast Institution, whether rightly or wrongly?—I think it is unpleasantly connected with it in general report, but at the same time unjustly.

Do you not think, in reference to that circumstance, it would be desirable to adopt some regulations which might satisfy the public, that it was the objects of those connected with the management of the Institution, to mark their disapprobation of those principles, and to evince a desire that they should not prevail there?—In the faith that every member of Faculty will be induced, from interest as well as principle, to honourably redeem the pledge he must give, and viewing the question in a general light, I should think it would not be desirable to exclude even an Arian, where he is better qualified as a literary man and a man of moral character, lest it should have the effect of seriously injuring the Institution, as being a departure from the principles upon which it was first established.

Is it your impression, that the principles upon which it was established were so perfect as that they could not admit of improvement?—It may not be impossible to make an improvement on the principles of the Institution; but owing to the jealousies existing amongst different religious sects in Ireland, and considering the great diversity of opinion on religious subjects that exists amongst Presbyterians, I am not aware of any change that could be made in the principles of the Institution which would render it generally more acceptable, preserve it equally free from a tendency to proselytism, and give the same prospect of its being permanently useful, in affording to Presbyterians the advantages of a liberal education.

Should you think it objectionable that an Atheist should fill the chair of moral philosophy?—I would, decidedly; or any professorship connected with the Institution.

Do you consider that it would be equally objectionable that an Atheist should fill the chair of chemistry, as that he should fill the chair of moral philosophy?—It is not perhaps equally objectionable, but it would be to me objectionable.

Would you object to an Atheist teaching the Latin and Greek languages?—I would.

Do you not think he could do very different degrees of mischief in the three situations suggested?—I do.

In which would he do the most?—In that of moral philosophy.

Do you think it would be desirable that any arrangement should be made with a view to prevent the possibility of an Atheist actually filling that situation; for instance, that the appointment to that particular professorship should be made subject to the approbation of either or both of the Synods, in which case we would presume it would be quite impossible that any but a religious person should be sent into it?—I am not aware that, according to the present principles of the Institution, an Atheist would be eligible; but supposing the possibility to exist, I should think it desirable that there should be something to prevent the

301
Examination of
Rev.

Thomas Heron,
17 November 1825.

the appointment of such a person to any professorship; but I am not an advocate for vesting that power in either or both of the Synods.

Would you object to the appointment of a Socinian, as contra-distinguished from an Arian, to any of the professorships?—As an individual, I would rather that no Arian nor Socinian was appointed; but the appointment of a Socinian, I conceive, would not be a departure from the principles of the Institution.

Would your objections to the appointment of an Atheist apply also to the appointment of a Deist?—Yes; I might make a difference in the objection, but I would still object to it.

You would object to a Deist, but not to a Socinian?—Yes; understanding by a Deist a person who denies divine Revelation.

Are you acquainted, individually, with any considerable number of the gentlemen who act as managers of the Belfast Institution?—No, I am not.

What are your impressions upon the expediency of conferring upon the Government some power of the nature of a veto, with respect to the appointment of professors?—As an individual I would have no objection; but I would feel fully satisfied that the Government should have a veto upon the appointment of professors, as I conceive it would identify the Institution more with the Government.

Do you think that your feeling upon that point would be pretty general?—So far as I have had an opportunity of conversing with persons in the circle of life in which I move, I have not heard an objection to it; I think it would be generally approved of.

You have spoken of Arminianism prevailing to a certain extent in the Synod of Ulster; we have received very different definitions of that word; we would be obliged to you to explain the sense in which you employed it?—Arminians deny the doctrine of election, and the perseverance of the saints; and while they admit the pollution of nature to a certain extent, I think they deny the imputation of original sin to the posterity of Adam. They believe in the Atonement, but consider repentance and faith as the conditions on which men will be saved; and that man has an absolute freedom of will or power to believe, independent of divine agency.

That you consider a sufficient definition of it, in the sense in which you used it?—Yes.

The Calvinists object to that view?—Yes.

The one considers him a free agent, and the other not?—In the general, the doctrine of necessity connects itself with Calvinism; but I think the doctrine of free will is adopted in a certain degree by many Calvinists, and supposed to be consistent with the views they have of religious truth.

The question of union with the Belfast Institution has been a subject of frequent discussion in your Synod?—Yes, it has.

We find a minute in the proceedings of the year 1823, which is to this effect: "Pursuant to a deed of last year, the Synod proceeded to consider whether there exists any just ground for discontinuing the connection of the students under their care with the Belfast Institution. On this subject of vital importance to the interests of religion, the Synod gave their deliberate judgment at great length. The following motion was made, and unanimously adopted; that 'deeply as the Synod regret the introduction of professors reputed to be of Arian principles into the Institution, and strongly as they detest such principles, yet as the professors have come under solemn engagements not to interfere with the religious opinions of the students, and as no fundamental principle of the Institution has been violated, they see no grounds of dissolving their connection with it;' " does that resolution still stand recorded, as stating the opinions and sentiments of the Synod?—It does.

And neither the Synod as a body, nor yourself as an individual, have seen any reason to rescind that resolution?—No, not any.

Do you know whether, since the Institution has been opened for the instruction of young men for the ministry, any young men have gone to Glasgow, or have they all been educated in Belfast?—I believe they have all been educated in the Belfast Institution.

Is there any thing connected with the subjects upon which you have been examined, upon which you would wish to give any further explanation?—There is one thing connected with the Institution, that it may not be improper for me to mention, namely, that I think it has already tended, and will in future tend in a considerable degree, to the general improvement of school education in the North of Ireland. I am disposed to think, from some conversation I have had with the professors, that 200 students or upwards, educated in the Academical Institution, have been employed as teachers in families and public schools in Ireland; and there is an opportunity for a teacher in the country to attend, during his vacation, at the Belfast schools, where he has an opportunity of becoming acquainted with a more improved method of teaching. An instance of this kind has come within my knowledge of late. I am a member of a committee connected with a school in the place in which I reside. It was proposed that the teacher should attend for fourteen days at the Institution, during his vacation, and that the vacation should be earlier on that account. He will be in attendance in a few days, and he is determined to spend part of his vacation in future in this way. Another fact which tells in favour of the Institution is, that when Irish students formerly attended at Glasgow, they were not recommended to families as teachers; those situations were generally filled by Scotch students. In the Institution the professors have an opportunity of recommending those most competent to teach, and it has proved advantageous in a pecuniary point of view, and otherwise, to the young men at the Institution.

Is there any other point of view in which it occurs to you the country is likely to derive benefit from the Institution?—No other that occurs to me.

Appendix, No. 23.

EXTRACTS from the Examinations of the Rev. Henry Cooke;
5th and 6th Jan. 1825.

Extracts from Examinations of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
5 & 6 Jan. 1825.

WILL you be so good as to explain to us, wherein the difference of faith or opinions consists, among those who are vulgarly denominated the New and Old Light, as applicable to the Presbyterian body?—In one word, in the North of Ireland the Old Light signifies, in its strictest as well as most common acceptation, Calvinism. It is also occasionally employed to signify Arminianism, and also that intermedium between the two which Richard Baxter taught. It is employed to signify all those, but most generally Calvinism. New Light, in the North of Ireland, exclusively signified Arianism, or a verging to Socinianism. We have not many Socinians; there may be some, not more than one among the ministers of whom I am certain. There may be another whom I suspect, but among the people there are few. The term New Light is applied to them all.

Do you conceive that Arminianism and Calvinism are easily reconcileable with each other?—I think, taking it in the sense in which it was taught by the Remonstrants in Holland, they are not at all reconcileable; but as it was taught by Wesley, they seem to meet so closely, that it is not easy to distinguish them. I mean, that a man who would write or preach the doctrines called Arminianism, has necessarily to concede all the essential points of Calvinism.

Are we to distinctly understand, that in speaking of the Presbyterian church, the word New Light is understood to imply Arianism, leaning at least to Socinian opinions?—In its most extensive sense it signifies distinctly, not only Arianism, but Arianism verging towards Socinianism, or positive Socinianism. Some few Calvinists apply it to Arminianism, but this is uncommon.

Do you think there is Arianism in any of the ministers officiating in the Presbyterian congregations in Ireland?—Yes, I am certain there is, so far as one can be certain.

Is it avowed by those ministers, or denied by them?—I do not know that it is avowed by more than two or three; the others are all anxious to deny it, or say nothing upon the subject. I am here speaking of the North; in the South, it is distinctly avowed by the Synod of Munster.

In what way have they avowed it?—One way is by preaching. I know the distinguishing doctrines of it have been preached, and others, by tacit consent; it is known by considering the doctrines they do not preach. I believe it would not be easy to find any other way of ascertaining the fact.

In the Synod of Ulster, do you conceive there are any ministers belonging to it, who hold the Arian doctrines?—I do think there are.

What is the total number of ministers belonging to the Synod of Ulster?—I think, taking in ministers and assistants, it would be about 200.

Of that number of 200, what portion should you suppose hold the Arian doctrines?—I have not been able to estimate 40; about 35, I think that was the most, upon a special personal examination of the list of the Synod, and very few of those would be willing to acknowledge it; it is known by defect rather than declaration.

What number of ministers belong to the Presbytery of Antrim?—I believe eight congregations and ten ministers; one has no congregation.

Are they understood to hold the Arian doctrine?—I think there is one of them, of whom I would question very much whether he does hold it or not. I should suspect he was more of an Arminian, but he does not, so far as I know, preach the doctrine that would show he was not an Arian.

As to the others?—One of the principal persons has published they were all Arians; but the rest affirm he had no authority for saying so. I consider them all Arians, except perhaps the one mentioned.

How many ministers belong to the Synod of Munster?—I believe eight congregations, and eleven ministers, of whom two lately died.

How many of those hold the Arian or Socinian doctrines?—There was only one out of the number that did not hold Arian doctrines; and some of them, I believe, held the Socinian doctrines.

What number of ministers belong to those you name Seceders?—I think about 100, or a few more.

Do any of those hold the Arian doctrines?—I conceive not one.

Do any of the Covenanters?—Not one.

Was there not some rule of discipline until lately, which had the practical effect of excluding the Arian ministers from their functions in the Synod of Ulster; something in the nature of a test, or subscription of articles, or confession of faith?—I think about a hundred years ago, or near it, the Presbytery of Antrim was separated from the general Synod of Ulster, on account of the Arian doctrines. They were, I believe, expelled from the body, chiefly or altogether on that account. I believe the ostensible reason used by the members of the Presbytery of Antrim was, a refusal to subscribe any human test or doctrine; and the law of the Synod, before and after that period, certainly stood in words, and should in practice, that no one should be licensed to preach, or be ordained, except he subscribed the Westminster Confession of Faith: with this sole exception, there was an Act passed by the Synod called The Pacific Act, to relieve persons from mere expressions, not relieving them from the doctrines. If any minister objected to the expression in the confession, he had

303
Extracts from Examinations of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
5 & 6 Jan. 1825.

had a right to put it into his own words, but at the same time not to deny the doctrines contained in it; and it was even so particular, that he would not be permitted to put it in Scripture language, because there might be a doubt thrown over the meaning he attached to it. With that exception, the law was, that before any one received license or ordination, he must sign the Westminster Confession of Faith. The principal reason for the Pacific Act was this:—There is one chapter in the Westminster Confession of Faith that goes to define the power of the civil magistrate, and it declares that the civil magistrate has power to call Synods; or such other religious assemblies, and to see that nothing be enacted therein contrary to the Scriptures. This produced a good deal of debate; for whilst none would have denied the right of the civil magistrate to convene a religious meeting, many scrupled at the latter part of the article, which seemed to give the magistrate a right to enter upon the interpretation of the Scriptures. It was upon this subject that explanation was frequently required. Ecclesiastical writers on the subject explained the law thus. The magistrate has power "circa sacra sed non in sacris." Difficulties on this subject created the necessity of the Pacific Act I have mentioned. There might be also other expressions to which the same latitude might be extended, the minister putting it in his own language, but not impugning the doctrines. Such was the law of the Synod in words; and at the time the Presbytery of Antrim was separated from it, it was very exactly the practice. I can only give a conjectural reason for the change, but I think, in all probability, it arose from certain writings being circulated among the ministers, and also from an Arian professor having crept into the University of Glasgow. This was a Professor Simpson, who was ejected by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, for teaching that the doctrine of the Divinity of our Saviour was to be understood, as far as I can recollect his expression, cum grano salis. I cannot trace the origin of those opinions in the Synod further than I state.

In point of fact, would the condition of the subscription to the Confession of Westminster have the effect of excluding Arians altogether from the ministry?—Yes it must.

No person could subscribe that confession and be an Arian?—No, he could not; it is impossible he could be any thing but a Calvinist; it is beyond all question, the most strict of all confessions that have been written.

Are the Seceding ministers of Ireland bound to subscribe to it?—I apprehend all of them.

Did you subscribe to it?—I did.

And yet we must collect from your former evidence, that all the ministers of the Synod of Ulster do not subscribe to it.

At the time some of those opinions were introduced, which I have referred to, a laxity of discipline was introduced as to enforcing subscription; some Presbyteries laying it aside, others eluding it by equivocal phraseology, the consequence was, that the greater number of Presbyteries dropped it altogether; but at the same time some of the Presbyteries that have given up the subscription, are the most decided in favour of the doctrine of the Westminster Confession; so that you are not to infer from a Presbytery having given up the subscription, that therefore they give up the doctrine. But the Presbyteries that have properly retained subscription are most decidedly Calvinistic.

Would such Presbyteries as you have described, be averse to adopting the rule again of making the subscription to the confession a condition upon undertaking the ministry*?—There might be some objection, because they go upon this principle, that it is much better to examine the young men upon the Scriptures than require their subscription to any human formulary, because you might get a hypocrite to sign it.

At the same time one does not see how that reason would apply to the excluding the subscription to the confession of faith, because it might be still open to examine them upon the doctrines, and the supposed hypocrite might be detected?—I hold the opinion implied in the question; but I think, that amongst our clergy, who go by the general denomination of the Old Lights, there are some holding Arminianism, but the point in the confession upon the subject of predestination is so strict, it is impossible to entertain any doubt; the consequence has been, that those members holding Calvinistic doctrines, and others holding Arminian doctrines, or doctrines akin to them, have made a kind of compromise with one another, and the Calvinists have not enforced subscription for the purpose of not excluding those

* The subject of subscription and of separation from the Arians, has often formed matter of deep consideration to many members of the Synod of Ulster. I confess I am favourable to both; I feel myself a member of a church openly tolerating what I consider erroneous doctrines; but alas! where should I retire into greater purity. What church is free from the stain.

I have therefore, with others, laboured to reform rather than abandon a church I acknowledge in some degree corrupt; we have not been without some success; we have seen, as I have stated above, most extensive revolutions for the better. Had we been separate from the Arians, their congregations would have been filled on the demise of ministers with Arian successors; our remaining in union has enabled us in many cases to fill the churches of deceased Arians with Orthodox preachers.

Notwithstanding all this, the anxious wish of many is for a separation, and the great practical barrier in the way is, how to reconcile the Calvinists and Arminians; the Arminians are the smaller number. Some ministers have talked of modifying the Westminster Confession, on the article of Predestination; others, of substituting a subscription to the distinguishing doctrines of the "Trinity," the "Atonement," &c. &c.; others have talked of a prospective union with the Seceders. It wants but a beginning to effect a division on some of the foregoing principles; I think the Orthodox members of the Synod might all agree to resume subscription to the Westminster Confession, under the operation of the Pacific Act. I have described, I believe, the Arminians amongst us to go further in conceding the essentials of Calvinism than even what I have before mentioned.

Extracts from Examinations of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
5 & 6 Jan. 1825.

those who hold the doctrines of Arminianism. I mean by that, Arminianism as modified by Wesley and others, and which I myself consider as conceding the doctrines of Calvinism.

In what manner did the Synod of Munster get rid of the subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith?—I am almost certain they never had it, because the Synod of Munster generally acted as a number of Independent churches, having no common bond of union.

At what period was the Synod of Munster formed?—Many of them were chaplains of families in the time of Cromwell, and were Independents.

Do you mean they were of that sect known by the name of Independents?—Yes, several of them appear to have been Independents; some were settled as ministers of Protestant colonies; some were the ministers of French refugees, and seemed to have had little connection more than what arose from the management of the Government.

Of course you have read the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England?—I have.

Are there any of those articles you would not feel at liberty to subscribe?—The article permitting the church to ordain rites and ceremonies, I could not subscribe except explained in a very particular manner; if it signified to ordain, or enforce any ceremony not contained in the word of God, I could not subscribe it.

Could you subscribe to all the doctrinal articles?—Yes, I could.

Do you conceive, that all the ministers you have described as Seceders, could, with equal facility, subscribe to all the doctrinal articles of the Church of England?—Yes, no doubt; we hold the articles of the Church of England to be Calvinistic, and in that we agree with one portion of the church and disagree with another: those articles that refer to the doctrines of the Gospel, we should have no objection to in the world.

Do you conceive, that the number of Arians, among the Presbyterians in Ireland, has been increasing of late years?—I think it is very much on the decrease.

At what period do you suppose it was the greatest?—I think it was greatest, perhaps, about an hundred years ago, at the time the Presbytery of Antrim was separated from the Synod of Ulster; I think then it made very considerable progress under the patronage of high names, as Abernethy, the author of a very excellent work upon the Attributes, who gave it a great deal of éclat. I think it afterwards declined for a time, but I think there was subsequently a revival; forty or fifty years ago it might be at its height, and remained stationary for a time, or was even upon the increase; but latterly it has decidedly declined, and I will give you a striking example of it. I was ordained in 1808; I believe I succeeded an Arian; another friend was ordained in 1808, and he succeeded an Arian, or one very near to it; another friend succeeded in like manner, a very decided Arian; and another friend another Arian; until in one whole district, which was twenty years ago entirely Arian, I do not know of one single minister you could suspect of Arianism except one.

Can you state how the congregations, your own, and that of your friends, were affected by the change?—The people were delighted by it; they considered themselves suffering very much, certainly, under the ministry of the Arians.

You think the congregations generally as contra-distinguished from their ministers, are indisposed to Arianism?—Yes, the great body of the people, most distinctly are opposed to Arianism; but if the people of rank, in a congregation, be Arians, as sometimes happens, they may bring in a minister of Arian principles by their influence; for although the people have equal votes, we allow a proportion of representation and influence to property in the house. Originally also, there was a certain representative power allowed to the quality and rank of the person, that could only be an estimated thing that would go by the opinion of the ministers and elders; but now, without allowing rank or quality to enter into the estimate, the richer part of a congregation have a great facility in keeping out any minister, or bringing in one of their own choice.

Is there any precise rule?—Two-thirds of both men and money are necessary to get a minister in, and one-third would keep him out.

Can you assign any reason, why persons of the rich and upper and better class, are more disposed towards Arianism than others?—I could not give a decided reason; but I think one reason has always been, that the ministers called the Old Lights, were always most disposed for enforcing strict church discipline. They all kept up a discipline, in modern times considered ridiculous; punishing members for delinquency, and unfortunately the rich classes of people were not fond of it. I think the Old Lights also preached the highest, and therefore to some the least acceptable standard of morality.

Can you discover in the modes of education, that have been pursued by the Presbyterian Clergy of Ireland, any predisposing cause that would account for certain leading characters among them declining to Arian principles?—Not more than the influence of the Presbyteries; a young man, when he commences as a student, comes under the care of the Presbytery; the necessity of writing essays, and preaching sermons before them, brings him constantly in communication with them; and if they are Arians, it is likely he may imbibe some of their notions. I will venture to assign, as another reason, the protégés of Government have generally been Arians.

Has there been any cause of the kind existing in the Scotch Universities?—Latterly there has not been any thing very distinct, except that some of the Scotch professors have been, at least I may say, suspected of Socinianism, or very liberal opinions as they are pleased to call them; and that might have predisposed some. It is a notorious fact, that some of the Professors of Edinburgh and Glasgow have been suspected.

Do you apply that to the professors of theology?—I do not apply it to them; and yet although I studied under two professors in Scotland, there was a great deficiency in their system of education in theology; it was a great deal too general. I never heard any doctrines brought forward, although I believe the persons themselves hold those doctrines, that might 305

Extracts from Examinations of
Rev.

Henry Cooke,
5 & 6 Jan. 1825.

might have been brought forward with advantage to Orthodoxy. This glaring deficiency in the education of Irish students of theology, arose in a great degree from the length of the Scotch Professor's course, and the shortness of the Irish students curriculum of theological education. It was a great evil.

To what circumstance do you attribute the recent decrease of Arianism among the Presbyterian clergy?—To greater exertion and decidedness on the part of the ministers holding Orthodox doctrines, and to the Bible and Missionary Societies, which have altogether got into the hands of the Orthodox or Old Light ministers; in consequence of that, they have been brought into public notice which they were not before; their principles have been known, and have been stated at public meetings. A number of very influential Orthodox ministers have arisen that have boldly asserted their sentiments, and taken away the cause of objection that formerly existed against Orthodox ministers, and the stigma affixed to them of vulgarity, which may have been in a great degree the case. This point is well illustrated in a very excellent essay of Mr. Foster, upon the reason why evangelical preaching has been less exceptionable to the upper classes; latterly, a number of ministers better educated and better calculated for preaching to the higher ranks, have taken off the stigma that before existed upon those doctrines, and exhibited them in a more attractive form and more prominent point of view. But the great cause has been the advancement of the Bible, as a more prominent object of religion, and attention to the Bible and Missionary Societies, which have brought the Orthodox ministers into more notice, and given them more decision and more influence.

Have you observed less disposition on the part of the Arian ministers to refer to the Scriptures as the standard of truth, than amongst those whom you describe as Orthodox?—No, I do not think I have observed less disposition, but there is less inducement. I conceive, that the sermons of the Arians contain none almost of the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel; there would be no reference to either the person or almost to the works of the Saviour; their discussions consist more of essays on ethics. There would therefore be less inducement for reference to the Scriptures, as they would have less to prove of what is peculiar to the Scriptures. The others treat frequently upon the peculiar Scripture doctrines of the Gospel, and therefore have more reference to scriptural authority.

Do the observations made, as to the decrease of Arianism, apply to Ireland generally, or to the province of Ulster?—I conceive it is general. I cannot call it a decrease in the south. I can only say, there is a visible increase of other doctrines. We have established Churches in different places. We have it in our power in almost any of the principal towns of the south to establish others. The Arians have either not the inclination or the power. I cannot decidedly say which; but I am inclined to think, they would not have the power.

6th January, 1825.

Is there any point that occurs to you upon the general subject of education in Ireland, which you did not state yesterday in the course of your examination?—Yes; there is one point I should wish to explain, as my evidence would tend to injure the Scotch Professors of Theology. I mentioned, that although I studied two years under one Professor, and one under another, I never heard any doctrinal points stated; it is absolutely necessary for doing justice to those persons to whom I owe very much indeed, that I should explain. The explanation is this; before the late addition to our means of support by the liberality of the Government, the income of the Presbyterian ministers was very limited; our ministers had only 16*l.* a year from Government; and their stipend was not larger than I have stated. In some of the congregations the liberality of the landlord allowed them to live by having farms at a cheap rate. In consequence of a number of rich families leaving the Presbyterian body, to whom they almost all at an early period belonged, and joining the Established Church, the greater part of these farms were lost by the congregations, the landlords feeling no interest in them, and in some cases the old ministers appropriated the farms to themselves, of course succeeding Ministers were deprived of a principal means of their support, and a great many of our clergy were comparatively very poor. Under circumstances of this kind you cannot suppose our education would be very extensive. I believe that previous to 1803, it generally consisted of a few sessions at philosophy and languages, and that only a part of the Irish students ever attended theology at the University, but depended altogether on their reading while under the care of their Presbyteries. After 1803, the curriculum of study for our students was extended to three years in languages and philosophy, and one year's study in theology. On the other hand, the time of education required for a Scotch minister is eight years. He has four years in languages and philosophy, and at least four and in many cases six years in theology; if he be in any degree irregular in attendance, he must be six years. The consequence of this system was, that the Scotch education in theology, extending through four years and sometimes six, our ministers who only attended one year on theology, would generally hear not a single doctrine of the Gospel discussed in the lectures. A system extending through six years was necessarily very voluminous; the entire discussions of a year were often confined to one or two points, being the very out-works of religion. Our ministers attending but one session must of course have received a very imperfect view of theology. I give myself as an instance; I never heard any lectures on doctrinal theology. About 1804 or 1805, we had extended our system of education, and required two years attendance on theology. This law was soon repealed, and we again returned to an attendance of one session. From this statement it will be evident, that where the range of the Professor's lectures extended through four, five or six years, we got but one year of that range, consequently few of our students ever heard a single word of

Extracts from
Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
5 & 6 Jan. 1825.

the doctrines of the Gospel explained; all the time they had for attending to that subject was the year and a half that they are under the Prestyttery, in going through a certain course of sermonizing. When I observed that from the Scotch professors, I had heard nothing of the doctrines of the Gospel, it might be drawn from my evidence, that they gave nothing of them; this apparent neglect is accounted for in the way I mention.

Appendix, No. 24.

Further Examination of the Rev. Henry Cooke; Thursday, 24th November, 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
24 November 1825.

STATE your situation in the Presbyterian Church?—Minister of Killileagh, in the county of Down. My former office of Moderator of the General Synod of Ulster, was only annual.

How long have you been a Presbyterian minister?—I have been ordained since 1808.

Where were you educated for the ministry?—In Glasgow.

In what part of Ireland have you resided since you have been in the ministry?—Chiefly in Antrim and Down.

In the neighbourhood of Belfast?—Yes.

Have you resided much in the town of Belfast?—A good deal.

Have you considered, with interest, the state of the Belfast Institution, from time to time?—I have paid considerable attention to it, from time to time.

Were you a party, in any way, to its formation, originally?—Only in approving of it at the time.

Will you be so good as to state, which you conceive to be the primary object of the Institution, the education of the laity, or that of the Presbyterian clergy?—I understood the primary object of the school department to be the education of the laity about Belfast, and the object of the philosophical or college department to be almost entirely for the candidates for the Presbyterian ministry.

Do you think the collegiate department is principally conversant about the education of persons intended for the Presbyterian ministry?—I have always thought so.

In point of fact, is there an actual majority of those attending the collegiate classes intended for the Presbyterian ministry?—I believe the great majority intend to be Presbyterian ministers.

Which do you consider the more important character of the Institution, the dispensing a more liberal system of education for the laity, or its more peculiar character of preparing candidates for the ministry?—The collegiate part I consider the most important, as it respects the preparation of candidates for the ministry; in the other view, I do not conceive it differs from other extensive schools or academies, except in the number of its scholars.

Before the North of Ireland had an opportunity of sending candidates for the ministry to Belfast, where did they receive their education?—Generally in Glasgow; a few in Edinburgh; and I have known one educated in St. Andrew's, and some few in Dublin. A considerable number of years ago, some of our ministers were educated in Ireland.

By education, you mean collegiate education?—Yes; there was at one time a philosophical school in Antrim; at another time in Killileagh, and in later years at Strabane. I believe some of the present members of the Synod were in part educated there.

Since the establishment of the Belfast Institution, are we to understand that any considerable portion of the candidates for the ministry have been educated in Glasgow, or the other places mentioned?—Not many.

Do you conceive there are any candidates at Glasgow intended for the Presbyterian ministry in Ireland?—Yes, I think there are some; I have always known some go there, even since the establishment of a place of education in Ireland.

What should you suppose was the inducing motive of those individuals to prefer Glasgow? I think some might go on account of the scholarships or the bursarships; of these, some are generally appropriated to Irishmen, and some students might go with a view to obtain them. I believe some of the others have gone in consequence of some objections to the Belfast Institution, on account of the religious principles of some of its professors or teachers.

Referring to your own experience at Glasgow, we should wish to know your opinion, as to which system of education has the best moral effect upon the conduct of the young men, that at Glasgow, or that at Belfast?—As to the mere system of education, I do not know any practical difference.

We speak of the moral conduct of the young men when resident at Glasgow, compared with what you know it to be at Belfast?—Of those whom I knew at Glasgow, and those I have known at Belfast, I do not know any striking difference; I have known ill-conducted students at both, at Glasgow and at Belfast; I have also known students, and that the great majority, of the most exemplary character at both places.

Which situation do you conceive most favourable to discipline?—I think education in Ireland is greatly preferable to education abroad, on account of the young men being nearer the eye of their spiritual guardians. Scotland, I consider, most favourable to discipline for Scotch students; Ireland for Irish students.

Do those guardians really exercise considerable practical superintendence over the conduct of the young men?—I have no question of it; I do so myself as far as is in my power; others, others, as they have opportunity, do the same. By superintendence, I chiefly mean what arises from intercourse.

307

Were there any persons who exercised any analogous superintendence at Glasgow over the conduct of the Irish students?—Certainly, none but the Professors themselves. It was but seldom an Irish student could form any other valuable acquaintance.

Did the Professors, to any considerable extent, exercise such an influence?—The students at Glasgow, lodging not in the University, according to the custom here, or in England, the Professors had very little opportunity of exercising any general superintendence. If any complaint came before the Faculty, they could and did exercise very strict discipline; but still there were no persons who could influence the conduct of students in the same manner as their own relatives or ministers. The real difference, in my mind, between Belfast and Glasgow is, that to our students the one is at home, the other in a strange country. Were it not for that circumstance, I should prefer Glasgow, as the Institution at Belfast is at present circumstanced; indeed, as it is at present, I should, with all its inconveniences, prefer Glasgow.

Will you state your motives for preferring Glasgow?—There are some of those who exercise considerable influence over the Belfast Institution, of whose religious opinions and practical piety I do not entertain a favourable opinion. These persons become prominent, while better men keep in the back ground. The strain of public preaching is also in Glasgow almost universally evangelical; so is the tone of public conversation. Preaching and conversation of another character hold a public and eminent station in Belfast. Hence I apprehend, ultimately, a dangerous influence and injurious effect, as the Belfast Institution is at present constituted. Were the Institution thoroughly reformed, my scruples concerning education for the ministry in Belfast would be removed.

Do you conceive, that the Irish students, whom you recollect at Glasgow as a class, made religion more their business than the Irish students now at Belfast do?—I am of opinion, there has been since I first knew Glasgow, and also since I first knew Belfast, a great improvement in students, clergy and laity.

In both places?—Yes; I have had an opportunity of knowing Glasgow better than perhaps any minister of our Synod, for I studied in Glasgow since I became a minister; and during the time of my attendance in 1816, I found that the Irish students were a very superior class to what they were from 1802 to 1806, the first period of my attendance. There were, I think, twelve Irish students of theology, with whom I was acquainted in 1816; they were, without exception, most correct and pious. Such Irish students of philosophy as I knew were equally praiseworthy.

Do you think a sense of the importance of religion is upon the advance in Glasgow?—Yes.

In the University or the city?—Both among the inhabitants of the city and the students of the University.

Are we to understand, that an equal sense of the importance of religion prevails in the Belfast Institution?—I have seen a great improvement within a few years past. Shortly after its commencement, some students were behaving very badly; the Presbytery of Dromore, to which one of them belonged, instituted an inquiry, and exercised a severe, but salutary act of discipline. This had its effect, as many of the students attended the investigation; but independent of any thing of this kind, I conceive the cause of religion advanced among the students of Belfast as it is among the students of Glasgow and Dublin, and other Universities. I do believe, for example, that it might be proved to a demonstration by facts, that the present spirit of religion that has gone out through Ireland, might be traced to the religious zeal lately sprung up amongst the students of Dublin.

We are to understand, that the same improvement marks the character of the people of Belfast, as well as of the persons attending the Institution?—I have no question, there is an improvement in many of the people as well as in the students.

We should be glad to know your opinion, whether religion prevails in the greatest degree in Belfast or in Glasgow?—I think there are in Belfast many as sincere and pious Christians as are to be found in any other place. But persons of a different description assume in it a more prominent part; so do religious opinions of which I cannot approve. I have not known such persons or opinions in Glasgow. I am inclined therefore, and only upon this ground, to say, that religion prevails in the greatest degree in Glasgow. Besides residing in Glasgow in 1816, I have since paid several visits of some weeks continuance; I conceive I am therefore enabled to make the comparison.

Do you think that that results, in any important degree, from the ministry of Dr. Chalmers?—He has, no doubt, been a powerful instrument in the hand of Providence; but he found a people predisposed to attend to him: I think the principal effect to be ascribed to him personally is, that he has excited attention to subjects of public interest, and perhaps stimulated ministerial diligence; but the general habits of the people in attention to the duties of religion was very remarkable before the ministry of Dr. Chalmers: I believe, however, he benefited the students, by occasional plain denunciations of the vanity of scholastic philosophy, when put in competition with the simplicity of the Gospel. He was much attended to by the students.

Do you conceive there are at present any preachers in Glasgow who avow and inculcate Arian principles?—I never knew of any.

Never; at any time?—No.

Do you believe there is at present any preacher at Glasgow, who, by his silence upon certain points of Christianity, would leave you as little dubious as by the direct inculcation of his opinions, that he maintained Arian principles?—I have reason to suspect there is one

Examination of Rev.Henry Cooke,
24 November 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
24 November 1825.

such in Glasgow; but I should not say whether Arian or Socinian; I am rather inclined to suspect Socinian; but as to any overt act or declaration, I never knew any on the part of any preacher now in Glasgow. There was a Socinian preacher there some years ago, but I think he has removed from it. I consider Glasgow unpropitious for the growth of either Arianism or Socinianism.

Do you know any preacher at Belfast, who, by what you term an overt act, leaves it not dubious that he is an Arian?—Yes.

Do you know of any who inculcate Arian sentiments?—Yes.

How many?—At least three in the town.

Do you know others at Belfast, who, by their silence on certain points, create a conviction in your mind that they are Arians?—I do not.

Do you believe there is any Socinian preacher at Belfast as contra-distinguished from an Arian?—No.

What is your opinion as to the degree of popularity that attaches to the preaching of the individual in Glasgow who, you say, observes a silence upon certain points of Christianity?—He is not attended with any considerable degree of popularity, except among a few of what they are pleased to call a philosophical turn of mind.

Are the Arian preachers of Belfast attended by any considerable congregations?—Yes; I should think so.

Do you think their peculiar sentiments are popular in their respective congregations?—With some of their hearers they are not popular; with others I think they are.

Do you think those persons who attend the preaching of Arian ministers differ or agree with them?—I think some differ from them; some agree with them.

Do you think that all those who agree with them are aware that they are Arians?—They must be aware of the opinions they hold, but they may not know the ecclesiastical name of them; but when they approve of the books published or written by their ministers, which are acknowledged to be Arian, I take for granted they are aware that they themselves are Arians.

Do you think there are any members of their congregation who have become Arians by means of their preaching, but would be shocked at making the discovery?—I think any man who has unthinkingly been led into Arianism, when he discovers how opposite Arianism is to the spirit of the Gospel, must be shocked at the discovery of his former blindness and danger.

Are we to understand there is no avowed Arian minister in Glasgow?—Not that I know of, or with the exception mentioned, ever heard of; if there be any, their character must be very obscure.

Is there any considerable number of avowed Arians in Glasgow?—There may be some; but I do not know any thing of them. I never heard Arians mentioned as a prominent or even existing party; I knew of some Socinians who at one time had a preacher there; I believe they have no preacher now.

Is there a considerable number of avowed Arians in Belfast?—A very considerable number.

Is there any considerable number of the Managers of the Belfast Institution who are Arians?—I should think there is generally a considerable number of the Managers who are Arians; the Managers are, however, a moveable body, and there may be more at some times than at others.

Can you form any opinion, whether in this year or the last, there was an actual majority of Arians?—I have not seen the list; if I saw the list I could form a judgment.

[A list of the existing Managers of the Belfast Institution was handed to the witness.]

Is it your opinion that an actual majority of the Managers there stated are Arians, or otherwise?—Of the list of the Managers, I consider the majority are Arians.

Now, as to the Visitors, not meaning to include the official Visitors, but confining the question to the elected Visitors?—I should think the majority are Arians there too; but I am not so certain about the Visitors as the Managers; there are some in both lists whose religious opinions I do not know, and those I calculate on the side of those that are not Arians. I count none Arians, but those who either attend Arian ministers, or are by public fame esteemed as Arians.

Are we to understand that the individuals, whom in your answer you assume to be Arians, would themselves avow that they entertain Arian principles, or would they consider it rather as an imputation?—I believe a considerable number would avow it very distinctly; others by implication; others, perhaps have not minutely studied religious distinctions; others might disclaim it.

Are there any of them, whom in your own mind you consider Arians, who would disclaim it?—I think there may be some, whom I believe and know to be Arians, who would disclaim it; I do not mean by this to impeach their honesty, but consider it would arise from not having studied what Arianism really is.

Is there any particular manner in which you can account for Arians constituting the majority of the Managers?—I cannot pretend distinctly to account for it; but I believe, generally speaking, the members of Arian congregations may be richer, and more anxious for office. If richer, they have more influence. The influential party in the Institution I consider decidedly Arian.

Is there any way in which you can account for wealth inducing a tendency to Arian principles?—There is one reason that has appeared to me to operate very extensively in the North of Ireland. The Arian ministers have had generally small congregations; the consequence is,

309
 Examination of
 Rev.
 Henry Cooke,
 24 November 1825.

is, that they have had time to teach schools or academies, and have thus educated the sons of the greater part of the Presbyterian gentry; and here I see the commencing tendency to Arianism, in their early associations and habits. Six or seven years intimacy with an Arian master must produce its effect. Evangelical ministers, on the contrary, have generally had large congregations, and consequently no time for schools or academies; I therefore attribute the tendency to Arianism among the rich, chiefly to early association with Arian teachers, with whom they have been brought into contact; I also attribute it, in some degree, to the shameful neglect of evangelical education, which has been too common in universities where the rich are educated. In other cases, I attribute it to the influence of fashion, when Arianism has already been found the religion of a part of the richer class of society. I also attribute it to the relaxation of discipline in most Arian congregations, which renders them more acceptable to mere men of the world.

Is it your opinion generally, that the Anti-arian view of Christianity is less favourable to a relaxed state of moral conduct than the Arian?—So far as church discipline is concerned; I conceive in the one kind of congregations they have discipline, and in the other, I do not know of any discipline at all. I believe, the common principle of Arian congregations is to admit to communion all who choose to come.

Is it, that the profession of Arianism imposes less inconvenient restraint upon the usages of the world?—In my opinion the discipline of the Arian churches generally imposes less restraint. I think the profession of Arianism most acceptable to men of the world.

That in fact, a mere man of the world finds it more convenient to be an Arian than he would to be a Calvinist?—That is my opinion, and I must also declare, that I consider the Anti-arian principles more favourable to piety and strictness of living.

Will you state the provision that is made in the Belfast Institution, for the religious instruction of the candidates for the ministry?—So far as the general Synod of Ulster is concerned, it is entirely in the hands of Dr. Hanna, who is Professor of Theology and Church History, on the part of the Synod of Ulster.

He is quite the reverse of an Arian?—Yes, certainly.

So far as the Seceding Synod is concerned, what is the fact?—The same office is performed by Dr. Edgar, who is, I should suppose, of similar sentiments.

Is the Presbytery of Antrim at all represented by any professor or any other officer in the Institution?—Not officially.

Is it in any other manner?—By having three of their members in the Institution.

Are they Managers, Visitors or Professors, or how otherwise?—Several persons belonging to the Antrim Presbytery, are Managers and Visitors; the three I first mentioned are Professors.

Do you mean, that there are three Professors strictly, that are members of the Presbytery of Antrim?—Two are called Professors, and one is called a Lecturer on Elocution. For my part, I do not know the difference in point of duty or of influence upon the students.

Are you aware, that one of the Masters, who is also an Arian, is a member of the Synod of Ulster?—Yes; I am fully aware that he is neither Arminian nor Calvinist. His particular sentiments I do not pretend to be able accurately to define. He is generally called an Arian.

Is the Synod of Munster in any way represented in the Belfast Institution?—No; there is a member of the Belfast Institution, who was a member of the Synod of Munster, but he is not now; he is a member of the Presbytery of Antrim, and cannot, I suppose belong to them both; at least not in any way of discipline, according to my views of the subject.

Are we right in coming to the conclusion, that the two bodies of the Presbyterian Church, who are understood more generally to entertain Arian sentiments, are not represented by professorships of theology in the Institution, but that the two bodies who are the most Calvinistic, are so represented?—Yes; the two that are most Calvinistic have theological representatives; but they are not an original part of the Institution, nor are they subject to the Managers or Visitors, nor do they derive any emolument from it.

Do they teach all that is taught of religion in it?—All that is taught officially. And the two bodies who are understood to be Arian, have no such opportunities.

The Presbytery of Antrim is asserted by one of their own members, to be all Arian?—The Synod of Munster is not universally Arian. They have no Professors of Theology in the Institution. I believe they have not more than two or three students for the ministry.

What is your opinion, as to the practical effects of the working of this system. Do you think that any considerable number of Arian ministers, have proceeded from the Belfast Institution hitherto?—Not any considerable number. The Institution was at first evangelical, in its literary establishment. Arianism to a considerable amount is a late addition. Besides, since the time that Arianism has been advancing among the Professors of the Institution, public attention has been stirred up successfully to oppose it. But I have good reason to believe, that if public attention had not been directed to it, the case would have been very different, and that Arianism would have been rapidly though silently making progress among the students.

We understand that the members of the Seceding Synod are universally Calvinists?—I believe, they are.

Then there is no danger of seeing an Arian Professor of Theology appointed by them?—I am sure there is not, while they remain as they are. But churches once as evangelical have fallen, for example, Geneva.

We have understood there is not any similar unanimity of sentiment upon the part of the Synod of Ulster?—There is not exactly the same unanimity.

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
24 November 1825.

Do you think there is any risk of an Arian Professor of Theology, being appointed by them to the professorship?—So long as the support of the Professor depends upon public contribution, I think there is little danger. Were there an established fund provided for his support, I am not so certain that an Arian, or at least, some one of very dubious religious sentiments, might not be appointed.

Are we to understand, that it is your opinion, that so long as the stipend of the Professor of Theology proceeds from the private and voluntary contributions of the members of the Synod, that he is likely to continue a Calvinist, but that if by any means the stipend should be provided for him aliunde, he might be an Arian?—In consequence of the present state of the Institution, I should think it not only possible but probable, that after the provision of an established fund, our Theological Professor might be an Arian.

Will you explain the causes of that opinion?—I judge partly from experience. The Synod have hitherto acted so when persons have been chosen to an office, where the stipend is provided by Government. I judge partly from the following reasoning. If the Belfast Institution remain the place of education for our ministers, in the course of a few years our churches will be filled with ministers educated there. Professors must naturally acquire a great influence over their students. If then a large proportion of the Professors be, as at present, Arians, there will be a great Arian influence raised up to introduce a Professor favourable to their own views, or so neutral as to do worse than nothing.

Can you account for how it might come to pass, that the stipend proceeding from other sources than voluntary contribution, should be attended with that effect?—It would then become an object worth being contended for, and the introduction of an Arian Professor would be supported by all the influence and power I have already described. He would be totally independent of popularity for his support. But so long as the support depends upon ministers or people, the Professor must be acceptable to the majority. There is at present a strong Arian party in the Synod. From the establishment of a seminary, at least partly Arian, they will acquire a great accession of power. They would finally, in my mind, become irresistible. Step after step, they have advanced in the Institution, and the check of dependence upon the people, once removed, they would finally obtain the seat of Theology. Further, I judge from the experience of other churches. The academy of Geneva introduced one Arian after another, till at last they became Arian or Socinian altogether. The same has occurred in other places, to the debasement or ruin of evangelical truth.

Do you conceive that the persons professing Arian principles, act together as a party?—Yes, while the others are rather divided among themselves, or feel not the same anxiety to promote their own views.

Do you mean, that they are anxious to advance their own peculiar tenets?—Yes; there are two ways in which this is done. The one is by direct teaching, which is only practised by a few. The other is by inculcating the principle, that young preachers ought to be cautious of making up their minds upon important doctrines, and confine themselves to undisputed and merely practical topics. This leads them to preach without declaring a word of the Gospel, and finally prepares them to admit any system or no system. Now, in my mind, no man ought to preach the Gospel, till he has well thought what the Gospel is. By inculcating the contrary course, the cause of Arianism is advanced, and in this way, the procedure of the Arians is directed with much diligence and some success.

Do you consider there is any considerable esprit du corps among those entertaining Arian principles?—Yes.

That they wish to disseminate their own principles?—Yes; of which we have had specimens in the publication and dissemination of the sermons of Dr. Price and Dr. Bruce, as well as in taking the most public occasions, such as ordinations, to advocate their own peculiarities, and impugn others.

Are we to collect, that you would consider it an undesirable arrangement that the two Professors of Theology should be paid equally in amount as the other Professors, and from the same funds as the other Professors?—I do not take upon me to speak for the Seceders; but as an individual member of the Synod of Ulster, I must say, that until we are secured from the influence of a new and increasing Arian power, lately raised up in the Belfast Institution, I should think it better that the Professor of Theology should depend upon the Synod for support, than upon any other source. But security against this power and influence, once obtained, I should consider it right that he should be paid as the other Professors, by the Government.

Are you of opinion, that there is a great majority of the members of the Synod of Ulster who are Anti-arian in their principles?—Yes.

Can you form any definite opinion as to the proportions?—Out of about two hundred members in the Synod, there are thirty-four or thirty-five commonly called Arians, and I think in that thirty-five there are two Socinians. I consider this statement near the truth. There may be some others neutral, or very little zealous for their opinions.

Then it would follow that the Anti-arians are five to one?—Thereabouts.

And there are no Arians in the Seceding Synod?—I do not think there are any.

Do you think that the activity which you attribute to those who constitute a fifth would be likely to decide the election in favour of a candidate of their opinion?—I think, in some time, it would, aided by the accumulating influence of the college at which ministers were educated, or the want of zeal in those of evangelical sentiments. I have seen a uniform increase of Arianism in every election to the professorships of the Institution. I believe the Professors, who hold evangelical sentiments, have already contributed, by their silence or their approbation, to the election of an Arian to a professorship most important to theological students. I have already stated my view of the accumulating influence, which,

as

311
Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
24 November 1825.

as a college, they must acquire over the future proceedings of the Synod of Ulster; and for these and other reasons, I do entertain a decided conviction, that if the Institution continue in its present state, the Synod of Ulster may, in some time, expect an Arian Professor of Theology.

How would you propose to remedy that?—By watching over the present state of the Institution, so as to counteract its Arian tendency; by providing a corrective plan for its future condition, especially by a minute inquiry into the religious sentiments of candidates for the chairs, and by requiring a subscription to an acknowledged formula of faith. I think there is real practical utility in subscription, though not in all cases. Besides, I think common honesty requires that every man should declare his religious sentiments.

We understand that the members of the Seceding Synod do subscribe universally to the Westminster Confession of Faith?—They do.

Is any objection entertained on their part to the abstract principle of subscription?—I do not conceive there is; I never heard of any.

Do you not think that the principle of subscription would be objected to by many members of the Synod of Ulster, who are really Anti-arian in their principles?—I believe some would consider it as insufficient for the end proposed; none could object to the principle, for subscription to some form of doctrine is the recognised law of the Synod; but some who are not Arian, would object to some of the phraseology in the Westminster Confession of Faith; but a subscription to an acknowledged confession of faith would not, I conceive, be objected to by any.

All the Arians would object to the Westminster Confession?—Yes, they could not subscribe it.

What further portion of the Synod of Ulster would object to the signing that confession?—I think near a half of the other part might object to subscribing it absolutely; but I do not conceive, that almost any of them would object to a form that would virtually embrace all its doctrines.

Can you suggest any mitigated form of subscription, that you conceive might attain the object and insure the orthodoxy of the subscriber, without leading to the objection stated?—I think it might be done; I believe the subscription to the doctrine of the divinity and vicarious atonement of Christ; of justification by faith in him; of original sin; of the divinity and sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit, with the doctrines consequent upon these; together with the sufficiency of the Scriptures for our rule of faith and life, might be satisfactory to the evangelical ministers of the Synod.

Are you prepared to suggest any form of test that you think would answer the end, and not be objected to?—The question of a uniform test is under the consideration of the Synod, and will be discussed at the next meeting; I have not particularly turned my attention to it, but I am convinced a great number of our ministers would be favourable to something of this kind. I have often heard those who object absolutely to signing the Westminster Confession, approve of a formula such as I have mentioned.

They conceive, that the Westminster Confession goes too much into detail?—Yes.

And they would prefer, that there should be some test sufficient to ascertain that the subscriber was evangelical, though he might not be prepared to go the whole length of the Westminster Confession?—I know there are some, decidedly Calvinists, who have a low opinion of the advantages of subscription; others have a high opinion of it, and prefer, to any other form, the Westminster Confession. I believe the majority would be favourable to a subscription that did not go all the length of the Westminster Confession, in particular details, but should be at the same time strictly evangelical.

Do you think that those individuals who have a low opinion of the advantage of subscription, would resist it as a principle, if proposed in the mitigated form you have suggested?—No; the present law of the Synod, finally recognised in June last, is subscription; the only question is as to the form; there might be, I think, a mitigated form that would be generally acceptable to all the evangelical ministers.

Do you allude to any particular articles of the Confession of Faith?—There is one article that the greater number object to, the article in the 23d chapter, about the power of the civil magistrate in ecclesiastical matters.

Is it your opinion, that as many as half a dozen Arian ministers have proceeded out of the Belfast Institution?—There are so very few of the students whom I have intimately known, that I am not able exactly to calculate. If by ministers be meant preachers, I think there have gone from it more than half a dozen; if ordained ministers are meant, I recollect four whom I believe to be Arian or Socinian, and who were in whole or in part educated in the Institution.

Which Synod do they belong to?—As students they all did belong to the General Synod; one was a minister in it, but has been removed elsewhere; the others are also from under the jurisdiction of the Synod.

Are they ordained ministers?—I believe so.

Can you state in what place the decided majority of the Arian ministers of the Presbyterian church in Ireland received their own education; the question includes the Presbytery of Antrim and Munster?—There are, I believe, in those two last mentioned bodies, fifteen congregations and nineteen ministers; of these ministers, I think, not more than seventeen are reported to be Arians. I should suppose the majority of these and the other Arian ministers received their philosophical education in Scotland, probably at Glasgow. But as to theological education, there was great imperfection at Glasgow during the latter years of the late Professor. He was a very talented man, but infirm and nearly inaudible; his course was also very tedious, and Irish students, who attended theology but one year, could receive

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
24 November 1825.

little benefit. The theological education of Irish students was more properly received in their respective presbyteries than in Glasgow. I feel it right to state, that theology is at present most efficiently taught in Glasgow; there is a course of study appointed by the presbyteries for the purpose of teaching theology.

State it?—The students, on leaving college, or having one year studied theology, are put upon a course of examinations. They have to give a number of discourses, and hear the criticisms of the Presbytery; their religious opinions are thus considerably influenced. From Presbyteries of an Arian character, Arian preachers more generally proceed. I account for it partly in this way, but the rule is not universal.

Are we to understand you as considering, that the theological courses at Glasgow have at all times been Anti-arian in their tendency?—No; it is well known they were not. Dr. Simson was ejected from the University of Glasgow for teaching Arianism.

At what time?—The first process against Professor Simson commenced in 1714, and was continued through 1715 and 1716, and terminated in an injunction not to teach certain Arminian doctrines with which he had been charged, but which, on investigation, turned out to be Pelagian. The second process commenced in 1726, and continued through 1727, 1728, and 1729, and terminated in his suspension from the ministerial office, and from his professorship, on account of certain Arian doctrines which he had avowed and taught in the university.

[See Brown's Church History, and the Act, Declaration, and Testimony of the Secession Church, published at Perth, 1736.]

Speaking of the time when you were at Glasgow, is it your opinion that the theological courses then delivered were as decidedly Anti-arian as those now delivered at Belfast?—The late Dr. Findlay was not an Arian, but I cannot speak of his whole course. The course of theology I heard from him during two successive years at Glasgow, was not upon doctrinal subjects. The entire course required, I believe, eight years; the course at Belfast is concluded in two years, and comprizes a statement of Pelagianism, Arianism, Socinianism, and Calvinism. The Professor is a moderate Calvinist.

Do you not believe that the University of Glasgow produces more Arians in proportion to the number of divinity students, than the Belfast Institution does at present?—I believe there was a time when all the Universities in the three kingdoms educated fewer evangelical ministers than they do now, consequently more Arians, or something of that kind. I believe the students of Glasgow have improved in evangelical principles, in common with others. I knew, I think, twelve Irish theological students at Glasgow in 1816; they were every one evangelical. I never knew the Belfast Institution so free of anti-evangelical students as at this time. When we make any comparison, we must take equal times. At the time mentioned, I did not know any Scotch theological student suspected of Arianism. Formerly I could not have given this account of Glasgow, either with regard to Irish or Scotch students.

[A list was shewn to the witness, containing the names of all the students, now settled ministers, and those who are licensed preachers, who received their education in the Belfast Institution, and the witness was requested to say, whether he believed any of them to be Arians.]

[Also a second paper was exhibited to the witness, containing the names of the licentiates.]

I conceive, in the list of ministers that are settled, and who have received the whole or part of their education in the Institution, and whom I know so as to be able to speak of their opinions, there are four Arians.

There are many whom you do not know?—A considerable number of whom I know but little, some of whose religious sentiments I cannot form a distinct opinion.

As to the other list?—A number of those I do not know at all, but so far as I am acquainted with them, I would say, that two of the licentiates I distinctly believe to be Arian, or something of that kind, and four of the unlicensed students I believe to be so too. I feel it right to add, that I do not think there are many more of this description.

What is the difference between an ordained minister and a licentiate?—Those who are licensed are merely admitted to preach, and not to administer Baptism, or the Lord's Supper; an ordained minister has a parish, and administers those ordinances.

Would it form a part of the arrangement for the mitigated test which you contemplate, that if adopted, it should be taken by the present members of the Synod, or only by future members?—There could be no reasonable objection to the present members signing it who had not given any test; but if they voted it in Synod, it would be equal to signing.

What would be the practical result with the Arian members of the Synod?—They would leave the Synod, if the test were Anti-arian.

Where would they go?—They would probably join the Presbytery of Antrim.

Do you think they would form a Synod?—They might take what name they pleased.

What name do you think they would take?—I really cannot say. They would not, I think, call themselves Arian. Probably they would call themselves Non-Subscribers.

Do you think it would have the effect of increasing their power, to have them united and avowed as Arian, in the face of the world?—Yes, I think it would.

Do you think it would be a more or less desirable state of things than that which now exists?—I think more desirable. I think the state that exists at present is a very bad one; but many members of Synod, who have more practical wisdom than I can pretend to have, do not concur with me.

Do

3/3
Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
24 November 1825

Do you think Arianism would be less dangerous, if avowed?—I do; because public attention would then be called to it, and men would not be led by the common name of Presbyterianism, but would be led to examine the doctrines of the Gospel. Arianism prospers for want of this examination; but those who are opposed to a separation from their Arian brethren argue thus:—"If a number of ministers professing Arianism were conjoined in a separate establishment, it would be impossible that anybody but Arians could get into their congregations; when vacant, they would put in ministers of their own sentiments. At present the attention of the public has been turned to the doctrine of Arianism, and the effect has been, that the congregations of Arian ministers, when vacant, have generally chosen evangelical preachers; but if a separation were effected, you close the door against the introduction of any thing but Arianism."

Does it not follow from that argument, that the separation would do mischief?—Yes; but I do not believe the justness of the argument or conclusion.

Be so good as to state your own view of the subject?—My own view is, that we ought never to do evil that good may come; and as I conceive it to be an evil to be in the union with persons who teach erroneous doctrines, we ought to get out of it by the legitimate procedure of our church. Besides, I think the congregations, when vacant, would not submit universally to receive Arian ministers, but would come over to the Synod.

What is the practical evil that results from the connection?—One practical evil is, that young men are sometimes brought from Arian Presbyteries into congregations that are not so, by means of strong recommendations to influential members, and having only four Sundays to preach, the people can know nothing, or very little, about their doctrines. They are chosen upon the strength of these recommendations, are then ordained by the Presbytery, and once settled, make the people unhappy all their days by teaching doctrines they do not relish, or leaving out what they approve. Another evil is, that in case of a minister preaching erroneous doctrine, it renders his removal impossible. There is no common standard to try him by.

Do you feel it objectionable, as a matter of conscience, that there should be spiritual communion, between those who are Arians and those who are not?—I do; but I did not always see it in the same serious light.

Does not that necessarily result from the present state of things?—Yes; and I think we are bound to correct it as far as we can. I seek the reformation of the church of which I am a member.

Is there spiritual communion between the members of the Seceding Synod and the members of the Synod of Ulster?—No; except that some few of them preach occasionally in each other pulpits. There is no ecclesiastical connexion.

Would it be considered wrong, that they should communicate at each others communion tables?—I think upon the part of some strict Seceders it would. I think others would not object to communicate with some of our ministers. Several Seceders are at present members of my congregation.

Do you think there is any considerable number of the Seceders, who would feel any objection to such members of the Synod of Ulster, as they know to be rigid Calvinists, communicating with them?—I think they would not object to the principle, but there are some peculiarities of discipline that might interfere. But I believe the union of a considerable part of the Seceders, with a considerable part of the Synod of Ulster, in church communion, would not be impossible. Some Seceders would object against being called rigid Calvinists; why, I cannot tell.

It seems scarcely necessary to ask, whether you consider it of great importance in the formation of the clerical character, that the Professors of Theology should be Orthodox?—I do.

Do you consider it of vital importance?—Yes.

Do you consider it a matter of very great importance, that the other Professors of the Belfast Institution should be Orthodox?—I do.

Do you think it a matter of more importance, that some should be Orthodox than others?—The importance would principally apply to those that taught the departments more immediately clerical; the moral contact into which they came with the students, and the influence they were likely to have upon them in their future life.

Will you specify those you consider most important?—Moral Philosophy, Greek, Hebrew, Theology and Church History.

Should you consider it necessary, that those three should be Orthodox?—I consider they should all be Orthodox, but these in a more particular manner.

Should you deem it of any great importance, whether the Professor of Chemistry, or the Professor of Natural Philosophy, were an Arian?—If he was only an Arian in principle, and his religious opinions unknown to the students, I should not consider it of much consequence, as his subject in lecturing could not lead him to inculcate peculiar religious opinions; but if his sentiments were openly avowed, and if he in any form, was accustomed to inculcate them, I should then consider it of consequence.

In what way do you mean inculcating?—Through the pulpit or the press, under the eye of the students; if he merely held privately a set of opinions, I should think it a matter of very little importance. It is his public character I consider of chief importance.

In what manner do you conceive the proposition would be received in the Belfast Institution, to adopt any regulations that would necessarily insure the Orthodoxy of all the Professors?—My own opinion is, the Proprietors would scarcely receive it; the Managers and Visitors might.

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
24 November 1825.

If your opinion could decide the matter, that is, assuming that all parties would listen to your advice, what regulation would you propose, to insure the Orthodoxy of any or which of the Professors?—My own opinion would be in favour of subscription to an acknowledged formula of faith; and a representative body of the Synod, giving an official opinion to electors respecting the eligibility of the candidates; or I would entrust the matter altogether to a fair proportion of Orthodox electors, added to the Boards of Managers and Visitors. Those persons I should select partly by their official situations, partly by the annual appointment of the religious bodies most vitally concerned. I should wish to secure the Orthodoxy of all the professors whom our students were bound to attend, but more especially those of Morals, Greek, Hebrew, and Theology.

Describe the persons you allude to, who might become electors from official situations, for annual appointment?—First some of the dignitaries in the church, and perhaps some of the judges.

Are we to collect it as your opinion, that that would have the practical effect of tending to exclude Arians?—In some degree; but I chiefly calculate upon a number of electors annually chosen by the Synod of the Seceders, and the Synod of Ulster.

In point of fact, does not one of the Professors of Theology sign the Westminster Confession, and the other not?—Both do, in fact.

Explain how that is?—Some of our Presbyteries retain subscription to the Westminster Confession; and our present Professor of Theology belongs to a Presbytery that requires it.

But by possibility, the Professor of Theology, on the part of the Synod of Ulster, might be a person refusing to sign the text?—Yes, to sign the Westminster Confession; but if a Minister of the Synod, he must sign some declaration.

The other could not refuse to sign the Westminster Confession?—No.

You have intimated an opinion in a former answer, that having a number of the dignitaries of the Established Church among the voters, would have a tendency to exclude persons of Arian principles?—Yes; for signing the Thirty-nine Articles, they cannot be Arians.

Are you aware, whether it is a fact, that the two Professors, by whom Arian principles are avowed, came recommended to the Institution by dignitaries of the Established Church, and also by Government. You will observe, that the question does not mean to imply, in the remotest degree, that either of those authorities knew what were the opinions of the persons so recommended, but is meant to illustrate the possibility of the plan you suggest failing from the want of opportunities of knowledge on the part of those authorities?—I have heard of their being so recommended, which probably proceeded from ignorance or inattention, or considering it a mere literary recommendation, without any reference to religious opinion. It is also a difficult thing to refuse a recommendation to any person who applies; but the case would be very different in an election where religion was contemplated; the recommendations given were purely upon their literary standing, having no reference to religion, more or less; the matter would be different, if a vote were publicly given, as an act for which the public would take them to account.

The two gentlemen were Presbyterians?—Yes; I have heard the fact.

Would you propose, that all the Professors should sign the mitigated test you alluded to before?—Yes, most certainly; I should for many reasons wish that all the Professors should sign some religious formula.

Do you think that the test you are contemplating as expedient for the signature of the Professors, would be such as would be objected to by any portion of the Clergy of the Established Church, and if so, describe the portion that would object to it?—Not by any except those who are said to hold Arian or Socinian sentiments; I conceive neither Orthodox nor Evangelical Ministers, as they are technically called, would object to it. It might even be extracted from the Thirty-nine Articles.

Was not the Belfast Institution originally founded upon the principle of being open to all religious persuasions?—Yes; it was avowedly so.

Do you conceive it could be reconciled to that principle, to introduce such a test as you have suggested?—I think not in words, but in the spirit in which the Synod of Ulster received it.

Then we are to collect, that you think the original principle requires alteration?—I think the original principle as now understood and acted upon was excessively bad, and was not understood by the Synod of Ulster, as practice has explained it, or they would not have become connected with the Institution. For myself and many others, I can say, we acted rashly and inconsiderately. Had we contemplated the present state of the Institution, we should have opposed all connection with it from the first.

Pray explain that a little more fully?—If we had contemplated the introduction of the present number of Arians into it, we would not have connected ourselves with it; instead of coming forward with the broad proposition that it was open to all, which excited no suspicion, as we naturally expected our approbation would always be an object in elections; if they had come forward with the narrower proposition that it meant, that probably or actually in the progress of a few years, the chairs of it should be occupied by three or four Arian Professors or Teachers, without any limit to a still further increase. If that gloss upon the test had been given, the majority of the Synod would have had no more connection with it than with the Society De Propaganda.

Do you conceive, that the majority of the Proprietors of the Institution, would be satisfied with an alteration at present of the original principle referred to, would they acquiesce in it?—I think the Managers and Visitors would most probably acquiesce in a modification, but

3/5

Examination of
Rev.Henry Cooke,
24 November 1825.

but I think a considerable number of the Proprietors would object. Were they all assembled probably a majority even of them might acquiesce in some modification.

Would the pecuniary subscription ever have been filled, if it had been a principle of exclusion that had been originally contemplated?—I recollect so little about the feeling at that time, that I cannot well answer. Various principles produced the subscription. One was said to be opposition to the system then adopted in the Belfast Academy; another was the principle held out, that every subscriber of 100*l.* should acquire a right to the education of one student in perpetuity; another was the local advantage of Belfast; another the diffusion and facilitating of education in Ulster. I know some who subscribed liberally, who are utterly opposed to the present growth of Arianism in the Institution, and who never expected the present Arian influence, which has so rapidly increased in it. Indeed, at the time of its foundation many of the most influential laymen in the Arian interest at Belfast, were avowed enemies to the establishment of the Institution. It was also opposed by a considerable Arian party in the Synod. There were subscribers who would not, I think, have aided it upon any principle of exclusion; others who would not have subscribed had they contemplated its present condition. Had the collegiate department of the Institution been originally proposed upon evangelical principles, I am decidedly of opinion, a sufficient sum would have been readily obtained to raise adequate buildings, and even found some professorships. The same thing I am well convinced might be effected just now, if no satisfactory arrangement can be made with the Institution.

On what principle did those more wealthy individuals oppose the formation of the Institution?—They were the enemies of the Institution, because the Principal of the Belfast Academy was opposed to it. This Academy at one time was intended to have become some kind of philosophical seminary. The Principal was understood to be opposed to the Institution, because it opposed his Academy; also on account of some of the principles of its constitution, and some of the persons most active in its management. Some of his friends joined in the same opposition, and gave no money to the Institution, until his son was elected Professor.

Did they subscribe as soon as the son was elected?—Yes, I believe pretty largely. The Academy was resigned by the Principal. The Institution then underwent a great change, by the accession of Arians of considerable local influence.

The Academy was principally supported by the Arians in Belfast?—To that point I cannot speak; but I believe, it was managed by them.

The Institution is not so much Arian as the Academy was?—They are not in similar circumstances; but I consider the Academy under its late Principal, and the Institution at present, as very much on a par as to Arian character.

We wish you to submit to us the precise form of the test, which you think would be desirable to be introduced for subscription, by the professors of the Belfast Institution?—I will prepare it.

Was it understood that the Institution was in any way to be under the peculiar control of the Synod of Ulster, as distinguished from others?—I do not think it was, further than the right of voting conceded to our Moderator. But I think it was expected, that at all times the electors would have a view to satisfy the Synod, with the persons who should be appointed as Professors. I have publicly referred to the fact, that the declaration of one of the Managers or Visitors to one of the Deputies, who had attended a negotiation between them and the Synod, was, that the Orthodox members of the Synod must feel satisfied because the Professors and Masters first appointed were all Orthodox. This declaration was considered as an earnest of its future management.

What do you think would be the practical result of allowing the election of Professors to continue exactly in the same body as at present, but to give the power of a veto both to the Synod of Ulster and to the Seceding Synod?—The exercise of a veto might be sometimes disagreeable. I should scarcely wish for so much power. I should be content with the moral influence of an official opinion on the merits of the candidates, delivered to the electors before proceeding to ballot. A veto in either of the Synods would answer the purpose; and I believe many of our ministers and elders would approve of a veto, or judge some such power necessary for their security.

Would it be justifiable to concede it to one Synod more than the other?—No.

How would it work if such an arrangement was made?—I think it would attain the end, and be highly satisfactory to the great majority of the general Synod.

Do you think any Arian could get into any chair so circumstanced?—No one would ever be proposed.

In what manner would the Synod ascertain its opinion upon the subject?—By meetings being called.

Who would assist at those meetings?—The Ministers and Elders.

Would they vote as individuals?—Yes.

For accepting or rejecting the candidate proposed?—Yes; but I am persuaded they would never have to exercise the veto, as in case of such a power being vested in the Synods, no Arian candidate would ever be proposed.

In what manner would you propose to guard against the consideration of other feelings, than those of Arianism influencing the votes?—I think in such large public bodies, it would not be possible to bring any private interest to bear against an individual. In such bodies no feeling of private friendship or dislike could influence the determination. The Synods are so widely scattered, that no local or personal interests could ever operate upon them to any considerable extent.

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
24 November 1825.

Do you think that any individual selected by the Managers would be approved of by the two Synods, provided that he was not an Arian?—Yes; provided he were not an Arian or something of the same kind.

If he was an Arian, would he be rejected by either of them?—I am sure he would; provided the professorship were influential, or the character for Arianism public, or the individual held a public office in the Arian ministry.

In what manner do you conceive such a proposition would be received by the Proprietors of the Belfast Institution?—I do not think it would be well received by some. I do not however, know many of them. Some of them would approve, others would not.

Supposing for the sake of the question, that the assistance of Government was to depend upon such an arrangement being adopted, do you think that would influence the feelings of the Proprietors?—It might certainly influence some of them in favour of it; others would remain opposed to it.

Do you think them exceedingly desirous of obtaining that assistance?—Yes, I have no doubt they are anxious for the aid of Government, and I believe many of them would make any reasonable concessions to obtain it. As an individual member of the Synod of Ulster, I wish them to obtain it upon proper and permanent principles, respectful to them, but not injurious to the Synod.

Supposing it to influence the conduct of the majority, and be carried into effect, what course would be pursued by the minority?—They would not pursue any particular course; they would be bound by the act of the majority.

Do you think they would retire from the Institution?—They would not attend probably; but they could only be offended.

What opinion do you entertain as to the proposition of conferring upon Government a veto upon the appointment of the Professors?—I think it might be useful to the Institution; but I consider it never a thing to be desired, that the Government should exercise such a power.

Do you think they would really exercise it in any reference to Arianism?—I do not know how they could judge of that; I do not see how Government could obtain the requisite information.

Do you not think they might be misled about it?—Yes, they would easily be misled, were there no local and deeply interested persons to be advised with.

Will you suggest, a little more particularly, what addition of external voters you would think expedient for attaining the end suggested in a former answer; how many dignitaries of the Established Church, and what other persons in addition?—As many of the dignitaries of the church, or persons connected with the Government, and as many members of the two Synods, as would balance the number of other electors.

You mean an equal number?—Yes.

Do you think, that the Proprietors would be more inclined to acquiesce in such an arrangement than in the two-fold veto above suggested?—I think many of the Proprietors would probably not have any great objection to a veto in Government, but a more decided one to a veto in the two Synods; and I think it probable they would be more favourable to the increase of voters; but the concession of a veto to Government, when supporting an establishment, is so reasonable, that few could object. The Synods, who furnish the students, appear to me to have an equally reasonable claim, for it is on their account the support would be given.

Do you think they would have the same decided objection, if they found it was not intended to extend it beyond the two Professors of Theology, the Professor of Moral Philosophy, and the Professor of Hebrew?—They might feel more inclined to concession, the fewer demands were made; but I consider the Professorship of Greek as important as any of these.

Is it not arranged at present, that the Greek Testament is not taught by the Professor of Greek, but by the Professor of Theology?—I do not know whether that be exactly the case; if it be so, my opinion is, that it is decidedly wrong.

Why do you think so?—To give the word of God a secondary place to any thing is a very bad principle.

Is it not giving it a primary place, by assigning it to the Professor of Theology rather than the Professor of Greek?—He can have very little time to attend to it. I should not have the same objection to a Professor's omitting to use it as to the principle of laying it aside by compact, and preferring to teach Heathen authors. This is what I mean by giving it a secondary place.

Supposing it was understood, that the reason for his not using it was to insure its being used under circumstances where no objection could arise?—That implies, that if he taught it at all, he would be suspected of teaching it badly; and I conceive it a very dangerous principle to admit that such a person is a fit teacher for candidates for the ministry.

Might it not also imply, that it was felt undesirable to extend the principle of restriction upon appointments farther than absolutely necessary?—I should consider attention to the Professorship of Greek a point where restriction was absolutely necessary; more so than that of Hebrew, because that is studied, comparatively, less than Greek in Belfast and other places; even in Dublin College itself, where there are, I believe, considerable premiums for the study; and therefore, as it is so slight a study compared with the Greek, I would think it of much less importance. It is also less referred to in modern religious discussions.

Will you describe in what manner you consider an Arian Professor, if so disposed, could direct the study of the Greek Testament, so as to favour his own opinions?—I might confine it to one point of the grammar of the Testament, that of the Greek article.

Will

317
 Examination of
 Rev.
 Henry Cooke,
 24 November 1825.

Will you mention any article or other word?—The article 'O'; it is the mere grammar of that word that constitutes a principal matter of controversy, and upon which some of the most important evidences of particular doctrines, or against them, are found to rest. If the teacher of the Greek gave his view of the Greek grammar against a particular view, or did not give it all, it would be a very objectionable thing; and the student depending on him for information would be very unqualified to meet the Arian or Socinian arguments.

Do you recollect any other word which he might make use of, except the one you have mentioned?—There are a very considerable number; the Greek word, εγενετο, whether it signifies "was" or "became," involves a very important part of the Socinian controversy.

Will you mention any other word?—The word Θεος, whether with or without the article; whether Theos signifies "divine," or 'O Theos, "God," by way of pre-eminence and distinction.

Can you specify any other word?—I think another very important word is απαγμα; on the meaning of it, and other words in the same passage, rests a large share of Arian and Socinian controversy.

Can you specify any other word?—I think, next to the article, the preposition υπερ is one of those words.

Will you explain in what way the word υπερ becomes material?—Whether it signifies the substitution of one thing for another, or whether it signifies, in the most vague manner, "upon the account of another."

Might not a Professor of Greek, under an arrangement that should exclude his teaching the New Testament, produce exactly the same effect, by the impressions which he might give of the meaning of those words, when occurring in other authors, and lay a foundation for arriving at the same conclusions, as if he taught them in the Greek Testament?—Yes, and even more so; he would be more dangerous in that way than the other, because the students would never know there was, in some cases, a radical difference in some points between the grammar of the Greek Testament and the grammar of the classics, unless he were taught it by the Professor.

Do you not think an Arian Professor of Greek, supposing him to be a conscientious man, necessarily attributes to the words which you have mentioned, the peculiar signification that favours Arianism?—Yes, or he could not be an Arian.

Does not it follow, if he is an honest man, that he must communicate those impressions to whomsoever he teaches, whether occurring in the Greek Testament or elsewhere?—I conceive it impossible he could avoid making undue impressions, and I conceive he would do it when he did not know it; if he were even trying not to do it, he might do it.

Might he not state the arguments on both sides, without stating his own opinions?—Yes, that is possible; but I think that the most dangerous mode of all. For either the student, knowing the private sentiments of the learned Professor, goes over to his opinion; or he settles the point by sceptically resting between the two opinions. I should prefer any education to a system of scepticism. The mind of a sceptic is a mere cloud, full of fantastic shapes, unaccompanied by any permanence.

Do you think, if a power was vested in the two Synods, of stating to a Court of Proprietors their objections to a candidate, before the election of a Teacher or Professor was finally agreed to, that that would afford any considerable check?—Yes, it would, in all probability, be sufficient, provided the communication were public and official.

By putting it in their power to state the reasons and grounds of their objections?—They might state them, if required. I should think it sufficient, if they merely had an official opportunity of stating, out of any number of candidates, those they considered eligible, without stating the reasons for preference or disapprobation, except so required by the electors. This idea was first suggested to me by some of the electors complaining, in the case of an election that gave some offence, that they would not have elected the candidate, had the Synod given them notice of preferring another. I believe the Managers and Visitors, if they had the power, would accede to this plan. I should be satisfied with it personally, were the right of communication legalized. I believe others would wish for a more decided influence.

Do you not think it would be a difficult matter for any one, after such a statement, to carry through the election of an officer against whom there were those objections?—I do not think that after such a statement in opposition to a candidate, any one would be likely to come to a ballot under the circumstances. I think the Managers are aware, that it is their interest to elect in a manner satisfactory to the General Synod and Seceding Synod.

Is it not a matter of considerable notoriety at present, that the charge of Arianism has been made against the Belfast Institution?—Yes, certainly.

Do you not think that the idea of Arianism connects itself with the Belfast Institution, in the minds of many individuals, who, a few years ago, never thought of associating the two things?—Since the election of Mr. Bruce, it more particularly connects itself with it. For this there are many reasons. At the very time of the election, Dr. Edgar, the Theological Professor for the Seceders, objected in very strong terms, on account of Mr. Bruce's being an Arian; intimating, that plain people would scarcely be able to distinguish between an Arian and a Socinian. One of the electors defended the choice of an Arian, and asserted, that several of the Established Clergy were Arians; others reprobated the introduction of religious considerations at any election in the Institution. Then it was affirmed that Mr. Bruce was a keen Arian polemic, representing all Trinitarians as fools and knaves. This assertion came from a member of the Board of Managers. The rapid increase of Arian Professors or Teachers, at this time amounting to four, and in a little time after nearly becoming five, was another circumstance that excited public attention. After these circum-

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
24 November 1825.

stances, the idea of Arianism became inseparably connected with the Institution, and has been confirmed by public discussion.

When was that election?—Four years ago.

In consequence of the late discussions, is it not now a matter of much greater notoriety among the public generally, that the charge of Arianism has been preferred against the Belfast Institution, than it was two or three years ago?—It was generally known through all Ireland, four years ago, that there was an opposition made to the establishment of an Arian professor, after the election of Mr. Bruce. I have good reason to know, that the circumstance was familiarly discussed in the county of Cork, within a few weeks after the meeting of the General Synod, where the opposition to that election was made.

Supposing that no check of any description is proposed, in order to exclude Arianism from particular situations in the Belfast Institution, what do you conceive will be the practical effect upon public opinion in the north of Ireland?—Considerably injurious to the Institution; so much so, that I believe a great part of the Synod of Ulster will withdraw their students from it. A majority of the Presbytery of Route have already recommended their students to go to Glasgow. In this, if no secure arrangement be made with the Institution, I am convinced they will be followed by the General Synod. I have the opinion of many influential members to that effect.

Is the Presbytery of Route one of those Presbyteries that requires subscription?—Yes; I should consider the whole Presbytery is what is called Orthodox. It is the largest Presbytery in the Synod.

Supposing public money were to be given to the Institution, without the adoption of some arrangement for checking those principles, do you conceive that it would be attributed to indifference upon the part of Government or the Legislature, as to the whole subject of religious faith?—I certainly think so; and I must say, I should consider it the greatest injury a Government could inflict upon any country, to contribute by public funds to the raising up of a new power in a church situated as the Presbyterians of Ulster, which would in any degree contribute to the extension of Arianism.

What do you think would be the consequence to the Seceding Synod, if no measures were taken?—I do not think it would be of any consequence to them at present; their situation is essentially different from that of the Synod of Ulster. They may be called Dissenters from the Synod of Ulster; and the people who joined them have done so generally upon religious scruples, against communicating with the Synod of Ulster, or some Arian ministers. They have fewer of the gentry, whom, from various circumstances, I consider more liable to Arian influence. Were a member of a Seceding Synod actuated by worldly wisdom, he would wish the establishment of a power that would gradually overwhelm the General Synod with Arianism, as this would infallibly bring over the great mass of the people to the Seceding communion. This would succeed for a short time; but in the end, Arianism would prevail with them, as it has done in every country where Arians have obtained the collegiate chairs. As matters at present stand, it is by the Synod of Ulster alone the injury would be felt; it would scarcely at present do the Seceding Synod one jot of harm if the professors were all Arians; but their hour of fall would be hastened by the circumstance.

You do not conceive that they would recommend their young men to withdraw from the Institution?—I think it likely some of them might, as I know from conversation, that many of them are much dissatisfied, especially the people are so; but they would have very little cause to apprehend any danger, from the reasons I have mentioned, for the Institution could not, for a long time to come, exercise any considerable influence over the Seceding congregations in the election of Ministers.

Is there any matter connected with the Belfast Institution, you would wish to take this opportunity of stating to the Commissioners?—Not having thought I should have the liberty of suggesting anything, I do not think I could at once; but in the event of being called again, I might probably be prepared to suggest something.

Has it ever occurred to you, to consider the best mode of distributing the money, supposing a Government grant to be made?—I should think Government had better make the distribution, and fix it for each Professor.

To what other purposes would it be advisable to apply the grant, besides the remuneration of the professors?—They want buildings; there are very few class rooms.

Is there any library?—A small one.

Would it be desirable to introduce any bursarships for students?—I think it would be desirable to make provision for the encouragement of superior attainments in students, and many improvements thus could be made upon the subject of education. If, for example, certain scholarships depended upon entrance examinations or final examinations, it would be a great stimulant to diligence both at school and college.

In the case of the Institution objecting to admit any rules whatever, which would have a tendency to obstrust persons of any religious creed, be it what it might, would it in that case be desirable to give bursarships to a certain number of the young men from this country, that should be educated in Glasgow?—A very small sum expended in that way would be of great service to the cause of learning, if connected with entrance and other examinations of a public kind, so as to destroy the possibility of favouritism in the allotment of the scholarships.

If the Parliamentary grant to the Belfast Institution, was so large as to be likely to diminish the expenditure of students derived from their own funds, do you think it would have a tendency to throw the Presbyterian ministry into lower hands?—I do not think it would. I think the time and expense necessary to acquire previous school learning, is always

319
Examination of
Rev.

Henry Cooke,
24 November 1825.

ways a sufficient guard against putting it into hands too low. Besides, were such assistance granted, I think the term of college study should be increased, from five to eight years.

Of what class are those generally educated now?—Generally the sons of respectable farmers; a few are the sons of ministers.

Are many the sons of the gentry and mercantile class?—Very few. I do not recollect more than one or two. I know a son of one rich man attending for the ministry; and I know the sons of some merchants also attending; but these are very few.

Is it that the emoluments are not sufficient to attract them, or any other consideration?—There are several causes. In our church, where success depends on popular election, even a well educated and talented man may never get a congregation. If a father be then able to provide for his son in any other way, (if he be a man of the world), he is not likely to put him into a situation where his success is so very precarious, and, after all, his emolument would be so trifling. I believe there is no clergy in Europe more scantily provided for than the majority of the Presbyterian clergy of Ulster.

Have you attended the public examinations frequently at the Institution?—Yes.

Both in your private character and as Moderator?—I have been holding an official situation since its establishment, as one of the Synod's annual committee of examination.

Have you found the general result of the examinations satisfactory to you?—Yes, with the exception of this year's closing examination for general certificates in literature and science; with these I was not generally satisfied, especially in languages.

You are aware of the engagement, as it is called, entered into by the Members of Faculty?—Yes.

Have you any reason to believe that it has been in any instance violated?—If you take the strict words, I think it is necessarily violated every day. They affirm, that they will neither, directly or indirectly, interfere with religion; now I think it is utterly impossible, in the nature of things, that they should not interfere, in one sense or other. I do most openly acquit the Hebrew and Greek Professors of any wilful and intentional violation; but if indirect teaching of Arianism, without, I believe, intending it, be a violation, I have heard it violated; the prayer of an Arian minister, constructed after the Arian doctrines and phraseology, is a necessary inculcation of his principles in the most solemn manner. The declarations I have heard a Professor make before all the students, that he held his own opinions as firmly as any other persons, when these were publicly understood to be Arian, appears to me the most powerful indirect mode of teaching it, even when all direct interference was disavowed. I have also referred to a Hebrew criticism, which I conceive was an indirect violation.

You mean "Adonai"?—Yes; I have the opinion of one of the best Hebrew scholars in Ireland, that I am correct. I do not pretend to be a very good Hebrew scholar myself, but not relying on my own judgment, I have the opinion in manuscript with me.

The answer given by the boy to that question was, that it was a mark of dignity?—The answer was given by the Professor, for the boy could not or did not answer. These are two masoretic points, that, according to that system, modify the meaning of the same word. The question was, why it was one and not the other; the answer given by the Professor was, that in consequence of the point, the word was plural, and was so used to signify dignity. This appeared to me to destroy one of the arguments for one of the doctrines to which Arianism is opposed. I have with me the opinion of a Hebrew scholar, equal, perhaps, to any in Ireland, that the criticism, if admitted, has this consequence.

The other view is, that it is singular?—Yes, so says Parkhurst, one of the Hebrew lexicographers. Two different opinions are given in Simons; he says, some consider such words plural, some collectives, and others consider them singulars of a peculiar form. If it be plural, and is thus brought to signify dignity, then, by consequence, the word "Elohim," which is plural confessedly, and is thus employed with the singular "Jehovah," does no more than imply "dignity," without intimating that plural distinction in the Godhead of the Father, Word, and Holy Spirit, the one Jehovah of the Scriptures, for which Trinitarians contend.

We see by the minutes of the Synod of Ulster, a gentleman has given notice for moving, at the next meeting, that the subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith shall be required of all the initiants into that church?—Yes; by our discipline we require a notice of one year for every new motion. This is somewhat similar to the Barrier Act in the church of Scotland. The motion will be discussed and decided in June next.

In the same overture there is this expression: "When the object of this Committee shall have been attained, they be authorised to propose their opinion of the advantage of home education for the students of this church, and recommend the Belfast Institution to the favourable consideration of His Majesty's Commissioners of Education Inquiry;" what does that allude to?—There was a Committee appointed to meet the Proprietors of the Institution, with a view to obtain the power referred to before, of giving to the electors an official opinion, specifying what candidates they should consider eligible. This was with the view of exercising some check upon the future election of Arians. I believe the Managers and Visitors were unanimous, or nearly so, in wishing to accede to this proposition of the Synod. I believe so were a large proportion of the most respectable part of the Proprietary. The proposition of the Synod was, however, rejected. The Synod's objections to the Institution remain therefore unremoved, and their Committee were not authorized to come before the Commissioners with any specific recommendation.

Would the Synod act through the Moderator, or through the Committee?—The Committee would consider the testimonials of candidates, give their opinion to the Moderator, specifying those they might consider eligible. The Moderator would report to the electors.

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
4 November 1825.

In the discretion the Moderator exercises at elections, he gives his own personal vote?—Yes, without being influenced by any Committee. It was not proposed to influence the vote of the Moderator, but that he should merely convey the sense of the Committee of the Synod.

He might convey the sense of the Committee in one way, and vote against it in another?—Yes, but such an occurrence would not be likely.

There is no mode, in the internal management of the Synod, which could bind or insist upon the Moderators voting in any particular way?—Certainly not. It would not be supposed decorous towards him to bind him to vote in any way; neither do I think it would be right to bind him to a particular candidate.

Is it not generally understood, that one of the first professors of this establishment was of Arian principles?—No. I conceive none of the original professors, or even teachers, were Arians. I never heard it suggested that any one of them was.

Was not Dr. Nielson one of the original ones?—No, it was Dr. O'Beirne originally held the situation, and he was the very contrary of an Arian.

Did not the gentleman who immediately preceded Mr. Bruce bear the character of Arian?—Yes, he originally bore that character; but as far as I can judge of his sincerity, of which I have no reason to doubt, he had ceased to be an Arian; and I have the testimony of a clergyman of the establishment in the neighbourhood of Dundalk, to whom he made a declaration that absolutely amounted to a denial of Arianism. In addition to which, there is this circumstance, which proves he could not be an Arian. Dr. Nielson was a candidate for a professorship in the University of Glasgow, and he must sign every word of the Westminster Confession before he could be admitted. He knew this. I think he was, in the highest sense, an honest man, and would not have contemplated signing it, if he had not believed it to be true; he therefore could not be an Arian.

Appendix, No. 25.

Further Examination of the Rev. Henry Cooke; Tuesday 6th December 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
6 December 1825.

WHEN you were last before the Commissioners, you were so good as to undertake to put upon paper the terms of the test you would yourself deem expedient should be subscribed by the different Professors in the Belfast Institution?—I have done so.

Be so good as to state it?

Article 1st.—Holy Scriptures: The invisible things of God, even his eternal power and godhead, may be understood from the things that are made. But as man, through sin, did not retain the true knowledge of God, it pleased God at sundry times and in divers manners, to reveal himself to man, and to direct, by his providence, that his Revelation should be recorded for our instruction in the books of the Old and New Testament. These books are Genesis, &c. to Malachi, and Matthew, &c. to Revelation.

Article 2d.—Of God: There is but one only living and true God; and in the unity of the Godhead the Scriptures reveal the Father, Word, and Holy Spirit, the same in essence, power, and eternity.

Article 3d.—Of Sin: Our first parents sinned against God by eating the forbidden fruit; by this disobedience they lost communion with God, and became subject to death and condemnation; all mankind descending from them inherit their sinful nature, from which proceed all actual transgressions.

Article 4th.—Of the Mediator: In the fulness of time, according to the promises of God, the eternal Word became flesh, was delivered unto death as a vicarious sacrifice for sin, rose from the dead, ascended into Heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God, making intercession for us, and thence he shall come at the last day to judge men and angels.

Article 5th.—Of Faith: By the Holy Spirit the soul is enlightened to receive the testimony of God contained in the Scriptures, respecting things hoped for and things not seen, and to receive and rest upon Christ alone for salvation.

Article 6th.—Of Repentance: By the Holy Spirit the soul of a sinner is enabled to see and feel the vileness and danger of sin, to grieve for it, to hate it, and willingly to turn from it unto God with sincere endeavours after new obedience.

Article 7th.—Of Justification: God justifies the believer when he pardons his sins, and makes him accepted in Christ the Beloved. God freely justifieth believers in Christ, not for any thing wrought in them, or done by them, but for Christ's sake alone, the believer receiving and resting upon Christ by faith. Faith thus receiving and resting upon Christ is the alone instrument of justification before God.

Article 8th.—Of Worship: At all times and in all places God is to be worshipped in spirit and in truth; and the Lord's Day is to be kept holy. Religious worship is to be given only to the Father, Word, and Holy Ghost.

Article 9th.—Baptism and the Lord's Supper: Baptism is a washing with water in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, which doth signify and seal our union with Christ, our partaking of the benefits of the covenant of grace, and our engagement to be the Lord's. The Lord's Supper is a giving and receiving of bread and wine in memory of Christ's death, and in faith of his coming to judgment, whereby the worthy receiver is, by faith, made partaker of his body and blood, with all their benefits to his spiritual nourishment and growth in grace.

Article 10.

321
 Examination of
 Rev.
 Henry Cooke,
 6 December 1825.

Article 10.—Resurrection and Judgment: There will be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust, and then will they all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, and receive according to the deeds done in the body, whether they have been good or evil.

That test, of course, is such as could not be signed by any Arian?—So I conceive.

Do you conceive there are many persons amongst the Presbyterian body who would be satisfied to sign that test, and who would yet feel great difficulties in signing the Westminster Confession?—I think there are many who would sign this, who would feel difficulty in signing every item of the Westminster Confession.

Do you conceive there are any ministers in the Presbyterian Church (meaning thereby to include the Seceding Synod), except the Arians, who would dissent from any of the positions contained in that test?—I think there may be some of them who would not consider it full enough; but I do not think there are any except Arians and Socinians, who would object to any thing contained in it.

Are we to understand, there are some who would think it did not sufficiently develop Calvinistic principles?—Probably some would object upon this ground; although I consider the essentials of the doctrines, called Calvinism, to be contained in it, and that the greater number of Calvinists would be satisfied with it, as a scriptural view of their leading doctrines.

And are we to understand, there are others who would think it did not sufficiently develop Arminian principles?—Probably some would be dissatisfied upon this ground; for I have endeavoured to give an outline of the essential doctrines of the Gospel, without reference to the scholastic peculiarities of either Calvinism or Arminianism.

But still you think an Arminian Presbyterian and a Calvinistic Presbyterian could sign it?—So I conceive; Calvinism fairly understood and correctly explained, I take to be the doctrine of the Bible; but Arminianism, as generally taught in modern times, seems to me to concede every point essential to Calvinism. I have, on another occasion, stated to this Board, that I considered there was a marked distinction between the primitive Arminians, called Remonstrants in Holland, and those who in modern times are called Arminians in these countries. The primitive Arminians taught a great deal of Pelagianism, the modern Arminians generally teach as much Calvinism. The doctrine of original sin; of the necessary priority of divine grace in conversion, and of justification by faith alone, appear to me to concede Calvinism, by consequence, in all its essentials. Now these are most distinctly taught by modern Arminians as well as Calvinists. In times when Calvinism has been misunderstood and misrepresented, I am openly willing to profess myself a Calvinist; but the man who holds the essential doctrines I have stated, I am willing to recognize as a brother, by whatever distinctive name he may be called; and I believe the great body of Calvinist Presbyterians in the Synod of Ulster are prepared to exercise a similar liberality.

Do you conceive that an Independent minister could have any objection to any of the positions contained in that test?—Not any of the people commonly known here by the name of Independents. There are I understand Independents in England who are Socinians; but all the Independents here are Calvinistic.

Might not a Baptist sign that test?—Yes; the Baptists of this country are Calvinists.

Do you conceive there are any clergy of the Established Church, who according to your understanding of the doctrines of the Church of England, would feel it necessary to dissent from any position in that test?—I think not any; I examined the Thirty-nine Articles upon drawing it up, and would feel no objection to change any one of these articles for the corresponding one in the Thirty-nine Articles.

Will you be so good as to point out any positions contained in that test, that you think a Roman Catholic could not sign?—On the article of worship there might be some question. The Eighth Article is, that “religious worship is to be given to the Father, Word and Holy Ghost.” A Roman Catholic might scruple probably at the words, “religious worship,” being thus confined, as they necessarily prohibit all kinds of religious address to saints or angels.

With respect to the communion, could they subscribe to that?—I conceive not. The Lord’s Supper is defined to be “a giving and receiving of bread and wine, in memory of Christ’s death, and in faith of his coming to judgment;” and the partaking of his body and blood is confined to faith. A Roman Catholic, holding the doctrine of transubstantiation, would not be satisfied with my definition.

Are you aware that a Roman Catholic would necessarily entertain objection to any other position in that test, except what you have named?—I have said, that the Scriptures are from Genesis to Malachi, and from Matthew to Revelation. I have not admitted the Apocrypha, which they hold to be of canonical authority, as matter of faith and practice.

Is it your own opinion, that that test ought to be taken by every Professor of the Belfast Institution, without exception?—It is my own opinion, that it ought to be taken by all with whom our students are connected, more especially by those whose departments necessarily connect themselves with religious opinions.

Do you think it absolutely necessary, that that test, or one of equal effect, should be taken by the Professors of Theology, the Professor of Moral Philosophy, and the Professors of Hebrew and Greek?—I think it absolutely necessary that some test should be established, or some mode devised, by which Arians, Socinians, and the like, may be precluded from becoming Professors to the students of the Synod of Ulster. I think it right that it should apply to all Professors, but absolutely necessary with respect to those specified; any exception in favour of particular professorships, would be objectionable in principle, and might be dangerous in practice.

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
6 December 1825.

Do you think it of great importance to exclude Arians from the situations of the masters of the boarding schools, which you are aware have no connection with the collegiate department?—Speaking as a member of society, and a minister of religion, I think there is as much danger in the masters being Arians, as in the professors. The schools and college form one body for education; and if a member be diseased, the whole body must be affected.

You are aware the Institution is not seeking any aid from Government for the school department?—Yes, I am aware of that; the schools have no need of assistance. As an influential power, I consider the schools and the collegiate department as perfectly inseparable. The schools are, in some degree, a mere preparative for the college.

Will you describe the nature and the extent of the danger you are apprehensive of from the masters of those schools being Arians?—I think there is one obvious danger, that of a young person coming into contact with Arian teachers, and remaining six, seven, ten or more years with them; and during all that time, according to the views I have taken of the subject, not hearing, or having brought before them, the scriptural doctrines of religion. There is a second danger arising from the foregoing. The master acquires an influence over the future conduct of his scholars; and it is upon that principle I accounted, upon a former occasion, for the circumstance of a considerable part of the gentry of the north of Ireland becoming favourable to Arianism, or, at least, indifferent about evangelical doctrines. At the same time, I feel it right to say, that the danger arising from Arian masters must be considerably modified by their individual and personal characters. In some I should consider the danger very little, in others very great; but to the principle of a great establishment, patronised and taught by Arians, I feel it necessary decidedly to object.

Do you not think, that the notoriety of Arians being masters of those schools, must have some operation in preventing the children of parents, who are themselves not Arians, resorting to those schools?—Yes, if the parents are at all attentive to the peculiarities of religion, and if they have made it a matter of serious concern; but some think little about a religious education, and are fully satisfied if they have confidence in the master's literary acquirements. But with some parents, I know the Arian character of the Institution has had the effect implied in the question.

Are we to understand, that the masters, as well as professors, sign an engagement that they will not interfere with the religious opinions of the pupils?—I rather think they have not; I believe the engagement is confined to the professors. But a professor is also sometimes a master; and what he has signed in one character, is probably binding in another.

Do you conceive, that it is one of the principles of the Institution, that the schoolmaster shall not interfere with the religious principles of the boys boarding in his house for a series of years together?—I do not think it has been recognized as a principle, or entered into as an engagement; but I am puzzled with the difficulty of one individual being both a professor and a master. Is he bound in one character, and free in the other, may become a difficult question; yet it would be strange if a master were bound not to meddle with religion.

Would not that amount to the exclusion of religion from the education of the boarding school?—So it would appear; but I rather think religion is admitted into the schools, and only excluded from the college. The reason of the difference, I cannot comprehend; the principle of the difference, I utterly disapprove.

Does not it appear more objectionable to you, to exclude such instruction on the part of the master, who has the constant superintendence of the boy for years together, day and night, under his house, and a much stronger measure, than excluding the Professor of Chemistry or Natural Philosophy from interference, his opportunities of intercourse being infrequent, and his department not connecting itself with theology?—It strikes me, that a system of education excluding religion, is the worst thing possible for any country. If the master teach no religion to the boy, (I mean in case of a boarding school, where the master comes into the place of a parent,) we will scarcely expect much religion in the man. It is true, the opportunities of the master are more frequent than those of the professor. It is also true, that the department of a professor may not immediately connect itself with religion. But the character of the professor will inculcate his peculiar religious principles more effectually than any lectures. If the public character of a professor be Arian or Socinian, it will be vain to bind him not to inculcate his opinions; his literary character and influential position will do the work for him most effectually, and no matter what his department may be, upon the religious opinions of his pupils his own religious character will make more or less impression. One of the greatest evils of modern education has been, that the concerns of religion have been made to bend to the imaginary interests of literature and science. Every instructor of youth should teach religion, either by word or character. And this principle is peculiarly necessary in the education of candidates for the Gospel ministry.

Do you think it would be a good regulation that the Professor of Chemistry should have the power of interfering upon the subject of religion?—The guardians of education should first take care that his religious principles are good; and then as occasion offers, he should be as free as others to impress them on his pupils. He should not teach religion instead of chemistry; but his private conversation should be religious.

Suppose the test, the details of which you have just stated, was not approved of by other persons who must be consulted upon it; and that it was still desirable that the Presbyterian Synods should exercise such an influence over the election of some of the Professors of the Belfast Institution, as to give them the power of excluding Arians, in what way could that influence best be exercised?—By a committee of the two bodies, formed either by calculating the proportions of the students that have attended from each body at the

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
6 December 1825.

the Institution since its commencement, or by taking a number of ministers in each Synod, or computing the number of people under their ministerial care respectively, and appointing a certain proportion of the one, and a certain proportion of the other Synod, to meet together as one general committee, to exercise whatever authority might be vested in them.

Do you think it would be better to appoint your committee annually, or for each Synod to meet when a professorship became vacant, to appoint a committee?—I should think a committee ought to be appointed by each Synod as a vacancy occurred. The committees would then have the minds of their respective Synods.

Of what number should the committee consist?—If I were to calculate by the students of each Synod, I do not know how it would stand; if I were to calculate by the ministers, the Synod of Ulster is about double that of the Secession Synod; if by the people, the Synod of Ulster is still larger. I should think a committee consisting of fifteen ministers and fifteen elders a sufficient representation of both.

Would it not be likely that a committee so numerous would disagree among themselves?—No; our committees are generally larger; our annual fixed committee consists of twenty-eight ministers, and in a case of such public importance as ministerial education, I think the elders should be consulted upon the matter.

Would the majority decide, or would any one objecting be sufficient?—We decide always by a simple majority; the division of one more than a half. Should we divide equally, the Moderator has the deciding vote.

Do you propose there should be fifteen elders and fifteen ministers?—Yes; it is the practice of our body to have them equal.

The committee would consist of thirty?—Yes; twenty from the Synod of Ulster, and ten from the Seceders.

Would not that be more than convenient?—For the management of a congregation we have sometimes more than that.

Where should the Synods meet to elect the committee?—I do not think they should meet in Belfast. They might be suspected of coming under particular influence there. From influence and the suspicion of it, they should be perfectly free.

What description of influence?—A thousand kinds of influence that may be exercised upon men when they come into a particular neighbourhood where certain interests are powerful or predominant.

Will you suggest any place where it would be most desirable to call them together?—The most central part of the Presbyterian population of Ulster is Cookstown. There it might be as well for both Synods and committee to meet.

Do you think that thirty persons would actually assemble, or any great portion of them, to decide upon the fitness of a Professor?—I think it most likely they all would; but if they would not, that is a reason for making the committee numerous; it also ought to be numerous in order to exclude private friendships, and to secure a full representation of the Synods.

Do you think the ministers of the respective Synods would consider it a hardship to be brought together for such a purpose?—No; for at such an occasional meeting of Synod they would not be bound to attend. As many as felt interested would attend to elect the committee. The committee's attendance might be made imperative, and they would not object when the cause was important.

Whose duty would it be to summon the committee to meet for such a purpose?—The duty of the Moderator.

Should you propose, when a professorship became vacant, that the proper officer in the Institution should signify the same to the Moderator?—Certainly.

Would not there be an anomaly in this respect, that the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster might exercise his vote in the election of a person upon whom he might exercise his veto afterwards?—If he exercised his veto against him at the committee, he would only be repeating what he had done at his election. Besides, in the committee he would be mere chairman, and would have no voice except in case of an equal division.

Why do you think it would be necessary to divide the delegates of the Synod unequally?—Because I think the bodies ought to be represented in some degree according to their numerical influence in the country. The congregations belonging to the Synod of Ulster, are, with a very few exceptions, much larger than those of the Seceding Synod; the Ministers belonging to the Synod of Ulster are nearly double the number of the Seceding Ministers; it therefore appears to me reasonable, that there should be on the part of the Synod of Ulster the larger number of representatives.

Would you think it reasonable of fifteen Ministers there should be ten from the Synod of Ulster, and five from the Seceding Synod?—That would be giving more voters to them than the proportion given to the Synod of Ulster, calculating by the amount of population connected with each Synod respectively.

Do you think that would be considered a reasonable or an unreasonable arrangement?—I think the Synod of Ulster would not be satisfied unless they had the superiority of representation because they have the larger body connected with them—I am convinced I am speaking the sense of the members of the Synod, when I say they ought to be represented by a larger number; and if I did not say so, I am convinced I should be considered as betraying their interests.

Can you form any opinion as to which Synod the Managers of the Belfast Institution would be likely to have the greatest jealousy of?—I do not think many of the Managers or Visitors would be jealous of either; the Managers and Visitors expressed their willingness to grant the Synod of Ulster every thing they required for security; any jealousy would

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
6 December 1825.

be on the part of some Proprietors, and I think it probable, they would be most jealous of the Synod of Ulster.

Do you think that such an arrangement as the course of examination has been contemplating, would strengthen the character of the Belfast Institution throughout the North of Ireland, or excite the jealousy of it?—I am perfectly convinced it would strengthen the character of it with the great body of the Presbyterians; I know there are some persons who think there ought to be no control over it, and these are persons of riches, rank and influence, but at the same time persons who would never send a student to it; but with the body of the Presbyterians, who are Orthodox, it would strengthen it in public opinion; as also with the Orthodox part of the Presbyterian gentry. I know that this would be the case with many of the most respectable merchants of Belfast itself; I know it would also be highly satisfactory to many members of the Established Church to see us secured against Arianism.

Do you think it would give positive satisfaction to the generality of the people, to see or to feel that there was a safe-guard against the prevalence of Arian principles?—I am perfectly satisfied it would give a most decided satisfaction to the great majority of both ministers and people: I have abundant documents, if required to produce them, to show the dissatisfaction that exists among the ministers and the people in the Presbyterian church through Ulster, and I am sure their dissatisfaction would be removed by there being some control over the appointment of Arian professors in the Institution.

Would not the exercise of such a power as has been contemplated, necessarily lead to the appointment of Presbyterians to the chairs alluded to?—I think not; at least if I should judge from myself, I would as soon appoint an Episcopalian as a Presbyterian, and in some cases rather; I should rather have such a division as would give satisfaction to the Orthodox of both churches, and I think that is the feeling of the members of our Synod; I know there have been Episcopalians in it, and they have given the highest satisfaction; there never was a murmur against any one for being a member of the establishment.

If the Synods were permitted to exercise any influence whatever in the nomination of persons to the professors chairs, would it not be necessary to confine their influence solely to the point of, whether the individuals proposed were Arians or not?—I think the danger to be apprehended by the Synod from the present state of the Institution, is solely from Arianism, or opinions of that description, and that the sole power the Synods should look for, would be a power to control in the quarter of danger.

In what way would you propose to limit the power exercised by them to that point only?—I should not think it exactly right to put the committee upon their oaths, because I do not like the multiplication of oaths; but I should have no objection to their signing a very solemn declaration, that it was merely upon certain specified religious grounds, that they objected to any candidate. This declaration I should consider equivalent to an oath.

Would you have that declaration include a statement that they had good grounds for believing that the person did profess Arian tenets?—Yes; or if there were a test such as I have here specified, it would be easier to declare that any objection arose solely from their believing that the candidate held doctrines contrary to that test, or other accredited standard of religious profession.

Is there any topic connected with the Belfast Institution, about which you have not been examined, and upon which you may wish to state your opinion to the Commissioners?—There are two or three points that I would beg to submit to the Commissioners, as reasons for my opinions concerning the present state of the Belfast Institution, and which with their permission, I should wish to have upon record, as a vindication of my opposition to the Institution, in its present form, and as subject for the consideration of others. The first reason for my opinion being in any degree unfavourable to the Institution is, that I conceive the Arianism that has got into those professorships is contrary to the Scriptures; and I hold myself bound to oppose, as far as I can, every thing unscriptural. The second reason that has much impressed my mind, is the threatening in the Revelation of St. John, to the Churches of the East, that if they did not repent, the Lord would come quickly and remove their candlestick out of their place. Now, it appears to me, from church history, that the progress of Arianism and its kindred opinions, prepared the way for Mahometanism. And the permission of Mahometanism to overwhelm the Eastern Churches, I look upon, as at once the punishment of their apostacy, and the removal of their candlestick. In the same way I have often known Arianism in this country, to be the precursor of Scepticism and Deism; and consider every church as fairly warned of its danger by the examples cited. The third reason that has impressed my mind, is the actual fact of the decay of Presbyterian congregations, with a few exceptions, wherever Arian principles have been preached.

What has become of these decayed congregations?—The people seem to me to have frequently joined the Methodists, some of them the Independents, some of them joined the Church, some the Seceders; but, what appears to me a most important consideration, the very lower orders of the people, have as generally joined no church. I think that is the very worst feature of the whole affair; if they had joined themselves to the other denominations I have mentioned, the event I should not have lamented. But in cases of the kind I have mentioned, I have generally found the great majority stay at home, neglect public worship, and finally lose, in a great degree, the sense of religion.

Have you known any material number attach themselves to the Roman Catholic church?—Not many from this cause. I have not, at any time known many converts from Protestantism to the Church of Rome. What I have known have been from other causes. The next

325
Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
6 December 1825.

next reason that strikes me is, that the Synod of Ulster has uniformly sustained injury, in proportion as Arianism has advanced in the congregations, and that a great many of their people have from this cause gone to join other Bodies, especially the Seceders.

Do you mean, that the Seceders were those inclined to Evangelical principles, and left in disgust those inclined to Arianism?—This was generally, though not always, the cause of Secession from the Synod.

The next reason is, that I conceive it right that every minister of the gospel should give a plain testimony to the Arians themselves to reform; and to all the churches to consider; in hope that they may take warning and not allow a power to grow up, that must sooner or later prove injurious to their religious prosperity. The next reason is, positive experience of the influence of Arian Professors in the Colleges of the Protestant Churches on the Continent. Wherever Arians have got possession of the Academies they have invariably produced ministers of their own description; this appears from public documents to be true of the Academy and Church of Geneva, and a number of other Academies and Churches of the Continent of Europe. Another reason is, the example and practice of the present governing power in the Institution itself. At a meeting of the Proprietors at which I was present, the principal motion was carried by the conjoint interest of what I must freely call an Infidel party on the one side, and an Arian party on the other, joined, strange to say, by a small Orthodox party, jealous of the Synod of Ulster. When I say Infidel party, I mean that one of the chief and most applauded speakers, is generally believed to hold Deistical principles, and uttered sentiments quite becoming that school. The speeches of some influential Arians, were also in the highest degree, insulting and offensive to all holding Evangelical sentiments, and fully demonstrated the final result of raising up an Arian power to rule, or rather trample upon all who hold different religious opinions.

Do you mean by Infidel, rejecting Revelation altogether?—Yes; or merely considering the Gospel as a good system of morals: a compliment due to Epictetus, Seneca, and other heathens.

Do you not consider that Geneva in the early periods of the Reformation, was the cradle of the religious opinions you at present consider Orthodox in the Presbyterian Church?—Certainly.

What do you think Calvin would now think of the doctrines of the Church of Geneva, if he were now alive?—He would think them very bad.

Do you think he would subscribe to them?—No; or else he has changed his opinions very much.

Is it your opinion that they have not only become very different, but almost the converse?—Quite the converse; they are a mixture of Arianism and Socinianism, and something called Neonomianism, that I do not clearly understand; but its nature may be inferred from the kindred opinions with which it is connected. I have thus stated the chief reasons of my objections to the present state of the Belfast Institution, and on which I found my wish for its reformation before it becomes a national establishment. The only suggestion that I think it necessary to take the liberty of making, is one that is not my own, but originated with Mr. Carlile, our Moderator, with whom I had conversation upon the subject; it is, that in case of any arrangement with the Institution satisfactory to the Commissioners and to the Government, to whom the recommendation would come, Mr. Carlile suggests that there should be a more effective establishment for the education of theological students by the establishment of a Professor of Scripture Criticism, and one of Church History, in addition to the present Professor of Systematic Theology.

Do you mean two other Professorships?—Yes; such is Mr. Carlile's feeling. He thinks that the present theological system in colleges is very defective; he thinks there should be one to teach Systematic Theology, another to lecture on Scripture Criticism, and another to teach Church History, with a view, I believe, to a higher effect than giving the mere annals of opinions and occurrences.

Does your own opinion coincide with Mr. Carlile, upon those two points?—I think our theological education is exceedingly defective, and that it ought to be extended in the number of years attendance, and aided by additional instructors.

Supposing greater remuneration should be provided for the Professors of Theology, do you see any objection to their supplying the additional theological information Mr. Carlile thinks necessary?—I do not think any one could do it for want of time. The Professor of Systematic Theology could give an outline of Church History; but it would require a Professor to lecture on Scripture Criticism; and if there were a distinct lecture on Church History it would be so much the better.

Do you think one Professor could take charge of Scripture Criticism and Church History?—I think he and the Professor of Systematic Theology could divide Church History between them; but a distinct lecturer on Church History might make it a most important department.

Does such a division as you refer to, exist in any University you are acquainted with?—In each of the English Universities there are, I believe, several theological tutors, lecturers, or professors. There are two Professors of Theology in Glasgow, but only one lectures. I understand, however, that Principal M'Farlane did propose to lecture on theology; whether he has done so or not, I cannot say. He is, by his office of Principal, Primarius Professor of Theology. There is a second Professor of Theology, and also a separate Professorship of Church History.

There would be required the same veto upon the appointment of those Professors, as upon the others we have spoken of?—Mr. Carlile's opinion, I conceive to be, that these would operate as a check upon any Professors appointed by the Institution. He does not appear to

Examination of
Rev.
Henry Cooke,
6 December 1825.

me to consider any subscription of Articles of Faith, as likely to answer the purpose of securing the Orthodoxy of the Professors in the hands of the present electors; but seems to me, to trust rather to a positive Orthodox influence, counteracting any other influence.

The Synod, it is proposed, should have the appointment of those new Professors?—Yes, as of the present Divinity Professor. I would now beg leave to suggest to the Commissioners the propriety of consulting some more of our ministers; I think it necessary to mention this, as I have been led to state many opinions upon my own individual authority, which the Commissioners might think it wise to hear supported or contradicted by others. The only other idea with which I intend to trouble the Commissioners is, that if an arrangement cannot be made with the Institution, satisfactory for the general purposes of ministerial education, I would beg to suggest a distinct establishment for the education of Presbyterian ministers connected with the Synod of Ulster; they form a very important body in the state. The Commissioners must have seen that our attention to the education and moral habits of our people, merits some regard from the Government; I conceive also, that the home education of our students, has so many decided advantages over education in any foreign country, that I think the country at large, as well as the Presbyterian ministry, would be highly benefited by such an Establishment. If then such an arrangement cannot be made with the Institution, as that the Synod of Ulster can continue to send their students, I feel it necessary to mention the claims the Presbyterian Church would have for a separate Establishment for the education of their ministers; I think such an establishment would be supported for about 1000*l.* a year, and that the Synod of Ulster should be called upon to raise buildings for that purpose. If a satisfactory and safe arrangement can be made with the Belfast Institution, I shall rejoice at it. If it cannot be done, I conceive the Synod of Ulster have strong claims upon His Majesty's Government, for a College to educate their students, without being compelled to seek instruction in a foreign land.

Has it occurred to you that there is any school in Ireland that could be converted into an establishment for the education of the Presbyterian Clergy?—I have not thought on that subject. The academy at Belfast was, I believe, intended for it; a kind of collegiate establishment; but it never came to be any thing more than a large classical, mercantile and English school. The nature of its trusteeship might probably be a barrier to employing it for the education of the Presbyterian Ministry. Its Principal and Master, however, are highly respectable, and the buildings considerable; I believe, had the property been well managed, it might have been easily convertible into a Collegiate establishment. I have heard that Primate Robinson contemplated a College at Armagh, and left funds for the purpose; but have understood the conditions of his will were not fulfilled.

Appendix, No 26.

Examination of the Most Noble the Marquess of Donegall;
Monday 17th October 1825.

Examination of
The Marquess of
Donegall,
17 October 1825.

YOUR Lordship is President of the Belfast Institution?—I am.

Has the Institution at present, with regard to its general system and practice, your Lordship's approbation?—It certainly has.

The Institution formerly received aid from the Government?—It did.

That aid was withdrawn a few years ago?—It was.

What was your Lordship's feeling with regard to the withdrawing that aid at that time?—I certainly thought it was withdrawn very properly, from what had happened at a public dinner, where some very improper political toasts were drank and people present belonging to the Institution.

Did your Lordship think that what took place at that dinner, manifested such a feeling as rendered it proper for the Government to show its disapprobation of it?—I certainly did.

Does your Lordship consider there is any feeling at present in the Institution, or the body in general, of an objectionable nature?—I do not; I think the Institution is going on as well as possible; there are no unpleasant occurrences of any kind; what I allude to occurred about eleven years since.

Does your Lordship think that the tendency of the Institution and the general character of it, is such as renders it deserving of assistance from His Majesty's Government?—I certainly do.

Would your Lordship therefore wish that pecuniary aid should be afforded to it?—Most undoubtedly.

Is your Lordship of opinion that the benefits it confers upon the country in general, are of such a nature as to give it a fair claim upon the public for assistance?—Most unquestionably; I think it is of the greatest benefit to the North of Ireland.

Your Lordship is aware that the Institution embraces two objects; the one the home education of the candidates for the Ministry of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland; and the other the general diffusion of education amongst the people of the country intended for Lay occupations in life?—I am perfectly aware of that.

Does your Lordship think, that with the view of securing perfectly the good will of the Presbyterian Synod of Ulster, regard being had to the first object mentioned in the former question, it is desirable to give the Synod any greater degree of controul than it at present possesses?—I should decidedly say not; I think they have quite controul enough at present.

There

327
Examination of
The Marquess of Donegall,
17 October 1825.

There has been an objection made by some Members of the Synod to the Institution, upon the ground, that some of the Professors profess Arian principles, and that Arianism may therefore become so influential in the Institution, as to endanger the Orthodoxy of the candidates; has your Lordship any such apprehension?—I have not; particularly from what fell from Dr. Bruce at the last meeting; he did not say, as I understood him, that he was an Arian himself; but he said, that he felt assured that there could be no objection to the principles of the Arians, as affecting the Orthodoxy of the College.

You understood from Dr. Bruce he was conscientiously of opinion, that Orthodoxy was not in danger in any way?—That is what I understood.

Is your Lordship of opinion by giving increased influence to the Synod of Ulster, any general feeling of discontent might or not be excited in the country?—I am sure there would be great discontent among the proprietors of the Institution as was manifested the other day; the fact is, the Synod really has every influence it can reasonably desire; and what the Members of the Synod then asked, I believe, was to have their right to such influence put down in the books of the Institution as a rule or bye-law; and that the Proprietors would not agree to; they said they thought the power they had given to the Synod, fully sufficient, and putting down that right of influence as a bye-law, might lead to the Synod's making a claim for more power at some future period.

Recognizing the positive right of interference?—Yes; that was exactly what the Proprietors objected to.

Would your Lordship feel disposed to recommend any alterations or changes in the present system of the Establishment?—I should wish that the Establishment were more under Government influence.

Would your Lordship therefore wish that the Government should have such a controul in the Institution as would enable it to see distinctly, from time to time, how it was conducted?—Yes; I should think that the best thing for the Institution.

So that any advantage that might be afforded by Government, might be continued or withdrawn according to the report from time to time made to them?—Exactly so.

What is your Lordship's opinion as to the probable effect that might be produced upon the public mind in the North, by restoring the grant?—I am sure the public would be highly gratified at its being restored; there might be some feeling of jealousy at the Government having such controul, though necessary and desirable, but after a little time it would wear away.

Are we to understand your Lordship as being of opinion that a grant of pecuniary aid would tend to cement the connection between the people in general and Government?—I think it would certainly.

Diffuse general good feeling throughout the country?—Yes.

If the Commissioners understand your Lordship correctly, you would consider that the Institution should rather be continued as an establishment affording the benefits of education to persons of all religious denominations, than that it should be rendered exclusively for any one party?—Certainly.

Does your Lordship think it would be expedient that any sum of money should be advanced immediately, with a view to extending the Institution in the way of buildings, and so forth?—I am not exactly certain as to what their intentions are as to the extension of the building, or whether it is necessary at present; but I should think it more than probable that the extension would be desirable.

Would your Lordship recommend that there should be an annual grant?—Yes, certainly; an annual allowance; for I think it would be very desirable that His Majesty's Government should appear at the head of such an establishment in some way; and the grant being accompanied with such a desire on their part, would diffuse and strengthen the general good feeling, and cement a connection between those interested for education generally and His Majesty's Government; an object certainly most desirable.

Appendix, N° 27.

Examination of the Most Noble the Marquess of Downshire;
Wednesday, 12th October 1825.

YOUR Lordship is a Governor of the Belfast Institution?—My family and myself were original subscribers to the Institution.

Your Lordship, we understand, has taken a lively interest in the rise and progress of the Belfast Institution?—Yes, I have.

We have collected, my Lord, that it embraces two objects, the one, general education; and the other more particularly the education that is necessary for the Presbyterian ministry; we should wish, particularly, to know your Lordship's impression, as to which of those two objects is to be considered the most important and primary end of the Institution?—I consider that the Institution embraces both those objects, which form a prominent part of its composition and general utility.

But which of them does your Lordship consider the most important in reference to the general prosperity of Ireland, and the general well-being of the north?—The Institution is upon a large scale, and the students that are educated at it are composed of a number of persons in different situations in life, of whom a certain portion are intended to fill clerical situations

Examination of
The Marquess of Downshire,
12 October 1825.

Examination of
The Marquess of Downshire,
12 October 1825.

in the Presbyterian and Seceding Synods; but a greater number are intended to fill situations in commerce, agriculture, and other gradations in society, that are of less note, but of very great utility to the community at large.

Does your Lordship consider it of considerable national importance, that the Presbyterian clergy of Ireland should be educated at home; or is your Lordship of opinion, that it would be most desirable they should be educated at the Scotch Universities?—It always appeared to me, in concurrence with the opinions of others well acquainted with the situation of this country, that if a proper mode of education could be devised, it would be advantageous that those persons intended to follow the ministry in the Presbyterian church, should be educated in their own country.

Does the Belfast Institution appear to your Lordship to be a fit Institution for that purpose, or do any particular changes suggest themselves to your Lordship, as necessary to the rendering it so?—I have considered that the Belfast Institution is well adapted for the purpose you have mentioned; always reserving to myself the right of judging of the proceedings of that Institution, as far as I am able and have opportunities of so doing. I consider that in an Institution, constituted as the Belfast Institution is, that there requires a proper and salutary check upon its proceedings, and that its mode of management should be so directed as to satisfy, as far as may be, all classes of persons; that the education that is given to the students intrusted to its care, should be devoid, as much as is possible, of all objection. I allude particularly to religion, to the selection of able, intelligent, and well educated men as Professors.

If the Institution is to serve as an instrument for the education of the Presbyterian clergy, does it appear to your Lordship to be necessary that the persons appointed as Professors (at least in those departments that are in any way connected with religious instruction) should be persons approved of, or at least not disapproved of, by the Presbyterian Synods?—I should imagine, that in order to secure to the Institution the favourable opinion and support of the community, it would be necessary that it should carry along with it the good opinion of the several Synods, who we understand are placed over the Presbyterian church for its proper government.

Does your Lordship consider, as an abstract principle, that it is desirable or otherwise that the Institution should be connected with Government?—As a proprietor, I would certainly think and desire that it should be connected with Government.

Would your Lordship think it desirable, that that connection should include within itself some sort of principle of controul, or merely a system of pecuniary support on the part of Government?—I should conceive that the Act of Parliament that was passed in 1810 established the principle, not only that there should be a grant from Parliament for the proper maintenance of the Institution, but likewise a reasonable controul on the part of Government in its direction.

Could your Lordship suggest any mode in which the controul of Government, within the bounds of moderation, could be rendered effectual; and of what nature the controul should be?—I would rather not hazard an opinion upon that point, for I have not had an opportunity of considering it; but should there be any question which the Commissioners would wish to put to me upon the subject in which they are now engaged, I shall have great pleasure in giving them every information in my power.

Has your Lordship understood, that either now or at any time past, any of the Professors or Teachers in the Institution have been men holding peculiarly strong political opinions, beyond those that are fairly admissible within the principles of our free Constitution?—No; I am not aware of any, unless I were to mention, which I would hope is forgotten, a dinner that took place some years ago, of which so much was made at the time, at which a person was present connected with the Institution, who gave a toast at a late hour, which was uncalled for, and excited at the time much animadversion.

Does your Lordship recollect what the toast was?—Yes; “To the memory of Marshal Ney.”

Could your Lordship inform us the nature of the connection of the person alluded to with the Institution?—He was one of the teachers in the Institution; and in stating this, it is necessary to add, that the Managers and Visitors of the Institution themselves, as a body, at a meeting disclaimed all participation in the feelings which actuated the person who gave the toast; and I understand the fact was, the toast was given after a great number of persons had left the room, and at a time when no institution or individual at a public meeting could in fairness be made responsible for what one individual might choose to say.

Was the individual in any way connected with the Institution, or did it arise out of the occasion of its establishment?—I have stated in a former answer, that the individual was connected with the Institution, but the dinner which has been mentioned had no reference whatever to it; I believe that I was not in Ireland at the time, and I had no sort of connection whatever with it.

Does your Lordship recollect whether it did not occur at a convivial meeting on St. Patrick's Day?—It was on St. Patrick's Day.

Has your Lordship heard it made a subject of imputation against the Institution, that on the occasion of the two last elections to professorships, the chairs were conferred upon Arians, gentlemen holding the Arian views of religion?—I have heard of one gentleman, Mr. Hincks; I do not know the other.

Mr. Bruce?—Yes; Mr. Bruce; but I did not understand the Chairs were conferred upon those individuals because they were Arians; they were not selected on that account.

The question did not mean to imply that?—I believe Mr. Hincks was strongly recommended

329

Examination of Marquess of Downshire,
12 October 1825.

mended by some of the Dignitaries of the Established Church; but I am not certain by which of them.

Is it your Lordship's impression that those appointments have given considerable offence, and excited considerable dissatisfaction amongst a portion of the Presbyterian clergy?—I should suppose that they have caused a sensation in that body, from the examination of the Reverend Mr. Cooke in the Committee of the House of Lords upon Irish affairs, where he stated his opinion upon it; and I have since seen the discussions that have taken place, and the reports in the newspapers of the late discussion at the Institution.

Prior to the examination of Mr. Cooke at the House of Lords, had your Lordship heard that any unfavourable opinion had been created upon the body of the Prebyterians upon the subject?—I never did; but that might have arisen from my want of information on the subject.

Does your Lordship think, that the possibility of the election of Arian Professors is compatible with that satisfaction which your Lordship has stated to us, it is so desirable to maintain in the Prebyterian Synods, respecting the Belfast Institution?—Not approving of Arian principles myself, I cannot concur in saying I think it is a desirable thing, and I am not surprised at the Synod's objections.

Is it your Lordship's opinion it would give offence to a fair majority of the proprietors of the Institution to provide some moderate and reasonable security against the possibility of the recurrence of similar appointments?—I should think not, as a proprietor in it I should certainly approve of such a proceeding.

Does your Lordship consider it would be consistent with the general principles of the Institution, that persons should be excluded from professorships on the ground that they held the Arian principles, or that any test should be required from them that they did not hold Arian principles, before they were elected?—I think if it were understood, that persons professing those opinions, or any other opinions inimical to the Presbyterian and Seceding Churches and the Established Church, would not be chosen to fill those situations of Professors, I should think persons holding such opinions would not propose themselves; and as to a test, I should think it was a duty incumbent upon them, if it was so settled by Act or by Government, or by the vote of the Proprietors, whoever elected would be guided by that principle.

If your Lordship should find that a number of the Presbyterian clergy held Arian principles, would you then consider that exclusion on the ground of Arianism would be expedient?—A good deal would depend upon the system of tuition adopted by the Institution; if it was clearly admitted that that description of Seceders should be educated in the Institution, it would then be a mere matter of regulation, subject to full consideration of the whole subject in all its bearings.

If the Synod of Ulster tolerates Arianism in its own body, so that the profession of Arianism shall not be a ground of exclusion from that Synod, does your Lordship think it should be a ground of exclusion from an Institution, which is for the education of those who do hold, and those who do not hold those principles?—Referring to my last answer, it would not; but it is a matter involving difficulty, and requiring mature consideration.

Would your Lordship object to investing the Synod of Ulster with the power of expressing an opinion formally, as a body, with respect to the qualifications of all candidates for such of the Professorships in the Institution as could be considered in any degree connected with Theology, or education for the ministry in Ireland?—I should think there could be no objection to the Synod adopting such rules for its own guidance, and that of its church, as would secure to them such clergymen, as would discharge the duties of their profession in an exemplary manner.

Your Lordship is of course aware, that there are two Professors of Theology chosen respectively; one by the general Synod of Ulster, and the other by the Synod of the Seceders in the Institution?—I was not aware of that.

Would your Lordship feel any objection to giving to those several Synods, the right of each to have other Professors in the Institution, nominated by them, such for instance, as the Professor of Greek or Moral Philosophy?—There has been a discussion upon that point; I do not know how it would be felt by the Proprietors. The Institution of Belfast is peculiarly situated; all its concerns are laid before a Court of Proprietors, which is composed of persons of different ranks in society, and there is a difficulty with respect to that, as has appeared in the discussions that have taken place; therefore I could not well give an answer to it.

Your Lordship has already stated, that the Institution had two great and leading objects; one, the instruction of youth in mercantile and other professions; and the other, the instruction of candidates for the ministry of the Presbyterian Church; having regard to both those objects, does your Lordship think that the exclusion of persons of any particular religious faith from the Professorships, so long as the Institution embraces both those objects, would be beneficial, or would be likely to create any prejudice in the public mind, unfavorable to the object of general education, as distinct from the education of candidates for the Presbyterian ministry?—I should think, that the opinion of the Proprietors once had, and of the Synods upon the point of Arianism, that then there would be less difficulty in settling the point. The subject having been once agitated, it would be desirable to remove all cause for disquietude and discussion, and to settle the doctrinal points connected with religion in a manner satisfactory to the feelings of all well judging persons, and upon sound principles as to religion and education; to be definitively fixed upon the basis of religion and morality, and with a proper attention to the instruction of youth in all useful branches of learning. But at present it appears to me, that the Institution is liable to difficulty; the

Examination of Marquess of Downshire,
12 October 1825.

origin of the Institution was for the education of youth in this country, of the bettermost and middling classes. It was commenced by the activity and the very great and laudable perseverance of the inhabitants of Belfast, men engaged in mercantile and other pursuits; and it has always appeared to me quite an interesting fact, that persons that had been for the most part engaged in pursuits of a very different nature, should have been enabled by their diligence and attention to the subject, to mature an Institution of this sort. It has very great merit, and evinces much foresight, intelligence and ability in its government. The liberality of landed proprietors and persons in other situations of life, have enabled it to present the appearance it now does; but its funds are reduced, and it becomes necessary for its friends to look to some regular source, from which the payment of its expenses may be derived; and I am apprehensive, if it be long left to eleemosynary aid merely, without any regular stipend arising from Parliamentary assistance or bequests in land or money, it could not be conducted in that efficient manner which has hitherto distinguished it; and the Commissioners will immediately see, that unless there are ample funds vested in the Institution, its character and that of its Professors would be much deteriorated, and would fall very far short of the expectations of the public in the North of Ireland. As a Proprietor, I am exceedingly desirous to see the Institution established upon a solid basis of regulation, such as I have taken the liberty of mentioning, and so managed as to prove a great advantage to the population generally, with a due regard to those different opinions of faith in religion, which have been sanctioned by the Legislature, namely, those of the Presbyterians and Seceders, as it would be of very great service in bringing up young men who are to fill the stations of ministers in those churches.

If the Government were disposed to grant aid to the Institution by advancing a sum of money once for all, to enable your Lordship, and the other Governors and Directors of the Institution to extend your buildings, or otherwise, upon the condition of the same sum being also advanced by the Proprietors, does your Lordship think there would be any difficulty in obtaining any such advance from the Proprietors?—I am not able to give an answer upon that point; there might be additional subscriptions obtained; but I cannot say whether the present Proprietors would agree to add to their subscriptions.

The question, in suggesting the advance once for all, meant an advance of a considerable sum with regard to the particular object stated in the question, without at all excluding annual aid continuing, or without any such conditions?—If there was no hope of obtaining any assistance from Parliament, except accompanied by an additional subscription from the present Proprietors, possibly a sum might be obtained.

Does your Lordship consider, that an annual grant from Parliament to some extent is absolutely essential to the working of the Institution, so as to continue it as an Institution affording extensive benefits to the public, as heretofore?—I am not aware of the state of the accounts which the Commissioners will have an opportunity of investigating; but I have been informed they are much in debt, and that individuals have very liberally advanced money from a kind feeling to the Institution, and looking hereafter to a grant being obtained from Parliament.

So far as the conduct of the Professors of the Institution has come under your Lordship's observation, has it been such as to meet with your approbation?—Yes; I think so.

Has your Lordship ever heard, that any complaints have been made by any of the denominations of Christians of any interference with the religious principles of the children sent to the Institution?—No, I never did; and I do not believe there has been any.

Does it appear to your Lordship there is a general disposition in the country among persons of all religious denominations, to take advantage of the Institution, as affording means of education to the rising generation?—Yes, I believe there is; the number in the Institution will show that; I believe it is very full.

Does your Lordship consider it that species of public Institution which would fairly be entitled to public assistance?—Yes, I do; looking at the Establishment as the Commissioners have had an opportunity of viewing it, and looking to those objects we have already alluded to, namely, the educating the Presbyterian clergy and other classes, I really think the progress of education being so very rapid now in this part, as well as in the South of Ireland, where it is very much increased indeed, I think this Institution is deserving the support of His Majesty's Government.

So far as your Lordship has had an opportunity of judging of the general system of education, we may collect from your former answers, it meets with your Lordship's approbation?—Yes.

The original intention of this Institution was to afford to youth a classical and commercial education?—Yes.

Did the educating home ministers form a part of the plan?—I believe it did; it arose very probably out of its being a Presbyterian country at the time.

Does your Lordship remember, whether in the original establishment of the Institution, contributions were received from all descriptions of people?—Lord Donegall gave the ground, which is very valuable, and subscribed a sum of money also; our family subscribed twenty years ago nearly, which was before I came to my property, and persons of all religious denominations; I do not know that any persons of the Roman Catholic religion subscribed, but they may have done so.

Are there any Roman Catholic families of any importance in this neighbourhood?—I believe not; there are many Roman Catholics about here.

But of the lower orders?—The lower orders, and respectable people and wealthy merchants.

There

331

There is no bye-law that limits the appointment of the Professors to any religious persuasion?—I believe not.

Is it understood among the body at large, that the profession of any faith shall equally qualify the person for the situation of Professor, there being no written law to the purpose?—I dare say that was the principle upon which the several Professors were chosen, and that there was no question about it till lately, when the matter grew out of the examination of the House of Lords.

Is not Belfast nearly in the centre of the great seat of Presbyterianism in Ireland?—I should think it was.

Is it your Lordship's opinion, that the town of Belfast and the adjoining district, ever at any preceding period of time was in such a state of prosperity as at present?—No, it is in a very great extent of prosperity.

A state of prosperity increasing every day?—From its situation it is impossible at this period to state to what extent its prosperity will reach.

Are not the people almost universally employed at this moment in Belfast, and generally speaking throughout the north-east of Ireland?—Yes, there is not an individual that is able to work that is unemployed.

Is your Lordship acquainted with the nature of those trials or examinations that are taken of the candidates by the Presbyterian church in its different presbyteries, where there may be any subscription of articles required; in particular, is your Lordship aware, that some declaration of religious opinion is required in all cases?—I am not sufficiently informed upon the subject to give the Commissioners information upon it. In addition to what I have stated, I beg leave to add, that whether pecuniary assistance from Government to the Institution, to be divided into two heads, in the form of an annual grant, and by way of a donation, or both, it would be a source of real satisfaction to me, were His Majesty by a gracious expression of his wishes, and in consideration of the exertions and contributions of His Majesty's faithful and loyal subjects in the north of Ireland, towards the establishment of the Belfast Academical Institution, (upon which they have expended about 30,000*l.*) to extend to the Institution, His Majesty's Royal sanction as its patron and supporter; such a gracious proof of His Majesty's paternal regard towards this flourishing portion of his dominions, would, I am persuaded, be most gratefully received by, and render infinite service to the Institution.

The Commissioners are aware your Lordship has attended very much to the education of the children of your tenantry; in what state is it at present?—In a very satisfactory state; so much so, as to have exceeded any expectation that I could have entertained twelve or fourteen years ago, when I first turned my attention to the subject, or became acquainted with the want of education on my property in Ireland, highly to the credit of all descriptions of my tenantry, whether clergy or laymen, that happened to be resident upon or connected with my estate.

[His Lordship delivered in a statement, showing the number of schools, and the children attending them, on his estates in the county of Down.]

Examination of Marquess of Downshire,
12 October 1825.

Appendix, No. 28.

Examination of the Lord Bishop of Down and Connor; Friday, 14th October 1825.

YOUR Lordship is from your official situation, a Visitor of the Belfast Institution?—I am.

Has your Lordship within the short time that has elapsed since you have held that situation, had any considerable opportunities of forming an opinion of the merits of the Belfast Institution?—From personal observation, I have scarcely had any opportunity whatever. I merely once attended a meeting of the Managers and Visitors, and I once walked through the schools, while the business was going forward. I think those are the only two occasions on which I have had any direct communication with the Institution.

Will your Lordship state the particular business that principally occupied the attention of the meeting of Managers, that your Lordship attended?—It was a meeting relating to an application to Government or Parliament, with a view to recover a certain grant that had been made formerly to the Institution, in the spring of the year 1824. I think it was when the application from the Institution to Government was made, there was a certain deputation appointed to communicate with Government upon the subject. Some of the noblemen and gentlemen of the country were partakers in it. I think Lord Downshire and Lord Londonderry, were among the number.

Was there any difference of opinion at the meeting, as to the desirability, if possible, of obtaining a renewal of that grant?—I believe, I may safely say, there was no difference of opinion expressed.

Did your Lordship see cause, if we may take the liberty of inquiring, for concurring also in that feeling of a wish to see the grant restored?—I saw nothing that appeared on the face of that meeting, that made me think it otherwise than desirable that the grant should be restored.

Has your Lordship had sufficient opportunities from your intercourse with the nobility of the country in this neighbourhood, to be able to state what you conceive to be their prevailing sentiments as to the Institution, whether that of approbation, or the contrary?—I do

Examination of Lord Bishop of
Down and Connor.
14 October 1825.

Examination of
Lord Bishop of
Down and Connor,
14 October 1825.

not think I have had communication with many persons on the subject. I certainly have heard two or three, or three or four, whom I have found to express an opinion relating to the Institution, and I think their opinion has been, that it was desirable that the Institution should be encouraged by the patronage of Government.

Does it appear to your Lordship, that it would be desirable to introduce any increased degree of control on the part of Government over the Institution?—Probably that question requires a more intimate knowledge of the Institution, and a greater degree of acquaintance with its proceedings, than I am possessed of. I cannot be ignorant of there having been a controversy agitated, in the course of no very distant period, among certain persons of considerable weight in this part of the country, not from their rank or property in the country, but from other circumstances, their literary character, and causes of that kind, and with that knowledge, I may have a particular feeling.

Does your Lordship refer to the power which it is understood had been sought for by the Synod of Ulster, or more particularly to the supposed Arianism of some of the individuals connected with the Institution?—I consider that those two questions are most intimately connected. I apprehend that certain power was sought by the Synod of Ulster, in consequence of the supposition of there being Arian principles prevailing among certain members of the Institution. I suppose the questions, therefore, to be connected together.

Does your Lordship view the Institution chiefly as a seminary for the distribution of education among all classes of the community, or rather as an Institution particularly available for the instruction of the future Presbyterian ministers of the North of Ireland?—I wish to be understood, as speaking under a strong sense of very vague information upon the subject, but I should say, my impression has been, that it was designed principally for the education of candidates for the Presbyterian ministry.

Does your Lordship consider that that is the most important and influential of the two characters, both of which at present it obviously assumes?—I should consider the most important is that which I have just now supposed to be the real tendency of it; namely, the education of candidates for the Presbyterian ministry.

May we inquire, whether it is your Lordship's opinion, that it is in reference to its influential character as a seminary for the future Presbyterian ministers of Ireland, that it is to be considered as deserving of the future assistance of the Government?—Yes; I should think it is in that point of view, it is most naturally connected with Government and most deserving of the support of Government, if upon any ground, upon those grounds you state.

Is it your Lordship's impression, it will continue to exist under that character, whether it receives the support of Government or not?—I am not able to give any opinion upon that subject.

May we inquire your Lordship's opinion, as to the desirability of conferring any increase of power upon the Synod of Ulster, or any other authority, under all the circumstances, in order to check that degree of Arianism, which it is understood has to a certain extent exhibited itself in the Institution?—I should have no hesitation in saying, that if the Institution be regarded as a place of instruction for the Presbyterian ministry, means should be taken for guarding the principles of the young men who are educated in the Institution, in such a manner as that they may become members of the Presbyterian ministry upon the principles of doctrine recognized by that body.

It has been distinctly stated to us by the Professor of Divinity, the Moderator of the Synod of Ulster, and other persons, that the Westminster Confession of Faith exhibits what may be considered a standard of Orthodoxy by the Members of the Synod of Ulster, and also by the Members of the Seceding Synod; does your Lordship think that the appointment of two Professors of Divinity, one by the Synod of Ulster, and the other by the Seceding Synod, furnishes a sufficient guarantee against the extension of Arian principles in the seminary?—I think there is one very important professorship, which I do suppose is not contained under the description you have just given, but which ought to be most strictly guarded, if it be the intention to secure a particular profession of faith to the Institution.

Will your Lordship have the kindness to state it?—I have in my mind one professorship distinctly, which I am about to state; but I do not know whether I should extend my observation beyond that. I will state what that professorship is, in the first place, and then state what further occurs to me. The professorship I have first in my view is that of Hebrew. I do consider it impossible that any person can give instruction to a class in the Hebrew language, without mixing up in that instruction his own views upon particular points in theology. Upon that account I should say, if it is thought necessary to guard the profession of religion as taught in the Institution, it is right there should be a barrier thrown round the teaching of the Hebrew language. If the Professor of Greek gives lectures upon the Greek Testament, I should then think it necessary there should be the same guard, as to the Greek professorship, which I proposed, in the first place, as to the Hebrew. My observation is grounded upon this general principle; I do think it impossible that any person can give lectures, competently, in the Hebrew language, or in the Greek language, supposing, what must be supposed, that the lectures in the Hebrew language, contain instruction in the Old Testament, and supposing that the lectures in the Greek language contain instruction in the New Testament; I do think it impossible, I say, that lectures can be given in those languages, in the books of the Old and New Testament, without conveying, at the same time, particular notions of theology.

Apprising your Lordship, that it falls within the scope of the lecturer upon moral philosophy to lecture upon all those subjects treated of in Hume's Essays, and that a reference to his work constitutes a considerable portion of that course, we would wish to inquire, whether your Lordship does not think that the interests of religion require the same

333
Examination of Lord Bishop of
Down and Connor,
14 October 1825.

same guard should be thrown over that professorship, so that the Professor of Moral Philosophy should be understood to be sincere in his professions of Christianity?—Yes, I should think there can be no doubt upon that point.

Would your Lordship think it desirable that the guard, whatever it might be, should insure, not only that he was a sincere Christian, but in reference also to the peculiar nature of the Belfast Institution, that he should have Orthodox, as contra-distinguished from Arian views of Christianity; by Orthodoxy, meaning the particular views of the Presbyterian church?—I answered the question before supposing it to have a reference to Hume's Essay on Miracles. I have not his Essays, in general, in my mind at this time, and therefore the bearing of this question upon the case, is by no means so obvious to me as the bearing of the other; although I had no scruple in giving an opinion upon the Professorship of Languages, the Professorship of Moral Philosophy being stated to be engaged about a particular work, with which I am not conversant. I do not so readily see how the necessity arises.

Your Lordship is aware, that in what is called the School Department of the Institution, there are two masters who are permitted to receive boarders within the walls of the Institution; should your Lordship conceive it necessary, upon any avowed system of safeguard, such as we have been alluding to, to provide that the masters of those two schools should be Orthodox, according to the Presbyterian church? Those boarders are constantly under their eye, and form part of their families?—Certainly.

I suppose that that being the case, their families partake with them in the offices of religious devotion?—To a certain extent.

They have certain religious exercises in their family?—Yes.

Do they use family prayer?—Yes; supposing those persons have the power of exercising their own discretion upon the sort of prayer they make use of, I should say it was as necessary to be upon your guard with respect to them, as with respect to the other persons.

It being well understood, that such persons not only give the most solemn assurances they will not attempt to influence the religious belief of the pupils, but their own pecuniary interests obviously requiring that they shall faithfully adhere to that pledge, should your Lordship, in those circumstances, see a sufficient security against any danger to be apprehended?—Allow me to put a case; I will suppose the case of a Socinian teacher. The Socinian teacher has children under his care, who partake with him in the regular exercises of family devotion; that teacher is not desirous of impressing the children under his care with any particular views of religion; but he denies the doctrine of the Atonement; he denies the Intercession of our Saviour; he never, therefore, puts up a prayer to the Throne of Grace, in the name and through the mediation of our Saviour. That being the case, he must, however guarded he may be, give an impression to the mind of the scholars, that the name of our Saviour, and pleading our Saviour's mediation, is not necessary in order to make prayer acceptable to the Almighty Father. With that view, I should be justified in saying, I apprehend that a Socinian teacher, however he may pledge himself not to endeavour to impress a particular view on the mind of his pupil, must of necessity do it; and that view must be different from the view entertained by other persons. I, for instance, hold that it is necessary that prayers should be offered to God, in the name and through the mediation of Jesus Christ; every prayer I put up, and every prayer which the church of which I am a member teaches me to put up, I put up, without exception, in the name and through the mediation of the Saviour. The prayers may differ from each other as to the form of words; but always adhering to that principle, it is impossible that any person joining in family worship with me can be divested from having that which I consider to be a most essential doctrine in Christianity continually presented to his mind, he cannot be otherwise than a believer, supposing his practice and belief to go together, in the doctrine of the Atonement and Intercession; that doctrine cannot be impressed upon the mind of the person I am supposing, in the case of his living and joining in worship with a Socinian teacher.

Your Lordship observes, that a considerable proportion of the preceding answer would not apply to a mere Arian, because although they do not consider our Lord and Saviour as the object of direct worship, they offer up their prayers through his mediation?—I rather avoided, in the first instance, giving an answer to the question, and put a case that did not immediately come within the compass of the question.

With respect to those persons living in an Arian family, does the Arian object to consider our Saviour as an object of divine worship?—Universally, according to the evidence we have received from themselves, as to the sentiments of the Arians in this place.

Of course, then, he does not believe in the doctrine of the Trinity?—They universally avow their disbelief in it; always speaking of the Arians in this vicinity.

Are they in the habit of using the apostolic benediction which we use, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ?"—My answer, upon a question of this kind, would depend very much upon what was their practice in these and the like cases. If the principles of an Arian lead him to any practice which is inconsistent with those principles of belief, which I consider to be the fundamental parts of Christianity, then I come to the conclusion, that children cannot be safely trusted as inmates in the family of an Arian teacher.

Should not your Lordship consider studied omissions of the Arian teacher, with respect to other parts of the Christian doctrines, almost as dangerous as the possible insertion of other points, in which an Orthodox person cannot agree with him?—I think the case I just now supposed, as to a Socinian teacher, is directly in point; my case supposed only the omission of the name and mediation of our Lord and Saviour.

Examination of
Lord Bishop of
Down and Connor,
14 October 1825.

The mischief is done by keeping it back?—Yes; the rule of religious belief I take to be, that we are not to add to or diminish from what is revealed to us in Scripture.

We should be very glad of the benefit of your Lordship's opinions, as to how far the prevailing sentiment among the upper and middle ranks of this vicinity at present is, that of affection to the British constitution, or a sentiment in any degree compounded of dislike or disaffection to it?—I really do not think that my intercourse with the general population of the country has been sufficient to enable me to give an answer to that question; so far as it has gone, I am not aware of any existing disinclination to the Government of the country, or to the Ministers of the Government.

So far as your Lordship's intercourse has extended, have you seen any particular reason to be mistrustful of the Managers of the Belfast Institution, with reference to that particular point?—No, nothing whatsoever has come under my notice to lead me to think there is any disaffection.

Does your Lordship, as a distinguished member of the Church, see any reason to think it desirable that power should be entrusted to the ministers of the Presbyterian church, to check the growth of Arianism in their own community?—There is that general intercourse prevailing among all descriptions of persons in this country, and persons go so much to one place of worship or another, as their fancy leads them, that supposing there to be a general prevalence of any particular opinion, however erroneous, amongst a certain class, I think it would tend to diffuse itself over the general mass of the community. Therefore I think, if there was to be an increase of Arianism among the members of the Presbyterian body, it would probably operate to the prejudice of the true faith among ourselves.

We believe, my Lord, from various circumstances of Irish history, that a very large preponderance of the population in your Lordship's diocese of Connor, is of the Presbyterian communion; the question is confined to the diocese of Connor?—There certainly are a large number of Presbyterians in the diocese of Connor; and I suppose they have, in some parts at least, the preponderance over the members of the Established Church.

We should beg to be informed, whether the same degree of preponderance prevails throughout the diocese of Down?—From such information as I have received, I think it does.

Does it fall within your Lordship's experience, that the members of the Presbyterian church pretty frequently resort to the churches of the Establishment?—This is a matter that cannot fall so much under my own personal experience, as it may come to me by communication from others. I understand, throughout both dioceses generally, the Presbyterians are more or less in the habit of attending the church occasionally. I believe there are some parishes in which the congregation is made up, in a very great degree, of Presbyterians, at a certain time of day; for instance, the Presbyterians have a morning service, and no evening service. We have a service in the morning and evening, and the evening service, in some places, is attended generally by Presbyterians.

Then we must infer, that there is nothing in the rites and ceremonies of the Established Church that is repugnant to the feelings of the Presbyterians?—That seems to be the natural inference. The inference I have drawn is, that the feeling of hostility that prevailed to a very great degree, as we all know, between the Episcopalians and Presbyterians, a century ago, has now in a great measure subsided, and the Presbyterians have got rid of their antipathy to those marks of distinction that belong to the Established Church.

Have any decided instances of religious hostility to the Established Church, on the part of the Presbyterians, occurred in the north of Ireland?—No; I cannot call any to mind at the present time.

Is there any doubt, that the extension or the restoration of the bounty of Government to the Belfast Institution, under all circumstances, would be very gratefully felt by the Presbyterian body at large?—I have no doubt it would be received most favourably by them.

Does your Lordship think it would be favourably received by the body of the people at large?—Indeed I have no reason to think there would be any dissatisfaction. The Presbyterian body are those most immediately interested, and I cannot doubt it would be most acceptable to them, and I have heard several members of the Established Church speak of it in a favourable way also.

Is your Lordship aware of any class of the community in the north of Ireland, who would view the restoration of the grant with jealousy, or feelings approaching to dislike?—No, indeed I am not. I think, probably, if it was to be supposed that this grant could, in any degree be interpreted into an encouragement of, or indifference to, opinions which are considered at variance with the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, it would not be acceptable to the community.

Are we to understand, that that last answer has reference to Arian sentiments?—Yes; I am not speaking at all with a view to Presbyterianism, but with a view to the denial of the doctrines of the Trinity and the Atonement.

Does not your Lordship's answer imply, that it might be expedient to accompany any such restoration of the grant with some safeguard against the extension of those Arian doctrines, which, to a certain limited extent, appear to exist in this vicinity?—I think so.

And that the omission of such safeguard, even if not strictly necessary, might be taken to imply an indifference to those doctrines?—I think so.

Does your Lordship think it would be desirable to administer any test to persons appointed masters?—It appears to be a natural consequence.

Does not your Lordship think, that a practical safeguard might be devised without imposing any test, by conferring upon the two Synods, the general Orthodoxy of which has not

335
Examination of Lord Bishop of
Down and Connor,
14 October 1825.

not been called in question, the power of approving of the persons elected to certain professorships, and without whose ultimate approbation the election should be void?—When I answered just now as to the test, I was not meaning to take the words in the sense which you probably put them in. I meant, that there should be something done to prevent persons of the description we have been speaking of from holding those situations, but whether it should be in the shape of a test, or in the form now put to me, I do not say.

According to the present discipline of the Synod of Ulster, it is not necessary for a candidate for admission to the ministry to subscribe any particular Confession of Faith; it is in the discretion of each Presbytery, whether it will admit a person who holds the Arian principles, or not; all that is required is, that if a person shall not think proper to subscribe the Westminster Confession of Faith, he shall give in a declaration of his own religious opinions, and then that it shall be at the discretion of the Presbytery to admit him to the ministry, or not; and it appears, that there are in the ministry several persons who do hold Arian principles, and as such, members of the Synod, and who commune with those ministers of the Synod who are considered Orthodox. According to your Lordship's view of the question, and according to the view of the individual now putting the question, having regard to the state of facts now mentioned, does your Lordship conceive an adequate security could be afforded, otherwise than by the sort of test suggested in a former question, that test meaning a declaration of the faith of the party, involving in it a profession of belief in the great and leading principles of Christianity, as suggested in your Lordship's former answer?—The test would appear to be the most obvious and perfect security.

There is, however, a further state of facts that should be brought before your Lordship, which is, that the ministers of the Seceding Synod, who are upwards of 100 in number, all do subscribe the Westminster Confession of Faith, and are of course, every individual of them, if they are sincere, decidedly Anti-arian in their principles; does not your Lordship think, that although clothing the Synod of Ulster with the power of veto supposed, might prove an ineffectual security, that the giving a concurring power of veto to the Seceding Synod might prove much more successful for the object?—Those are points I have not had an opportunity of turning in my mind.

According to the regulations of the Belfast Institution, persons of all religious denominations may be educated there, and it has been stated to the Commissioners, that candidates, not only for the ministry of the Presbyterian Church, but for orders in the Established Church, are educated there; does your Lordship think, consistently with the security of the religion of the members of the Established Church, that the exclusive control over the appointment to the professorships should be vested in the Synod of Ulster, or the Seceding Synod?—It has occurred to me, that the Institution being of the comprehensive nature which it is, taking in the members of the Established Church amongst those to be educated by it, it would be right that the members of the Established Church should have the power of receiving instruction in divinity, upon those principles which the Established Church acknowledges; that they should have that power, if they are only members of the church, generally speaking; but if they are looking forward to be at any time ministers of the church, still more they should have the power. It is almost the only thing that had crossed my mind, as being one I should have been desirous of voluntarily submitting to this Board, whether it would be right or practicable that any provision of that kind should be made, under the patronage of His Majesty's Government.

Would your Lordship consider it expedient that there should be a Professor of Divinity, to be approved of by the Bishop of the diocese, or any other proper authority, for the education of the members of the Established Church?—I am giving an opinion individually. It has occurred to me, that it would be a desirable thing, if there were such a person connected with the Institution, and that person were to be approved of by the Ecclesiastical Visitors, who are placed by office in that situation, namely, the Primate, the Bishop of Dromore, and the Bishop of Down, to which persons, members of the Established Church, and still more desirable in the case of future ministers of the Established Church, might apply for the purpose of religious instruction. In making this observation, I am speaking in a particular situation, as the official guardian of the interests of the church in this diocese.

Is your Lordship aware what number of students there may be usually attending the Belfast Institution, with a view to the office of the ministry in the Established Church?—No, not at all. In conclusion, I beg to add, if the Board had called me into the room, and asked me whether I had any observation to make as to the Belfast Institution, I should have said, I was desirous of making only two remarks; one is, that there should be a guard thrown round the professorships of languages, so far as they were connected in any degree with religious instruction; that is to say, the professorships of Hebrew and Greek, so far as they are concerned in giving instruction in the Holy Scriptures; the other is, that it appeared to me a desirable thing that provision should be made in the Institution for religious instruction in the principles of the Established Church, looking upon this, when under the patronage of Government, as a National Institution, and therefore as a fit vehicle for instruction in the principles of the National Church.

Is there any further observation your Lordship would desire to take this opportunity of suggesting to the consideration of the Commissioners, connected with the Belfast Institution?—No, I am not aware of any other.

Appendix, No. 29.

Examination of the Right Rev. W. Crolly, D. D.; Saturday, 15th October, 1825.

Examination of Right Rev.
W. Crolly, D. D.
15 October 1825.

YOU are a Bishop in the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland?—Yes.

In what diocese?—In the united dioceses of Down and Connor.

How long have you filled that situation?—I have filled it as Bishop since the 1st of last May.

In what place was your ministry previous to that?—In Belfast, as parish priest.

How long had you officiated in Belfast as priest?—Nearly thirteen years.

Of course, you have had abundant opportunities of watching the rise and progress of the Belfast Institution?—Although it did not immediately concern me, yet I had an opportunity of making some observations upon it.

Can you inform us whether, at present, there are any young men of the Roman Catholic persuasion attending the Institution?—A considerable number of young men, belonging to my congregation in the town of Belfast, attend there at present; and I know there was one a candidate for holy orders, whom I have sent to the College of Maynooth from that Institution.

Are you aware of more than that young man who have been educated in the Institution, either in the collegiate or school department, who have subsequently become students at Maynooth?—Not before that one. My predecessor lived near Downpatrick, where there is an excellent classical school, in which the candidates for the priesthood were in general educated.

Is it your impression, that not more than one or two who have been students here, have subsequently gone to Maynooth?—Not more.

Is it your present impression, that any who are at present attending the collegiate or general class are likely to go to Maynooth?—I am not aware of more than one at present, but I dare say there will be many. I should suppose that the distinguished acquirements of the candidate who was educated there, will induce other young men to come to the Institution.

We should wish particularly for your opinion, as to whether there is any objection on your part to young men, who are ultimately to be sent to Maynooth, receiving education, in the first instance, in the Belfast Institution?—There is no objection on my part.

It is scarcely necessary to inquire from you, whether you think there is any practical danger of their religious principles being interfered with in any way in that Institution?—I do not think there is; I have had reasons calculated to prevent such apprehensions. Some Roman Catholic gentlemen have sent their children to this Institution, and although they were not of my parish, nor in my diocese, they were obliged to attend public worship in my congregation, and they always punctually attended to their other religious duties. These observations led me to think, that the masters of the Institution directed the Catholic pupils to pay particular regard to their religious and moral duties, so far from attempting to interfere with them.

Do you think it likely, that any danger can accrue to young men of Roman Catholic sentiments from mixing daily with those of other sentiments?—I do not think any danger of that sort occurs as long as they are under the inspection of their masters. It is probable that boys might insult one another, on account of their religious differences, in going to or returning from school; but while they were in the Institution, I am convinced that there was never the slightest reason to apprehend any danger from their mixture.

Have you ever heard it made a subject of complaint from any Roman Catholic, that the attendance of Roman Catholics in the Institution was attended with any danger to their faith?—I never heard of any complaint of the kind; if I had, I should have immediately interfered and investigated the business, because I could not conscientiously suffer any thing of the kind; but I never had reason to apprehend any thing of the sort.

We are to collect there is no sort of objection on your part to the attendance, at the Institution, of a young man, even though he should be destined for the Roman Catholic ministry?—None.

And, a fortiori, there is no objection to any person who intends himself for lay pursuits?—Not any objection; I might find it, perhaps, desirable to establish a diocesan seminary; and in that case I would, in all probability, give the preference to it, but until that time I would not make any objection to their going to the Institution; on the contrary, I think it is very correctly conducted.

Could you expect to establish a diocesan seminary which could be so useful, either in the extent of the education, or the number that could be received in it?—I do not think I could; but it might be perfectly adequate to all my purposes, and I could then combine religious instruction with other points of knowledge, so that it might be, upon the whole, more satisfactory; but as far as preparatory knowledge is the object, the candidates for the ministry could obtain it in the Institution as well as in a diocesan seminary.

Will you state in what manner, and to what extent, the young men in the Institution, of the Roman Catholic persuasion, receive religious instruction?—The only religious instruction they receive is, to attend at the explanation of the catechism and public worship regularly with others belonging to my congregation. I have a Sunday school in my chapel, for the purpose of making the younger portion of my flock acquainted with the doctrines of the Roman Catholic religion, and the principles of Christian morality. I expect that the pupils of the Institution will receive additional instructions from their respective pastors when they return home.

Have

337
Examination of
Right Rev.
W. Croll, D. D.
15 October 1825.

Have you ever understood, that what are sufficiently expressed by the term Orange principles have prevailed among the students in the Institution?—I do not recollect that I ever heard of any circumstance that would lead me to believe that Orange principles were cherished in the Institution.

Have you ever heard of any circumstance of offence towards Roman Catholics having originated from, or been encouraged, or taken place in the Institution?—I do not recollect any circumstance of the kind; I rather suppose, that there has never been any thing of the kind, except what I have stated among the boys themselves; that might happen any where.

And which you do not conceive has proceeded to any extent?—No; I have not been out of Belfast one month at a time these thirteen years, so that it would be almost impossible that any thing of this kind could be carried to any extent without my knowledge.

Are you personally acquainted with the several Professors?—Yes, with them all.

Have any of those persons ever conducted themselves in any way offensively towards persons of the Roman Catholic community?—No, quite the contrary; some of the Professors requested that I would provide copies of a Catholic version of the Scriptures, for the use of their Roman Catholic pupils; and though they were ministers of the Presbyterian church, I believe that they paid a proper and respectful attention to the religious principles of their Catholic scholars.

In what manner did you act upon that request?—I complied with it immediately.

Did you supply copies of the Roman Catholic version of the Scriptures to those boys?—Yes; all the boys belonging to my congregation, who attend the Institution, have the Roman Catholic version of the Sacred Scriptures. I provided a very cheap edition some years ago, and have now a stereotype edition of the same work.

With the notes to it?—Yes; I did not feel myself at liberty to make any alteration.

Was a considerable edition printed of it?—A great number; I have disposed of eight thousand copies through the assistance of a bookseller, who is a Protestant himself; but he has been very zealous in circulating the Roman Catholic version, and he has a very considerable number prepared now for circulation.

We should be glad to know your impression as to whether there is any spirit of disaffection to the Government, in any degree, however small, prevailing among the Teachers or the Professors in the Belfast Institution?—I do not believe there is, in any one instance. I do not know a Professor, nor do I know any person connected with the Institution, who is inimical to Government, or disaffected in any degree. I have had opportunities of meeting with them frequently; there was a circumstance that might lead people to think there was some disaffection.

State that circumstance?—A considerable number of gentlemen dined together on the anniversary of St. Patrick; the persons with whom it originated stated distinctly, that the object was merely to meet as Irishmen, in friendship and liberality, without any thing of a political nature; I know that distinctly; I was at the dinner myself, and I may say, without boasting of distinguished loyalty, that I would not have attended if there was any kind of disaffection to the Government. Having obtained permission from the stewards, I felt myself obliged to retire at a very early hour; but as long as I remained, there was not the slightest circumstance from which I could infer that any person in the company was disaffected.

Did that dinner appear to you, in any particular manner, to connect itself with the Institution?—One or two of the Professors of the Institution attended the dinner, and I believe some of the gentlemen that were Visitors or Managers; I do not know exactly what department they filled, but I suppose there might be a few from the different departments; I heard, that at a late hour there were some very offensive toasts proposed, that appeared to carry with them very strong marks of disaffection; they were opposed by some individuals, but they were urged by others who kept their intention a profound secret from those whom they invited, as I am willing to testify upon oath; the offensive toasts were afterwards published and attended with unpleasant circumstances, which were prejudicial to the Institution. But those gentlemen connected with the seminary, who had been at the dinner, resigned their places, in order to prevent any stigma which might be attached to its character. This is the only instance of apparent disaffection which came to my knowledge.

How long ago was this dinner?—Seven or eight years ago.

Do you think there is any considerable degree of disaffection prevailing at present among any order in Belfast?—I do not believe there is.

Did you ever know the country so occupied by all the pursuits of peace, as at present?—In this part of the country a spirit of industry has been almost uniformly cherished, but at no time more so than at the present. I have been lately in different parts of this diocese, and have nearly finished my visitation; during which I have discovered the lower classes of the people employed in the various departments of honest industry, and am satisfied that the remains of party spirit are subsiding very rapidly. I have reason to believe so from the testimony of gentlemen of different communions.

That observation is general, as to the counties of Down and Antrim?—Yes; it is general.

Is it your opinion, that the restoration of the bounty of Parliament to the Institution would be attended with good moral effects throughout the north of Ireland?—I should suppose so.

Do you think it would create a general feeling of gratitude and satisfaction in all the different classes of society here?—Yes; I am persuaded that it would create feelings of general satisfaction, at least in the town of Belfast; how far it might extend beyond the town,

Examination of Right Rev.
W. Croll, D. D.
15 October 1825.

I am not prepared to say. The Institution naturally affords greater advantages to this town than to any other place; I might have become one of its Managers if I had availed myself of the liberality of the Proprietors; but this appointment would be attended with duties which my other avocations would not allow me time to perform; I was therefore obliged to decline that honour. Although I wished the Institution to prosper, and am persuaded that as long as it shall be properly managed, it must be productive of the best effects.

Have you any thing to suggest, as to the management of the Institution, that you would wish to mention to the Commissioners?—I have nothing that I could venture to offer with respect to its management; I have visited it frequently, and have been very much pleased with the good conduct and progress of the scholars.

In general, do you think it desirable, or otherwise, that Roman Catholics should mix with Protestants, in general education, where proper guards are taken for the integrity of their religious principles?—I think it must be an effectual means of suppressing the spirit of party which has unfortunately prevailed in this country, particularly if proper precautions were taken to prevent any undue influence or predominant power on one side or the other. If the Belfast Institution were guarded against any preponderating influence, I think it would afford still greater advantages, as persons of every religious communion might mix together in it for the purposes of learning and liberality. The schools might be established according to the system recommended in your report. A seminary, protected from any predominant party, would provide masters of every communion, properly qualified, to carry on the work of education; and as the parochial schools will be supported by grants from Government, the masters appointed to conduct them should be selected with great care, and should be instructed where they would receive an enlightened and liberal education, in order that they might diffuse the spirit of virtue, learning and liberality among the pupils intrusted to their care. I think such a provision for the parochial masters would be a most desirable object, which might be effected in the Belfast Institution. But I apprehend, that Protestants and Roman Catholics will not attend this seminary with sufficient confidence, so long as it will be regarded, more or less, as a sectarian establishment; but if there was a provision for the education of Presbyterian clergy, it might be more advantageous to the town of Belfast and province of Ulster, that this should be exclusively a scientific Institution, in order that its beneficial effects might be diffused more generally through the entire community. But until the Presbyterian clergy shall be provided with other means for the instruction of their ministers, it is not my desire that there should be any separation between them and this Institution; but if there was an adequate provision for them, then I think that this Institution might be made a complete seminary of science.

At present it is treated as an Institution merely scientific, except with a chair of theology?—The chair of moral philosophy is more or less connected with and may be regarded as the entrance to theology; so that it also belongs to religion more than to science. An establishment in Belfast, for the purposes of scientific education, would completely carry into effect the general recommendation of the Commissioners of Education. As every impartial man must acknowledge, that this Institution is liberally conducted, the masters of parochial schools, after finishing their course of studies in Belfast, would carry with them the character and principles of liberality to those schools committed to their care. Parochial schoolmasters of every religious persuasion, prepared in this manner for the work of general instruction, after studying together, would co-operate more cordially in the different districts and parishes.

You consider the chair of moral philosophy as essentially connected with theology?—Perhaps not essentially, but it is more or less connected; and, consequently, it is very probable, that the Professor of Moral Philosophy would inculcate or encourage some theological principles rather than others; and I apprehend, that the chair of moral philosophy would not be so impartially filled by a Professor belonging to any particular church, as to afford general satisfaction to the students who were preparing for theology in other churches. A Roman Catholic Professor, in the chair of moral philosophy, might lean to some principles of the Roman Catholic theology, and a similar observation might be made with respect to a Protestant or Presbyterian Professor. If, therefore, the chair of theology be separated from the Institution, it might be as well to take the chair of moral philosophy along with it.

As there is no establishment in Ireland for the education of the candidates for the Presbyterian ministry exclusively, and as this Institution in some degree affords them the benefit of education for the ministry, do you conceive that the chairs of theology and of moral philosophy should be placed under the control of that body, so as to secure the Orthodoxy of the candidates for the ministry?—Yes, provided those two chairs were separated from the Institution; I think they ought to be exclusively under the direction of the Synod of Ulster, or those appointed by the Presbyterian body.

You would think those chairs should be placed under the direction of the Synod of Ulster, but that the other chairs should be open alike to all denominations?—Yes.

And being so open, you think that persons, candidates for the Roman Catholic ministry, and teachers for schools, such as are recommended by our report, might be beneficially educated there?—Yes; my opinion is, that after that separation, the candidates for the Protestant and Presbyterian ministry, and for the Catholic church, might all meet together, and be educated so far as science was concerned, and the masters for the parochial schools, throughout the province of Ulster, might be almost entirely educated there.

We understand you as being favourable to the system of united education, as tending to extinguish party animosities, and generating kindly feelings?—That is my opinion.

Would you think it expedient that the Hebrew chair, considering the questions to which some of the Hebrew texts give rise, should also be considered in some degree a theological chair,

339
 Examination of
 Right Rev.
 W. Crolly, D. D.
 15 October 1825.

chair, and separated from the Institution, and placed under the control of the two Synods?—I am not quite certain of that; I think it would be very hard to banish Hebrew from the field of general science; there have been disputes upon expressions in the Greek language, and in the Hebrew also; as therefore I would retain the Greek, I would retain the Hebrew also.

But retaining the Hebrew chair in the Institution, would you think it desirable, that the person who is to act as Professor of Theology in the instruction of candidates for the ministry, should also be their lecturer in Hebrew?—I should think it much more desirable, that the Professor who would fill that chair should be disengaged from the Presbyterian Theology as much as any other Professor. I think the chair should be merely for the study of the Hebrew; as I have already expressed my apprehensions that a Professor of Theology belonging to one church, could not afford satisfactory instruction to the students belonging to other churches.

The question meant this, that the person who should be Professor of Theology should be the person to give instruction in Hebrew to the candidates for the ministry, in another place, separate from the Institution, or, in other words, that the Professorship of Hebrew in the Institution should be as heretofore, open to all, but that the persons to be educated as Presbyterian ministers should receive their lectures in Hebrew from a person of their own body?—That I would leave to themselves; they might either send their candidates to study Hebrew under Professors who taught in the Institution, or to Professors of their own establishment.

But you consider that even the professorships that relate to science, as distinguished from divinity, should be confined to no particular class of Christians?—I think those departments should be open to every religious community equally.

To secure general satisfaction?—Yes.

Appendix, No. 30.

Examination of Sir Arthur Chichester, bart.; Friday, 14th October, 1825.

YOU are very well acquainted with Belfast and its vicinity?—I am.

You are a Vice President of the Belfast Institution?—I am.

And have been so for a number of years?—Yes.

We should be very glad for the communication of your opinion, as to the importance of the Belfast Institution?—As a means of general education, I have considered it an Institution of very great importance to this part of the country.

And viewed in another character, as an Institution to afford instruction to the future Presbyterian ministers of Ireland; we should be glad to have your opinion upon it?—I do not feel myself quite competent to give an opinion upon that; I do not know whether it is of very great importance that domestic education should exist for them. I know there is a difference of opinion upon that subject; I myself am not decided further than as a matter of economy; I conceive it would be an advantage.

You are of course perfectly conversant with what the feelings of the upper ranks of Belfast are as to the Institution?—The general opinion is decidedly in favour of maintaining the Institution, as a seminary for general education.

Is there a general wish that it should be connected with the Government, or would that circumstance be considered the subject of jealousy?—Not a subject of jealousy to be connected with the Government; but there is a certain feeling of independence among the Managers and the Proprietors of the Institution, which they would not like to surrender to the Government. I have frequently in conversation discussed the subject, and have endeavoured to impress those who have expressed their fears of an undue interference, with the idea, that there need not be any collision in sentiment between them and the Government; and I think there is not an irreconcilable difference on the part of those who are desirous of excluding the Government from authority.

Do you think there is any feeling of disaffection to the present order of things in Church and State, that prevails among those who are concerned in the management of the Institution?—I have not heard any direct opinion expressed on that subject.

Are you personally acquainted with any, or many of the Professors of the Institution?—I am not.

Are they generally supposed to be competent men in their situations; men of ability and learning?—I have always understood, perfectly.

Do you conceive that the Institution is generally popular throughout the middle ranks of society, as well as you have described it to be among the upper ranks?—I conceive it to be so; I do not know any thing to the contrary.

Do you think the restoration of the Government grant would produce an additional good feeling towards the Government of the country?—My feeling is, that it would be so, inasmuch as the grant being an annual one, the subject of the Institution would annually come under discussion, and the grant would be continued or withdrawn according to the effect it had in maintaining the Institution.

Is there any circumstance connected with the Institution, you would take this opportunity of stating to the Commissioners?—No; I am not aware of any particular circumstance; I would generally say, that I think an Institution of this nature has, in this part of the

Examination of
Sir
A. Chichester, Bart.
14 October 1825.

country, a very decidedly good effect; from the industry of the people here, there are many who have risen from the lower orders of life into a considerable degree of wealth; and I think it very desirable, that the education which could be afforded by this Institution should be easily attained, as many of those individuals afterwards take their places in situations in life, where they would find materially the advantages of a more enlarged system of education, than that which is adopted in common schools.

Appendix, No. 31.

Examination of Sir Robert Bateson, Bart.; Friday, 14th October, 1825.

Examination of
Sir
R. Bateson, Bart.

HAVE you for some years been resident near Belfast?—I have.
Do you hold any situation, such as President or Visitor, connected with the Belfast Institution?—Not at present. I have been Vice President, but vacated in rotation.

Have you been an observer of the progress of the Institution?—Only a general observer.

Is it your opinion, that its welfare is connected in any or what degree with the general prosperity of the North of Ireland?—I think very much so.

Do you consider it as materially influential, in its present situation, in the formation of the character of the North of Ireland?—Very much so.

Will you explain in what manner it appears to you to possess that character?—It appears to me, that an Institution where the clergy of the Presbyterian Church are to receive their education, is most important for the interests of the North of Ireland, and also, that a seminary of this sort will be productive of great advantage in general education throughout the country, and in bringing clever persons here as Professors, men of ability and reputation, from England and Scotland, perhaps, as well as from distant parts of our own country.

Have you heard it imputed to the Institution, that it has of late had a tendency to favor the introduction of Arians as Professors?—I have heard it from newspaper reports principally.

Are you able to express any definite opinion upon that point, of your own?—No; I cannot express any, as not being competent. I have not attended to the Institution since the discussion on that question arose. My information is only derived from the examination before the House of Commons of Dr. Cooke, the discussions at the Synod of Ulster, and the newspapers.

Is it your opinion, that it would be desirable, or otherwise, for the Institution to form a connection with the Government of the country?—I think it would be highly desirable.

Is there any particular mode of connection that appears to be desirable, beyond the mere grant of money to the Institution?—I think the grant of money would be very beneficial to the Institution, and would tend to cement the Institution with the Government of the country; and if a connection could be established between them, it would be beneficial to the country, as well as to the Institution; but I am not competent to point out exactly in what manner that connection, or that control, which Government ought to have, should be arranged.

Do you conceive, that the circumstance of a grant of money from the Government to the Institution, would tend, in any material degree, to improve the good feeling of the North of Ireland generally towards the Government?—I think it would be a most popular measure.

Is there any particular change in the constitution or government of the Institution you can suggest to the Commissioners, which, in your own view, might be considered an improvement?—I should rather decline doing so. I have not sufficiently attended to it, to enable me to venture to point out any particular alteration.

Do you consider the Professors, generally speaking, as a body, to be able men, and such as possess the public confidence, so far as you are aware, in this vicinity?—In general, I believe they are.

So far as your experience goes, can you express an opinion, whether the choice of any one of the present Professors, who happens to be an Arian, was influenced by the consideration of his being an Arian, or other considerations, as to his qualifications?—Certainly not from the consideration of his being an Arian, but from other considerations.

Will you excuse the liberty of our asking, whether you are yourself of the Established Church?—I am.

In all the elections you have attended, have those persons been appointed whom you thought were entitled to the appointment?—In general, they were.

Without favor or affection?—I should think so.

Appendix, No. 32.

Examination of Sir Stephen May, Bart.; Monday, 17th October, 1825.

Examination of
Sir
Stephen May, Bart.
17 October 1825.

WE should be much obliged to you to state your own opinion of the utility of the Belfast Institution?—My opinion is very favorable to the Institution, as it is at present established and managed. There was a time, I think, when there was an impression against it, but really I cannot say upon what, particularly, that impression was grounded, further than that some people had a lead in it who were considered inimical to the Government, but I think that feeling has entirely gone off.

About

341

About how long ago is the period to which you refer?—Ten years ago.

Do you consider that there is any feeling of dissaffection to the constitution among any of the Managers at present?—I do not.

Are they the same individuals now, whom you do not suspect, who were liable to the imputation ten years ago, or have the individuals then suspected ceased to have any connection with the Institution?—I think one of them has ceased to be concerned in the Institution.

Then we are to understand, that you think the others have changed their opinions for the better?—I think that very likely. It is very difficult to give an opinion upon the sentiments of individuals, but at least their political conduct has not been so marked of late as it was at that period. In fact, I believe all this unfavorable feeling arose from some sentiments and speeches delivered at a public dinner given here; a great deal of it broke out immediately, in consequence of that dinner, and the impression that was received in society of the character of two or three individuals that had a lead at that time in the Institution. I think myself, at present, that is done away with; and I think it is an establishment that is likely to do a great deal of good, and has done a great deal of good.

Do you find that the opinion of the upper ranks generally in this neighbourhood is favourable to the Institution?—I think it is.

Are you aware of any individuals of importance in the neighbourhood, who entertain feelings hostile to the Institution, and would rather that it did not exist?—Not at present.

Do you think it would be desirable to connect the Institution with the Government closer than it is at present; by connection we mean, investing the Government with some control?—I should think, as an individual, such Institutions ought all to be connected with Government.

Could you suggest to us any species of control you would yourself consider salutary?—That is a question I am not prepared to answer. There is a good deal to consider; there is the jealousy of the Proprietors. I am not prepared to point out the kind of control that might be established.

Is there any particular suggestion for the improvement of the Institution you would wish to take this opportunity of stating to the Commissioners?—I have not directed my attention particularly to it, and I cannot say that there is. I have heard it suggested, that it would be proper to have a Professor of Divinity for the Established Church. There would be no objection to such a professorship being established; it is open to any professorship of any religious persuasion; consequently, there need be no change made in the statutes and regulations of the society. It is only for an application to be made to the proper quarter, and the professorship would be admitted.

Should you consider it would produce a good moral effect throughout the North of Ireland, to restore the Government bounty to the Institution?—I have no doubt of it.

Examination of
Sir
Stephen May, Bart.
17 October 1825.

Appendix, No. 33.

Examination of Cunningham Greg, Esq.; Thursday, 13th October, 1825.

YOU are one of the Vice Presidents of the Belfast Institution?—I am.

Is there any communication you wish to make to the Commissioners in that character?—In consequence of being a Manager for a number of years, I have had an opportunity of seeing a good deal of the Institution, that is, in all the management part of it. I know nothing of it internally, except going through it to visit.

Has it on the whole commanded your approbation?—I think I never saw a set of people, Managers and Visitors, who took so strong an interest in an Institution in every respect, so that one is very much astonished to find men who have their own business to attend to, devoting so much of their time to the regulation of the Institution.

Have you observed whether, on elections, the electors have been guided by the real merits of the candidates?—In the election of candidates, I have never seen so strict an investigation as to morals and education, and every thing respecting them; and in all the time I was there, I never saw the least partiality shown to any individual of any religious persuasion.

Have you observed whether they were guided by their local feelings, or feelings of regard to the individual?—They were guided entirely by the testimonials.

Has it generally happened that Belfast men have been appointed to the situations?—No, because few offered themselves completely qualified. The persons who most crowded when there was an advertisement, were from Scotland.

Of course your observation enables you to inform us, whether a spirit of disaffection to the Government has been in any degree, in times past, the character of the Institution?—The only instance of that kind that occurred, to my knowledge, was the circumstance that induced the Government to withdraw the grant. There was a public dinner at one of the inns, at which I believe two or three of the Masters were present, and I also believe one or two of the Subscribers, and in consequence of some toasts given, there were some enemies of the Institution who reported things as having occurred that had no existence there; it was done over the bottle by one or two foolish men, particularly a schoolmaster, Mr. Knowles, was said to be concerned. The chairman had gone.

Was Mr. Knowles a schoolmaster in the Institution?—Yes.

Examination of
C. Greg, Esq.
13 October 1825.

Examination of
C. Greg, Esq.
13 October 1825.

Of which of the schools?—The English school in the Institution.

Was he continued Master of that school?—No, he was turned out.

Was it for having given that toast?—It was not immediately afterwards. I do not believe he was the person who gave the toast, but he was present.

Was it in consequence of what passed at the dinner he lost his situation?—Partly.

Did the dinner connect itself in any degree with the Institution?—Not at all; it was on St. Patrick's day. On such occasions, sometimes people meet and make fools of themselves.

Do you think there is at present any feeling of disaffection to the Government, that marks the character of any of the Professors or Managers of the Institution?—Not the least in the world. My general opinion of the Institution is, that at the time the Government withdrew the grant, we were all much displeased at it. I happened to be Chairman, and I told the Proprietors, perhaps it will not be so bad as it appears; if the Institution is managed upon the principle upon which it has been hitherto managed, and the Government withdraws its aid, you may call upon me for 100*l.* a year during my life.

Is it your opinion, that the restoration of the bounty of Government would have a salutary effect?—Yes, it would be universally gratifying to the principal people in the North of Ireland.

Do you conceive they would consider it reasonable to put the Institution, in any greater degree than has hitherto existed, under the control of Government?—I am of opinion, if the Institution is managed in the way it has hitherto been, it would be better managed than by Government having any control over it.

Do you conceive, that giving the Government a veto upon the appointment of all or any of the Professors, would be considered unacceptable by any or many of the persons concerned in the management of the Institution?—I think it would. Mr. Peel asked for twenty-four votes, who were to vote at all times by proxy.

The question does not refer to that, but merely a simple veto on the part of the Government, which, it may be very well understood, would not be exercised without some remarkable circumstance calling for it?—I should not, for myself, object to such a veto, because I know Government would never interfere, unless something highly improper should take place; for unless there was something notoriously bad, the Government could not have any knowledge of it.

Subject to that, should you have any objection to making the election subject to the approbation of the Government?—I have so high an opinion of the Government in every department, that if it was my own individual case, I should have no objection to it. I cannot speak for the body of the subscribers. I know the Government would not take any improper share in the management.

Have you heard of considerable religious jealousy having lately exhibited itself as to the Institution?—Yes, I have.

We should be glad to know your view of that circumstance?—It was respecting an Arian professor being appointed, Mr. Bruce. Mr. Cooke, a member of Synod, expressed his sentiments on said appointment in a very extraordinary and a very illiberal kind of way. My opinion is, that there is no religious animosity in the Institution.

It appears to us, the Institution may be susceptible of two characters; it may be considered on the one hand, as affording the means of education for the Presbyterian ministers of Ireland, and on the other hand, as dispensing the means of education to the community at large; which of those two characters do you consider the principal and the most important, supposing, but not implying, that it should be necessary to make an election between the two characters?—I think there is no partiality in the Institution between the instruction given to the public at large, and to those intended for the Presbyterian church in particular; the public have a much larger benefit from the Institution than the others can have.

You think it of more importance in its character, as dispensing education to the community at large, than for the ministers of the Presbyterian church?—I do.

Would you think it an unfortunate circumstance, if the Presbyterian Synods were, owing to any circumstances that had occurred, or might occur, respecting the religious differences, to disconnect themselves from the Institution, so far as not to receive the certificates of the Professors?—For my part, I think the Institution would be more beneficial to the public at large, but I do not consider the Synod of Ulster have that intention.

You belong to the Presbyterian community?—I do.

Of which Synod are you a member?—I belong to the Presbytery of Antrim.

We believe it has happened, in point of fact, that two of the three last Professors who have been appointed, are gentlemen who entertain Arian sentiments?—It is said so, and they do not deny it.

Are you aware, that the Divinity Professors, who are appointed by the Synod of Ulster and the Seceding Synod, entertain sentiments directly opposed to the Arian hypothesis?—It is understood so.

Should you consider it unreasonable, if it should appear that those gentlemen, or the Synods they represent, should view with jealousy the appointment of Arian Professors, and the possibility, at some future period, of all the chairs being filled by Arians, whatever causes may have led to the appointment of the two last?—There was no cause for the two last being appointed, but their being considered by the Managers best qualified, at least for the branches of education they were elected for. As to their being Arians, I do not think the matter was inquired into at all, nor have I found that it disturbed the harmony of the Institution.

Institution. For my own part, I do not care whether a man is an Arian or not, so long as he is a good Christian.

Are you aware, that one of the three last appointed was a member of the Established Church?—Yes; Mr. Stevelly, a member of the Established Church, has as good a chance as a Presbyterian, or a candidate of any other denomination.

In general, do you conceive that the Institution enjoys public confidence?—It enjoyed entire public confidence, until Mr. Cooke, and a party of his came forward, with misrepresentations. I understood that general confidence was entertained respecting it.

Do you conceive, that by confining the appointment of Professors to any particular religious denomination, benefit or mischief would be produced?—I think great mischief would be produced; the thing ought to be general.

What do you conceive would be the feeling of the Proprietors in general, with respect to any measures that should go to exclude persons of any particular religious opinions from professorships?—I think it would make a great number of them feel very unpleasantly, because the principles upon which Proprietors act here are perfectly liberal; and I have never known any thing particular of religious principles as having produced any bad effects in the Institution, and the Subscribers would consider it very improperly introduced.

While it is possible that particular members of the Synod of Ulster, holding what are called Orthodox doctrines, may object to the admission of persons to professorships who may not hold those doctrines, do you conceive it possible, or probable, that persons who do not hold Orthodox principles would feel equal objection, if the rejection of those principles was not a ground of objection?—It would make an unpleasant feeling with the Calvinists; they are wanting to grasp every thing. The Synod of Ulster would take the whole Institution into their power if they could.

If Calvinists should feel offended unless Arians were excluded, what would be the feeling of Arians if they were excluded?—A very unpleasant feeling to them and the public.

Which do you think the fittest, that all should be eligible, or some in particular ineligible?—I think all should be eligible.

Do you consider that the eligibility of all is likely to lead to the choice of Arians in preference to Calvinists?—I do not.

Should you think it unreasonable, that the appointment to those professorships, that connect themselves in any way necessarily with the education of students for the ministry, should be subject to the approbation of the Synod of Ulster and the Seceding Synod, it being understood, that the other professorships should remain free from their interference?—At present there is a person from the Synod of Ulster who attends, and has one vote.

One out of forty-four?—Yes; and they have the examination of those Professors; I think they ought to have the examination of any person going into the ministry.

The question is, whether you think it would be unreasonable that the appointment to any professorship, which necessarily connects itself with the study of divinity, should be subject to the approbation of the respective Synods of Ulster and of the Secession?—I think not.

Should you object to such an arrangement?—I should not.

Do you conceive, that any other professorship than that of divinity and church history should be considered an appointment over which the Synod of Ulster should have a direct control?—I certainly think they ought not to have any control over any except those connected with divinity.

For instance, the Professor of Moral Philosophy may make his course subservient to a wish to inculcate particular religious opinions, although such ought not to be his object?—He might do so.

Do you conceive, that because he might do so, and because he might teach doctrines that the Synod of Ulster might not approve of, that therefore the Synod of Ulster ought to have any control over his appointment?—I think, if any of the Professors were, in any of their lectures, to broach, in the remotest degree, anything tending to inculcate any particular religion, he would be dismissed immediately.

Under the head of misconduct?—Yes, and for acting contrary to the rule regularly laid down for his conduct in this respect.

Do you think that David Hume, if he had been Professor of Moral Philosophy, could, consistently with his views of these matters, possibly have delivered a course of lectures that would not have tended to the teaching infidelity, and been destructive of all religion?—It might have been difficult for him to do so, but he might do so. I think the Professors engage solemnly not to allow any religious opinions of theirs to be mentioned in their class in any way. I think he could avoid it.

Should you suppose it would be a sounder principle to invest the Synod with the power of keeping David Hume out of the chair, or trust to the Managers, in the exercise of their discretion, removing him?—There would be great certainty of the Synod keeping him out of it, and I think there would be very near as great certainty in the other case.

Suppose a person of such a character were to offer himself, do you think he would be elected?—I think he would not.

Therefore, though there is no rule that goes to exclude persons of Atheistical or Deistical principles, you think the feelings of the body would work such an exclusion, if such a candidate offered himself?—I do; I think any Professor, however great his ability, holding those sentiments, would not be elected.

Supposing, but not implying, that an arrangement should be adopted for restoring the annual grant to the Institution at all events, and further, of making a grant of a considerable sum of money for the purposes of building, once for all, upon the condition of an equal sum

Examination of
C. Greg, Esq.
13 October 1825.

being raised by private subscription, do you think there is at present such a feeling in Belfast and its vicinity, that persons would come forward with such subscriptions, to obtain so desirable a result?—I think the public feeling, respecting the Institution, is such, that they would not let it go to the ground for want of subscriptions.

The question is this, supposing it were thought necessary to expend 20,000*l.* upon additional buildings, do you think if it was proposed that Government should contribute as much as might be raised by private subscription, that in that case 10,000*l.* or any lesser sum, would be forthcoming from private sources?—I think not.

Do you think 5,000*l.* would?—My own opinion is, that money would not be raised to any extent in that way; but if the Institution was in that situation that they thought it was going to drop, I think money would be raised for it. The former subscriptions were very heavy; I believe I gave two hundred guineas to it; people gave so much money at first that I do not think they would come forward, unless the Institution was going to drop, and then I think they would.

Appendix, No. 34.

Examination of Charles Brownlow, Esq. M. P.; Friday, 14th October, 1825.

Examination of
C. Brownlow, Esq.
M. P.
14 October 1825.

ARE you a Manager or Visitor of the Belfast Institution?—I have the honour of being a Vice President of that Institution.

Have you taken any considerable personal share in its management;—No, I have not; I only became a Proprietor the other day.

From your situation, connected with the North of Ireland, you are of course acquainted with the general character it bears, and the degree in which it is esteemed by the inhabitants of the North, generally?—Yes, I am.

What do you conceive to be the character of the Institution?—I believe it to be an Institution very highly prized throughout the province of Ulster, and for the success of which the deepest interest is felt among all classes I have had an opportunity of conversing with on the subject.

Can you state any particular points of view in which it is considered important?—It is considered very important in bringing home a liberal and useful education to the doors of many persons, who under other circumstances would have been obliged to procure the education they now obtain here, in Scotland and elsewhere, which I conceive a great hardship.

Do you allude to those persons who are to become ministers in the Presbyterian communion?—Yes, that is the class I had particularly in my eye in my last answer; but I have also in view those persons, not less valuable, who are engaged in trade, agriculture, and mechanics, who have it in their power to obtain very valuable information from the Professors of the Institution in their public lectures.

What is your opinion as to the feelings of attachment, or otherwise, to the present order of things in Church and State, which prevails among the Managers and Conductors of the Institution?—The Managers and Conductors of the Belfast Institution, I believe are not a permanent body; they change every four years.

What is your own estimate of the character of those at present concerned in the management, in regard to the points referred to in the last question?—For my part, I have a conviction, that they are as strongly attached to the country, and the Government of the country, as any other body of men. I have this impression very strongly upon my mind; had it been otherwise, I should not have accepted the situation offered to me the other day, nor have become a Subscriber.

Is it your impression, it would be better to leave the Institution to its own resources, or to restore to it a degree of support from the Government of the country?—If you wish to render it as extensively useful as possible, a grant from the Government would conduce to that end; I believe its means of usefulness are contracted for want of funds.

Do you think that the restoration of that grant would be a popular measure throughout the North, amongst persons not immediately connected with the Institution?—I do not know any one step that could be taken by the Government of the country, that would be half so popular, or half so beneficial with regard to the attachment that may exist in this Institution to the Constitution in Church and State. I cannot suppose that the Primate of Ireland, and the Bishops of Down and Dromore, would have been appointed Visitors ex officio, if the Institution had been founded with a contrary design, than to foster feelings of attachment to the Constitution in Church and State.

Have you formed any opinion, as to whether it would be desirable that the Government should have any increased power of control over the Institution, for instance, having a veto as to the appointment of Professors?—I think if the Government were to make an annual grant, they would have a very sufficient control in the power of withholding that grant, if any thing appeared contrary to their ideas of what should exist. I think it would be better to leave the Institution to its self-government.

Do you not think, if the grant should be restored, as the consequence of this solemn inquiry into the nature of the Institution, that it would be practically very difficult, or almost impossible, for any future Government to withhold it?—No, I do not think so; the grant did exist and it has been withheld.

You have heard of imputations having been made with respect to the supposed Arianism of many of the persons connected with the Belfast Institution?—I have heard there were two Arians filling situations in the Belfast Institution; I never heard it imputed to more.

Do

345
 Examination of
 C. Brownlow, Esq.
 M. P.
 14 October 1825.

Do you consider that a circumstance, the recurrence of which it would be desirable in any manner to guard against for the future?—I do not know in what manner you could guard against it, unless you made the religion of the candidate to fill a particular situation, the standard by which you would judge him, which I should think most undesirable, and as a Proprietor, should resist.

Do you think such would be a beneficial arrangement?—I think it would be in complete opposition to the principle on which the Institution was founded, which was that of entire neutrality in regard to religion.

The question is, whether it might or might not be desirable to revise and alter that original principle, so far at least as Arianism is concerned?—I do not see in what manner you could modify that rule with regard to Arianism, unless you call for a declaration of his religious principles from every candidate to fill a particular situation in the Institution. I believe what renders this Institution peculiarly popular in the province of Ulster, is this very circumstance, that the population of the province of Ulster is split into an almost endless variety of religious creeds, and that all may come here without being asked what religious principles they hold, and therefore it found favour with all on the ground of its complete neutrality on religious subjects.

Does it appear to yourself, that it is highly desirable or possible that that neutrality should be observed in an Institution that professes to educate the ministers for the Presbyterian Church?—Certainly, not desirable, so far as the lectures may be calculated to influence the religious principles of the pupils; but perhaps the Commissioners are aware that the Professors of Theology are appointed by the bodies themselves.

Do you think it would be unadvisable, to grant to those same Synods any further influence in the appointment of any other Professors, or at least such Professors as deliver courses of lectures immediately connected with the pursuits of the divinity students, for instance, the Professors of Hebrew and Moral Philosophy?—For my own part, as a Proprietor, if Hebrew and Moral Philosophy are exclusively connected with the study for Divinity, I should have no objection to give it; but I think from the spirit I have witnessed at the meeting here, on the part of the Proprietors, with respect to any further interference on the part of the Synod of Ulster, there would be a very strong disposition to resist it.

Do you think the Proprietors are more jealous of the Synod or the Government?—I could not say; I think there is a great anxiety on the part of the Proprietors to adhere to their original rules, and that it is a matter of indifference to them, whether those original rules should be broken in upon by Government or the Synod.

In case the Synods should see cause to withdraw altogether from the connection with the Belfast Institution, would you still consider it a fit object for the aid of Government, viewed in reference to its other objects, than those of preparing candidates for the Presbyterian ministry?—Yes, I would; I think there is a very thick and growing population in the province of Ulster, which calls very much for that species of useful, and liberal and practical education, which is to be had at the Institution.

Would you in that case be for Government undertaking to found similar Institutions at Cork, and Limerick, and Waterford, and other considerable towns of Ireland?—Perhaps not to found similar Institutions; but if similar Institutions were to spring up in each of the other provinces, I should conceive it to be a very desirable circumstance, and which a paternal Government would look at with the greatest pleasure. Private subscriptions have been raised here to a very great amount, larger than were ever made in any other part of the empire, for a similar Institution; and if they were to spring up in other parts of Ireland, backed by such private subscriptions, and to seek support from Government, it would be desirable they should have it.

Is it your opinion, that the Belfast Institution will continue to be maintained, whether the Government make any grant to it or not?—Most decidedly; I believe it will exist, whether they receive aid or not; but it will exist on a much more contracted scale, and the means be very limited of conferring education.

And perhaps with feelings of alienation rather than attachment?—Certainly, I do think the present is a very favorable opportunity for cultivating a connection with this Institution, and bringing up the youth of the country in a feeling of gratitude to the Government.

Do you conceive it to be a fundamental principle of the Institution, that it should be open to persons of all religious denominations?—That is the leading principle of the Institution, to nationalize education, by admitting all Christian communities indifferently within its walls.

Do you conceive, if any of the professorships, which are necessarily attended upon by persons intended for lay professions, as well as clerical, should be confined to persons of one denomination, that that fundamental principle could be faithfully maintained?—Certainly not.

Upon a general view of the Institution, and its objects and effects, at present, which would you prefer, that it should remain under the present system, or that the system should be altered, so as to give increased influence to any particular religious body?—I conceive the very end of the Institution would be completely defeated, if you gave a preference to any particular Christian community.

You of course mean, that the Divinity class should continue, as it has hitherto been, under the Professors appointed by the respective Synods?—Certainly; the Synods could not be satisfied with less.

Appendix, No. 35.

Examination of John Agnew, Esq.; Friday, 14th October, 1825.

Examination of
John Agnew, Esq.
14 October 1825.

YOU are Sovereign of Belfast?—I am.

And as such an official Visitor of the Belfast Institution?—I am.

Since what period have you held the office of Sovereign of Belfast?—I was elected the 24th of June, 1823; I resigned on the 23d of April, 1824, and I was again elected on the 2d of November following, since which I have held that office.

Prior to your becoming thus officially Visitor, had you any particular connection with the Belfast Institution?—Not any.

Have you, subsequently to your appointment as Visitor, had any material degree of intercourse with it?—Very little.

Can you speak, generally, as to what character it possesses in the town of Belfast and its neighbourhood?—Its character is very favourable.

Is it your own impression, received from your communications with others, that it is an Institution, in its present form, and under its present management, deserving of public encouragement, or otherwise?—It is my own opinion, from what I have heard amongst the inhabitants of respectability in the neighbourhood, that it is an Institution that should be encouraged.

You are, of course, very extensively connected in society with all the aristocracy in this part of Ireland; in the course of your communications with them, have you observed, amongst any particular individuals, any sentiments of disapprobation of the Belfast Institution?—I have, owing to the Parliamentary grant, which they formerly had, having been withdrawn; this disapprobation was, I think, without just cause. Indeed, on inquiry, I could never accurately ascertain why the grant was withdrawn.

Do you mean, that the circumstance of the withdrawing of the grant has led some of your friends to believe there was some good reason for doing so?—Certainly; but I see none.

Are you aware of any person, who founding himself upon his own opportunities of observation, has expressed any disapprobation?—No; with justice I have never heard an observation made unfavourable to the internal arrangement of it by any of my acquaintance.

Have you ever heard it imputed to the Institution, that it has a tendency to entertain views of disaffection towards the present constitution in church and state?—I have heard that there were individuals in the Institution who differed with the Government of the country in politics, and were not friendly to the constitution; but I never understood that they had interfered with the internal arrangement of the Institution.

Is it your opinion, that any such individuals are concerned in the management of it at present?—No, not to my knowledge.

Then we are to understand, that such individuals were connected with it in times past, but not now?—So I have heard; but though they differed in politics, they were all united with regard to the welfare of the Institution; all of them, I conceive, had it at heart; they did not wish to allow political feelings to interfere with the good government of the Institution.

Do you conceive it would be acceptable, or otherwise, to the gentry in the neighbourhood, that the Institution should again become the object of Government favour?—That is my impression; I think, if it were recommended by the Commissioners to the Government to regrant the sum it did before, or a greater, it would meet with the general approbation of the gentry of the country, and others, well-wishers of education.

Do you think there is any wish among the gentry, that the constitution or government of the Institution should be any way improved?—I am confident they wish it to be rendered as perfect and as durable as possible, and also to receive Parliamentary support; the general utility of it is acknowledged in the country, and I think the present moment is a very critical one to the Institution; and that all those who do wish it well, would wish such real improvements to be adopted as may be recommended by the Commissioners of Education Inquiry; should they disapprove of it, I think many would withdraw from it their favourable opinion and support.

Do you think, if the Commissioners were to recommend any moderate change in the nature of its management, there would be a general tendency to acquiesce in whatever might be their recommendations?—I have no reason to think otherwise.

Appendix, No. 36.

RESOLUTIONS for the Appointment of a BOARD OF FACULTY, in the Belfast Academical Institution, adopted by the Joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, the 17th February, 1818, and confirmed by the Proprietors, 5th March, 1818.

Resolutions for Appointment of Board of Faculty in Belfast Academical
Institution.

RESOLVED, That the Board of Faculty should consist of the Professors of the Institution in the collegiate department, for the time being, including the Professors of Theology and Church History, appointed to lecture in the Institution.

Resolved, That we consider a Board of Faculty, thus constituted, fully competent to superintend the literary concerns of the collegiate department of the Institution.

Resolved, That the senior Professor, reckoning from the date of his appointment, should be the first President of the Board, to continue in office for one year, after which the office office should be filled by the Professor next him, in order of appointment, and so on in rotation.

Resolved, That the Board of Faculty should be empowered to take cognizance of every thing connected with the literary pursuits and moral discipline of the collegiate department of the Institution; to regulate the course of studies to be pursued, and to direct the formation of new classes, when necessary, with the concurrence of the Joint Boards of Managers and Visitors; to appoint the hours for the meeting of the several classes, and the time and order of public examinations; and finally, to adjudge premiums, sign the testimonials given to students at the close of the collegiate course, in the presence of the Managers and Visitors specially summoned for that purpose, and to enforce discipline by such fines and punishments as they may deem proper.

Resolved, That the Board of Faculty should meet in the Institution once a week during the college session, and as often during vacation as they shall see fit, no meeting to be competent to transact business unless three members be present; and that they may hold extraordinary meetings during the session or in vacation, giving such notice as they may deem right, the quorum to be the same as at ordinary meetings.

Resolved, That on the second Wednesday of October in each year, the Board of Faculty should meet to make arrangements for the ensuing session, of which meeting the Secretary shall give each member one week's notice.

Resolved, That the minutes of the Board of Faculty shall be duly entered in a book kept for that purpose, in order to afford to the Boards of Managers and Visitors such information as they may require.

Resolved, That in case any difference of opinion should arise in the Board of Faculty, which they cannot amicably settle, the same shall be referred to the Joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, specially summoned for that purpose to decide thereon.

(signed) Joseph Stevenson, Sec

PLAN for the Regulation of the SCHOOL DEPARTMENT, prepared by the Masters of the Institution, and agreed to by the Joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, 20th June, 1818, and confirmed by the Proprietors, 7th July.

REGULATIONS for the establishing of a Board for the Management of the Schools in the Belfast Academical Institution.

First.—THAT the Masters of the several schools be formed into a Board, to be called "The Board of Masters of the Belfast Academical Institution."

Second.—That the Board shall be empowered to make and enforce such regulations as they may deem necessary for maintaining order, discipline, and propriety of conduct among the pupils of the school department, to fix the time and order of the public examinations, and in general to take such measures respecting the internal management and regulation of the schools, as they may consider likely to contribute to the advantage of the pupils, and to the respectability and welfare of the Institution.

Third.—That the senior Master, in order of appointment, shall be the first President of the Board, to continue in office for one year, from the opening of the schools after vacation in August next, after which the office shall be filled for the same period by the master, who is next in seniority of appointment, and so on in rotation.

Fourth.—That any Master shall be allowed to decline the office of President, on assigning such reasons as shall satisfy the Board. In this case, the same provisions shall exist for filling the office, as in ordinary cases.

Fifth.—That besides presiding at the meetings of the Board, the President shall also preside at the common hall; in case of his absence, his duties shall be performed by the Master present, who is next to him in seniority of appointment.

Sixth.—That the Board shall meet as such at each meeting of the common hall. Extraordinary meetings may also be held as often as they may be judged necessary, such notice being given as may hereafter be agreed on by the members. No meeting shall be competent to transact business, unless three members be present.

Seventh.—That the Board shall appoint a Secretary, who shall enter minutes of their proceedings in a book kept for that purpose; he shall also enter in the same book the names of the pupils who obtain premiums, and an account of any other proceedings, of which the Board may think it necessary to keep a record. In another book he shall enter the names of all the pupils in the school department, with the dates at which they enter and leave the several schools.

Eighth.—That both the above books shall be shown to the Managers and Visitors at their second stated meeting, after the public examinations, and at all other times when they may require it, that they may be fully acquainted with the proceedings of the Board of Masters, and with the state of the schools.

Ninth.—That in case any difference of opinion should arise in the Board of Masters, which they cannot amicably settle, the same shall be referred for decision to the Joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, specially summoned for that purpose.

Tenth.—That the Board of Masters shall be empowered to make, for the regulations of their meeting and for other purposes, such additional rules as they may consider necessary; provided always, that such rules shall contain nothing contrary to these resolutions, or to any enactment of the Managers and Visitors.

(signed) Joseph Stevenson, Sec^y.

Appendix, No. 37.

State of the SCHOOL DEPARTMENT in the Belfast Academical Institution,
October 1825.

BELFAST ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION.

School Department:

School Department
in the Belfast Aca-demical Institution,
October 1825.

IN consequence of several changes having taken place among the Masters of the schools, only two of those originally appointed being at present connected with the seminary, it is impracticable to furnish a satisfactory return of all the scholars that have received instruction in the schools since the first opening of the Institution. The following returns exhibit the number of pupils that have attended each of the present Masters since his appointment.

English School:

The present Master commenced teaching in the beginning of November 1817. Since that time upwards of 800 distinct pupils have been under his care, and of these 49 are known to have acted as teachers.

Writing School:

Since February 1814, when the present Master entered on his situation, the number of distinct pupils in the school has been 1,391. Of these, 51 are known to have been teachers.

Mathematical and Mercantile School:

This School opened under the present Master in February 1814, and has contained, up to the present time, 1,368 distinct pupils.

In this School, and in the Mathematical Classes in the college department, which are taught by the same person, 189 individuals have received instruction, who are known to have acted as teachers.

Classical School:

The present Master entered on the situation in August 1821; the number of pupils since that time has been 388, of whom 17 were students in the college department, 26 have entered Dublin college, of whom eight, at least, have distinguished themselves by obtaining premiums, and six obtained Hebrew premiums at entrance. The number of teachers cannot be accurately determined.

French School:

Since the appointment of the present Master in February 1819, the French School has been attended by 237 pupils of the school department, and by 68 students of the college department; total, 305. Of the students, 21 have since become teachers of French.

Italian School:

Since the School opened under the present Master, in November 1820, it has been attended by 17 pupils, two of whom have since become teachers of Italian.

Drawing School:

This School was opened under the present Master in November 1820, and has been attended by 58 pupils.

Spanish School:

This School has been attended by 21 pupils since its opening in November 1820.

REMARKS:

1.—Many of the pupils, in each of the foregoing returns, were at the same time attending some of the other schools.

2.—There is reason to believe, that the number of Teachers that have attended each of the Masters is considerably greater than would appear from the foregoing returns, as the pupils, after leaving the Institution, become widely scattered, and their situations in life are in a great many instances unknown to their former Teachers.

3.—Besides the pupils mentioned above, as having become students of the University of Dublin since August 1821, many others entered from the Institution before that date, and in many instances distinguished themselves, both in science and classics; three of them are at present studying for fellowships.

James Thomson,

President of the Board of Masters.

Joseph Stevenson, Secy.

October 15th, 1825.

Appendix, N° 38.

EXTRACTS from a Work entitled "The Constitution and Discipline of the Presbyterian Church, published by authority of the General Synod of Ulster."

JURISDICTION OVER STUDENTS.

TO the Presbytery belongs the right of receiving under their care, candidates for the ministry, and of superintending and directing their education; judging of their qualifications for the work, and of licensing them to preach the Gospel.

When a candidate applies to be taken under their care, the Presbytery shall observe the following

Extracts, entitled
"The Constitution and Discipline of the Presbyterian Church."

RULES :

1.—A certificate of the session of the congregation to which he has belonged, given at a regular meeting, shall be required, stating their conviction of his prudence, piety, and moral character. This certificate to be signed by the Minister and Session Clerk.

2.—In case of any student desiring to be taken under the care of a Presbytery, to which his Minister does not belong, he shall not be admitted, until he shall first have obtained the recommendation of his Minister. In case of vacancy, a certificate must be obtained from the session of the congregation to which the student belongs.

3.—If a satisfactory account be obtained, the student shall receive from the Presbytery, a certificate directed to one of the Synod's committees of examination.

4.—Each student on his return from college, for the first time, shall deliver to his Presbytery, the certificate of the committee of examination.

5.—Every student, immediately on his return from each session of college, shall deliver to his Presbytery, a certificate of attendance from the Professor under whom he shall have studied, testifying his attendance from, at least, the 10th of November till the 1st of May, otherwise the certificate shall not be received as evidence of his having attended a session at college. All certificates shall be regularly entered by the clerk, in the Presbytery book. The entry shall run thus:—Received certificates from A. B. signed by C. D. Professor of _____, in _____, testifying that A. B. had attended from _____ until _____, and that his moral conduct was becoming his Christian profession.

E. G. Presbytery Clerk.

6.—Each student shall, during the continuance of his college course, be examined at the August meeting of Presbytery, in each year, after his return from college, on the science he has studied during the session; and in order to ensure an early and continued attention to the sacred Scriptures, every candidate for the ministry shall, on his return from college for the first time, be examined upon the first five books of the Old Testament; on his return the second time, on the books from Joshua to Job inclusive; on his return the third time, upon the remaining books of the Old Testament; after his return the fourth time, upon the Evangelists and Acts of the Apostles; and on his return the fifth time, on the remainder of the New Testament.

7.—Students neglecting to attend to submit their certificates, and be examined, (as required in rules 4 and 5), shall forfeit the session of college; and Presbyteries neglecting to examine, shall be censured.

8.—To ensure the attendance of Examinators, Presbyteries shall appoint, at one of their meetings, during a recess of Synod, Examinators for the year. Each Examinator shall, under pain of censure, be bound to attend, or have some one, by appointment, to examine in his stead.

9.—Presbyteries shall prescribe to their students a course of classical reading during vacation, and direct their attention to civil history, Jewish antiquities, and Bible criticism, and shall require them to give evidence of diligence, by producing essays, and submitting to examinations.

10.—Presbyteries shall require of all students under their care, specimens of elocution, composition, and devotional exercises; and shall receive at least one specimen in each department, during vacation, from every student under their care.

OF FIRST TRIALS.

1.—THE Holy Scriptures require that careful trial be made of those who are to be ordained to the ministry of the word, 1 Tim. 16, 2 Tim. ii. 2, Acts v. 5; and though one of the chief qualifications of a minister be his talent for public instruction of the people, yet the Presbytery are not to rest satisfied with the mere learning of candidates, but are carefully to inquire into their moral character, and personal religion.

2.—Students of whom the Presbytery have received a satisfactory account; and who have studied one session in Hebrew, Theology, and Church History, may be entered upon first trials; but no student shall be entered, unless two-thirds of the Presbytery concur in his reception.

3.—The Presbytery shall prescribe to every candidate, at least, the following trials:—

A sermon on a given text to be delivered in private; after the delivery of this discourse, the candidate shall be examined on English Grammar, Geography, Roman and Grecian History,

Extracts, entitled
"The Constitution and Discipline of the Presbyterian Church."

History, Elocution, and Logic. A book of Scripture shall then be specified, upon which he shall be examined after the delivery of his next discourse, viz.—

A lecture upon some portion of Scripture. For the lecture the following plan is recommended to the adoption of the student:—1. State the general design of the writer; and explain the connection of the passage with the context.—2. Critically examine the meaning of particular phrases or verses.—3. Illustrate the connection which the several verses have amongst themselves, shewing those verses which treat of the same topic.—4. Give a general summary of the design of the whole passage, whether in order of doctrine, narrative, argument, or precept.—5. Illustrate the practical inferences from the subject. The candidate shall now be examined on Old Testament History and Moral Philosophy, and another book of Scripture shall be pointed out for examination after the next piece of trial.

The student shall be required to give an exercise and addition. The plan of this discourse is as follows:—1. Critically analyse and explain the text from the original.—2. Point out and remove textual difficulties, if any occur.—3. Paraphrase the text; these three parts have been termed the exercise.—4. Propose and discuss one or more of the doctrinal propositions, contained in the passage; this part has been termed the addition.

After delivering this discourse, the candidate shall be examined on New Testament, History, and Natural Philosophy; and another book of Scripture shall be pointed out for the next examination.

The Presbytery shall prescribe a question upon some common head of divinity. The plan of this discourse is as follows:—1. State the question.—2. Explain the terms.—3. State different opinions.—4. Declare that one which appears most agreeable to truth, support it by appropriate arguments, and illustrate it by some portion of Scripture, which may be assumed as a text.—5. Answer objections.

After delivering this discourse, the candidate shall be examined in Hebrew and Church History; and another book of Scripture shall be specified for examination.

The Presbytery shall next prescribe a text, from which the candidate shall deliver a sermon. After delivering this discourse, he shall be examined in Theology, and the rules for composing sermons.

4.—The several examinations on Scripture shall include reading the Hebrew or Greek original, and the general topics of biblical criticism, and theological illustration.

5.—The Presbytery shall privately criticise each piece of trial in the presence of the candidate, that he may profit by their observations, and explain, if requisite.

6.—After at least, 18 months employed in these trials, during which time he shall have studied a second session under some Professor of Theology, the candidate may be licensed to preach the Gospel.

THE COMMITTEES OF EXAMINATION are appointed to examine all Students before first entering College, or finally entering a Theological Class, as Candidates for the Ministry.

WHEREAS it is to be lamented, that Presbyteries have often allowed students to enter college, who were by no means properly qualified; and whereas it must be acknowledged, that for want of having a solid foundation laid by a school education, youths of naturally excellent parts are disqualified, in a great degree, for making a due progress in their future studies; and whereas it is to be lamented, that students have often, after passing through a few years attendance at college, been allowed to proceed in trials for preaching, even when their unfitness has been discovered by Presbyteries, who, having neglected to arrest them in time, now plead, in favour of their license, a regard to the feelings of their parents, and to the already incurred expense of their education; and whereas, there is good reason to believe, that those evils, in a great degree, may be attributed to the partial and local feelings of ministers attached to the children of their own people, or afraid to give them offence by what they might fancy severity of examination: Therefore, to remedy these evils, it is resolved and agreed to, that students intended for the ministry shall, previously to their first going to college, and again previously to entering a theological class, be examined in the prescribed branches, by one or other of four committees, formed in the following manner: One Committee shall be composed of examiners, appointed by the Presbyteries of Templepatrick, Belfast, Bangor, and Dromore; to meet at Belfast, and be denominated, "The Belfast Examination Committee." A second shall be appointed by the Presbyteries of Dublin, Monaghan, Armagh, Tyrone, and Clogher; to meet at Aughnacloy, and be denominated "The Aughnacloy Examination Committee." A third shall be appointed by the Presbyteries of Letterkenny, Strabane, and Derry; to meet at Strabane or Derry, and be denominated, "The Strabane or Derry Examination Committee." A fourth shall be appointed by the Presbyteries of Route and Ballymena; to meet at Ballymoney, and be denominated, "The Ballymoney Examination Committee." A Presbytery, consisting of not more than ten congregations, shall appoint two examiners; one of fifteen congregations, shall appoint three; and one of twenty congregations, and upwards, shall appoint four examiners. These Committees are to meet every year, on the second Thursday of October, and shall annually report to the Synod the names of such young men as they have examined and approved. Each candidate shall be examined by that Committee to which his Presbytery is attached; and those sessions only shall be sustained by a Presbytery, which he shall have passed at college subsequently to his approval and examination by such Committee.

Students about to enter college for the first time shall appear before their respective Examination Committees. When a Committee approves, they shall grant a certificate in the following words, viz.:—

We

351

We do hereby certify, that A. B. appeared before us at ———, with a recommendation from the Presbytery of ———, and that having been duly examined on the following subjects, viz.—1. In reading English, and in English Grammar;—2. Geography;—3. Sacred History, Roman and Grecian History;—4. In the Latin and Greek Languages, viz. in Virgil, Horace, Sallust, and Cicero de Officiis; Greek Testament, Homer, and Zenophon's Cyropædia, and that they read before us a portion of each of the said authors; and that having prescribed a subject for a theme upon a familiar topic, the writing, orthography and composition of which we have considered in determining upon his qualifications, we are of opinion that said A. B. is qualified to commence his philosophical studies.

Extracts, entitled "The Constitution and Discipline of the Presbyterian Church."

C. D. Mod. of Ex. Com.

Students desiring to enter a theological class, shall appear before one of the Synod's Committees of Examination, and there having produced certificates of attendance, during full sessions, upon Professors of Greek, Logic, Moral Philosophy, and Natural Philosophy; and a certificate of regular attendance for at least six months, upon some Professor or Teacher of Elocution; likewise a degree in arts from some university, or a general certificate in science from the Belfast Academical Institution, signed by the Moderator of the Synod, he shall be examined in Latin, Greek, Logic, Moral Philosophy, Mathematics, and Natural Philosophy. On receiving a certificate of approbation from the Committee, the candidate shall be admitted to become a student of theology, under the care of the Synod; nor shall the Professor, under the superintendence of the Synod, enrol any student until said certificate shall have been produced; and any session spent in the study of theology, before a student shall have obtained his certificate, shall not be received as qualifying him for entering upon judicial trials before a Presbytery.

Students of universities, whose discipline requires that a theological class be attended before graduation, shall, on producing their degree and certificate of attendance on a Professor of Theology, and undergoing examinations, be permitted to enter upon first trials, but shall not be licensed until they have studied theology two years, and have completed their fifth year in the university, or Synod's theological class.

Should any student have commenced his studies without a view to the ministry, and afterwards desire to become a candidate, he (after having received the approbation of a Presbytery, together with their declaration, that he, so far as they have reason to believe, had not commenced his studies with a view to the ministry) shall submit his certificates to the Committee of Examination, who shall examine him as a student going to college for the first time; and then if they approve, and he have already studied three sessions, he may be examined (as in rule 20th) for entering the theological class.

Students from other religious bodies shall, after having satisfied a Presbytery as to their motives in desiring to join the General Synod, submit themselves to a Committee of Examination, in the same manner, and under the same regulations, as students who have not commenced their studies with a view to the office of the ministry.

Students who have studied at seminaries not being universities, and which are not immediately under the inspection of the Synod, may yet be received as candidates for the ministry, on being recommended to the Synod by a Presbytery, as well qualified for becoming candidates for the Gospel ministry. If the Synod approve, they shall be required to attend one of the Committees of Examination, previously to entering into the Synod's theological class; or if they have already studied languages, philosophy and theology five years, they may, after the aforesaid examination, be entered upon first trials.

Appendix, No. 39.

EXTRACTS from the "Minutes of a General Synod, held at Ballymena, 1826."

Sixth Session:—Thursday, 29th June, 2 o'Clock, Afternoon.

THE Committee appointed to negotiate with the Proprietors of the Belfast Institution, respecting the recognition, by a bye-law, of the Overture agreed to by the Synod of 1825, relative to election to Professorships connected with the Students of this Church, made the following Report:—

Extracts from the "Minutes of a General Synod held at Ballymena, 1826."

The Committee appointed by the General Synod to negotiate, &c. having been convened in Belfast by the Moderator, on the 29th of September 1825, the following Members attended:—

Presbyteries.	Ministers.	Elders.
Clogher - - -	—	—
Route - - -	Mr. John Whiteside -	—
Monaghan - - -	—	—
Tyrone - - -	- Robert Hogg -	Mr. Pattison,
Armagh - - -	- Arthur Nelson -	—
Strabane - - -	- William Porter -	- William Moody.

(continued.)

Extracts from the
"Minutes of a
General Synod held at Ballymena,
1826."

(continued.)

Presbyteries.	Ministers.	Elders.
Derry - - - -	Mr. George Hay - -	Mr. James M'Crea.
Templepatrick - -	- Nat. Alexander - -	- M'Cauley.
Belfast - - - -	- Henry Haslet - -	- Jackson.
Bangor - - - -	- H. Montgomery - -	- Hunter.
Dublin - - - -	- Carlile - -	- Birch.
Ballymena - - - -	- Robert Stewart - -	Dr. Patrick.
Letterkenny - - -	- Edward Reid - -	-
Dromore - - - -	- Henry Cooke - -	- S. R. Rowan.
Connaught - - - -	-	-

Resolved, That our Moderator be instructed respectfully to request the Proprietors of the Belfast Academical Institution to authorize by a bye-law, or by such other mode as may be consistent with the Act of Incorporation, the Joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, whenever a Professor is about to be chosen, to give notice of the day of election to the Moderator of the Synod, in sufficient time for him to convene a Committee of the Synod in Belfast, and to afford to the said Committee access to the testimonials of the different candidates, for the purpose of forming an opinion respecting the qualifications of such candidates; which opinion, the Moderator is directed to communicate to the electors, specifying those candidates whom the Committee consider eligible.

Resolved, That the members of the Committee shall forthwith repair to the Belfast Academical Institution, and that the foregoing Resolution shall be communicated by the Moderator to the Court of Proprietors now assembled in the hall of that seminary.

[Adjourned till to-morrow morning, at eight o'clock.]

Second Session of Committee:—September 30th, 8 o'clock, morning.

Resolved, THAT the Moderator be instructed to write to the Secretary of the Belfast Academical Institution, and inform him, that the Committee of Synod will meet this day, at 10 o'clock, forenoon, to receive the reply of the Proprietors, to the communication which was yesterday made to that body.

[Adjourned till 10 o'clock.]

Third Session of Committee:—September 30th, 10 o'clock, forenoon.

THE following Communication was received by the Moderator in reply to the resolution of the Committee, which was yesterday submitted to the consideration of the Court of Proprietors of the Belfast Academical Institution:—

Belfast Academical Institution, Court of Proprietors, 29th Sept. 1825.

Most Noble the Marquis of DONEGALL, President, in the Chair.

Resolved, THAT the following Communication be made to the General Synod of Ulster:

The Proprietors of the Belfast Academical Institution have received the Communication from the General Synod of Ulster with all due respect, and a sincere wish to cultivate a connection so beneficial to both bodies.

As to the education of their Students of Divinity, they conceive that the Synod are in possession of the influence which they desire, inasmuch as they have the appointment of a Professor of Divinity and Church History, the only branches peculiarly connected with the students of their church. With respect to the other departments, the Proprietors are pledged not to suffer any interference, on the part of Professors, with the religious sentiments of their pupils. With their adherence to this pledge, they understand that the Synod are satisfied.

The Moderator of the Synod being a Visitor and Elector, ex officio, has it in his power to consult with the different Presbyteries, and to announce their opinion to the Electors assembled; and the Secretary will have orders to afford him copies of the certificates of the candidates.

This appears to be the substance of what the Synod require, and may be effected without any alteration in the bye-laws, or violation of the principles on which the Institution was founded. Any farther extension of the influence of the Synod, in the election of Professors, would be inconsistent with these, and would give just offence to other denominations of Christians.

In this opinion, they hope that the Reverend Synod will concur, being very anxious that no cause of discontent should arise between them and the Institution.

Signed by order of the Proprietors,

Joseph Stevenson, Secretary.

Resolved, THAT it appears from the foregoing communication, that the object of the appointment of the Committee, so far as the Belfast Institution is concerned, has not been attained.

The

353
Extracts from the
" Minutes of a General Synod held at Ballymena,
1826."

The following letter was received from the Faculty of the Belfast Institution :—

Reverend Sir,

Belfast Institution, 24th June, 1826.

THE Faculty of the Belfast Institution are happy again to embrace the opportunity which the annual meeting of the General Synod of Ulster presents, of continuing the friendly correspondence with that very reverend body, which has hitherto been carried on.

They have great pleasure in stating, that the conduct of the generality of the students, during the last session, was marked by the same regularity and laudable exertion, which they formerly had occasion to mention, and that the various arrangements adopted both by the Synod and the Faculty, for sustaining attention to the different branches of learning, continue to produce the happiest effects. The Faculty are also desirous to adopt every practicable measure, for promoting still more extensively the improvement of those committed to their care; and they will be happy to attend to every suggestion from the very reverend body over which you preside, calculated to secure these important objects.

The Faculty have appointed Doctor Young, Professor of Moral Philosophy, and James Thompson, esq. Professor of Mathematics, as a deputation, to wait upon the Synod, and to communicate any information that may be required about the literary concerns of the Institution.

In the name, and by order of the Faculty.

WILLIAM CAIRNES, President, pro tempore.

To the Reverend the Moderator of the General Synod of Ulster.

The following letter was received from the Joint Boards of Managers and Visitors in the Belfast Institution :—

Reverend Sir,

Institution Buildings, June 1826.

THE Directors of the Belfast Academical Institution embrace the opportunity which the annual meeting of the General Synod of Ulster affords, of communicating to that reverend body a brief account of the state of the seminary, during the last collegiate session. They feel happy in being able to state, that the number of students was at least equal to that of any preceding session. They deem it almost unnecessary to mention, that the Professors continued to discharge the duties of their respective situations, in a manner worthy of the high literary celebrity which they have deservedly obtained. For further information, they beg leave to refer to the committee appointed by the Synod, to attend the annual examinations of the collegiate classes.

Since the last meeting of the General Synod, His Majesty's Commissioners of Education Inquiry, have, in consequence of a petition presented to the Imperial Parliament, in June 1824, by Lord Arthur Hill, one of the Vice Presidents, on the part of the Proprietors, Managers, and Visitors, instituted a full and exact investigation into "the Utility, Administration, and Resources of the Institution." Inquiry being, in the estimation of the friends of the seminary, all that was necessary to satisfy the Government of its importance, they feel themselves justified, in anticipating from that investigation, the happiest results.

The Joint Boards, fully aware of their own powers under the Act of Incorporation, and the copious provision of the bye-laws, sanctioned by the Lord Lieutenant, to enter into and complete every necessary arrangement with the General Synod, regret that it should have been deemed necessary, on a recent occasion, upon the part of that reverend body, to pass by the Joint Boards, and appeal to the Proprietors at large; particularly as the Boards had, on this as on every former occasion, manifested their willingness to carry into effect the measures proposed by the Synod. The Managers and Visitors beg leave to state, that the Synod of Ulster may calculate on continuing to experience every facility upon the part of the Directors of this National Seminary, in carrying into effect the wishes of that reverend body, with respect to the education of the students under their pastoral jurisdiction.

The Joint Boards beg leave to inform you, that a deputation of three individuals are, at the special request of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, at present in attendance on the Board in Dublin; from which interview they confidently anticipate a final and favourable issue. The Managers and Visitors have appointed Messrs. Robert Tennent and James Munford to wait upon the Synod, and present you with this address.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect,

Your most obedient servant.

(Signed, by order of the Joint Boards,)

To the Moderator of the General
Synod of Ulster.

Joseph Stevenson, Secretary.

The foregoing communications having been read by the clerk, it was moved, that a Committee be appointed to meet this evening, at eight o'clock, in order to inquire into the state of the connection between the Synod and the Belfast Institution, as that seminary is constituted at present. The Committee to report to the Synod to-morrow morning the result of their deliberations.

The motion having, after some discussion, been withdrawn, the following resolution was proposed :—

Extracts from the
" Minutes of a
General Synod held at Ballymena,
1826."

Resolved, That instead of pressing on the Proprietors of the Belfast Institution the recognition, by a bye-law, of the Overture of 1825, respecting the election to professorships connected with the students of this church, we are satisfied with the resolution of the Joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, sanctioning the Overture of 1824, relative to the same subject; and which Overture and Resolution are as follows:—

" Overture of 1824.

" Overtured and unanimously agreed to, that whenever the Moderator of this Synod shall be called on to vote at the election of a Professor in the Belfast Institution, he shall, in due time, convene the General Synod's fixed Committee, and cause to be laid before them the names of the several candidates, with their recommendatory testimonials; and shall afterwards communicate to the electors the opinion of the Committee."

RESOLUTION of the Joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, communicated to the Synod, at its meeting in 1825.

" Belfast Institution, 25th June, 1825.

" THE Joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, taking into their consideration the first Overture of the last meeting of the General Synod of Ulster, as contained in the printed minutes thereof, and being desirous to meet the wishes of the Synod as far as possible, have come unanimously to the following Resolution:—

" That the names and testimonials of the several candidates for professorships, which may hereafter become vacant in the Institution, shall be submitted to the Moderator of the General Synod of Ulster, on his applying for the same for the purposes mentioned in said Overture. The original documents, being the property of the candidates, are not to be taken out of the Institution.

" Joseph Stevenson, Secretary."

To the foregoing Resolution, it was moved as an amendment:—That this Synod is still of opinion, that the appointment to professorships in the Belfast Institution, of persons holding Arian principles, is matter of regret, and a circumstance of dangerous tendency to the religious sentiments of the students of this body.

At half past six o'clock the Synod adjourned till ten next morning.

Seventh Session:—Friday, 30th June, 10 o'Clock, Forenoon.

AFTER prayer, the debate on the amended motion of last sederunt was resumed, and continued until two o'clock afternoon, when the Synod adjourned till three.

Eighth Session:—Friday, 30th June, 3 o'Clock, Afternoon.

THE debate having been resumed, the original motion and the amendment were both withdrawn, and the following Resolution adopted:—

Resolved, That the Synod having received every assurance, that the Overture of 1824, relative to the election of Professors in the Belfast Institution, sanctioned as it has been by the Joint Boards of Managers and Visitors, and recognized in principle by the Court of Proprietors, on the 29th of September, 1825, is calculated to afford the same security, and produce the same beneficial effects, that were contemplated by the Overture of 1825, relative to the same subject; and believing that the Resolution of the Joint Boards, respecting the Overture of 1824, will at all times be acted on with good faith, and hoping that the Court of Proprietors may yet see the wisdom of securing its permanence by some legal enactment, is now disposed to rest satisfied with it.

Resolved, That it be earnestly recommended to the electors in the Belfast Institution, that, in future, no minister of any denomination, holding a pastoral charge, be appointed to any of its professorships.

Appendix, No. 40.

ACCOUNT of EXPENSES of BUILDINGS at the *Belfast Academical Institution.*Account of Expenses of Buildings at the Belfast
Academical Institution.

	£.	s.	d.	£.	s.	d.
Sum laid out in Buildings - - - -	-	-	-	15,745	16	2 ½
Sum originally subscribed prior to the Act of Incorporation - - - - -	16,134	12	6
From which deduct Subscriptions unpaid - -	1,641	16	9
Sum received of the original Subscriptions - - - - -	-	-	-	14,492	15	9
Sums since subscribed and paid - - - -	-	-	-	4,049	19	4
Subscriptions from India - - - - -	-	-	-	4,698	1	1
				23,240	16	2
BEQUESTS.
From the Executors of the late John M. Stouppe, Esq. - - - - -	100	-	-
From the Executors of Mr. John Park, arising from an Annuity, to continue until 1866, of 43 l. 15 s. 10 d. - - - - -	249	3	4
From the Executors of the late W. Murray, of Demerara - - - - -	105	14	2
From the Executors of the late John Crane, of Croydon, Surrey - - - - -	108	10	-
From the Executors of Mrs. Ward, of Belfast -	200	-	-
Amount of Bequests - - -	763	7	6
The first Parliamentary Grant was made in 1814, and was con- tinued in 1815 and 1816, and were for 1,500 l. each year - - -	4,500	-	-
The Linen Hall Committee made a Grant to the Institution of 300 l. to assist in the erection of additional Lecture and School Rooms, but the necessities of the Institution compelled the Managers to apply it to the payment of the Professors Salaries - - -	300	-	-
The same Committee granted 100 l. in aid of the Popular Lectures on Mechanics and Chemistry; they also lent the Managers 50 l. to assist in purchasing Apparatus - - - - -	150	-	-
TOTAL - - - - -	28,954	3	8

The whole of this sum has been expended in Buildings, in the purchase of Furniture for the Dormitories and School Rooms, in the purchase of Books, of Apparatus, in Salaries, and in a variety of incidental Expenses, which are continually recurring; and the Institution is now in debt 293*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* to the Treasurer, as will appear by his Account made up to the 10th October instant, exclusive of the 300*l.* from the Linen Hall Committee, which should have been reserved for Buildings.

12th October, 1825.

(signed) Joseph Stevenson,
Secy.

Appendix, No. 41.

TREASURER'S ACCOUNT of RECEIPTS and

D^r - - - - - The PROPRIETORS of the BELFAST ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION

		£.	s.	d.	£.	s.	d.
1824: Aug. 19.	TO CASH paid for Check 191, to pay—
	Disbursements - - - - -	-	19	- $\frac{1}{2}$
	Porter's Wages - - - - -	4	-	-
	Assistant Secretary's Salary - - - - -	14	4	4 $\frac{1}{2}$
	Carpenter's account, Jobbing - - - - -	2	6	-
	Gas Light Company - - - - -	4	5	7
					25	15	-
Sept. 7.	To Check 192, to pay Mr. Hincks for Apparatus - - - - -	-	-	-	56	17	6
21.	To D ^o 193, to pay Mr. Lawless advertising - - - - -	11	10	-
	Robert Neill for two Gold Medals - - - - -	11	7	6
					22	17	6
Oct. 19.	D ^o - - 194, to pay for Insurance against Fire - - - - -	-	-	-	13	3	- $\frac{1}{2}$
	To a Check to Mr. M ^c Clean, to pay for Medals - - - - -	-	-	-	11	1	-
4.	D ^o - - 195, to pay Professor Young's Salary - - - - -	75	-	-
	Professor Cairns d ^o - - - - -	75	-	-
	Professor Stevelly's d ^o - - - - -	75	-	-
	Professor Bruce's d ^o - - - - -	25	-	-
	Assistant Secretary d ^o - - - - -	14	4	4
	To D ^o for Disbursements - - - - -	6	11	8
	M ^c Mullen for Chimney Pieces - - - - -	2	19	6
	Tho ^o Corbitt, Freight of a rein deer's head and horns - - - - -	-	15	-
	Mr. Stevelly, repairs of Apparatus - - - - -	-	19	6
					275	10	-
30.	To Check 196, to pay John Goudy for Stucco Work - - - - -	5	-	-
	Robert Simms for Disbursements - - - - -	1	10	2
	John Adams, porter - - - - -	10	-	-
					16	10	2
1825: Jan. 26.	To Check 197, to pay Mr. Mackay advertising - - - - -	9	12	2
	John M ^c Adam for Mr. Stevelly's Class - - - - -	8	10	10
	James Ireland for - - d ^o - - - - -	1	13	4 $\frac{1}{2}$
	Mr. Barnett, Expenses to London - - - - -	45	3	11
	Mr. M ^c Ewen - - d ^o - - - - -	36	14	6 $\frac{1}{2}$
	Mr. A. M ^c Clean - d ^o - - - - -	20	-	-
	For copying the Report to Commissioners - - - - -	1	-	-
					122	14	10
Feb. 8.	To Check 198, to pay Assistant Secretary 3 months Salary - - - - -	14	4	4 $\frac{1}{2}$
	Porter 10 weeks Wages - - - - -	5	-	-
	Robert Simms, Contingencies - - - - -	-	3	8
	Dr. Drummond, Spirits for Snake - - - - -	-	8	10
					19	16	10 $\frac{1}{2}$
	To Cash lodged in Saving Bank - - - - -	-	-	-	50	-	-
April 13.	To Check 199, to pay Mr. Dollond repairs of Air Pump - - - - -	4	17	7
	Mr. Langtry Freight of - d ^o - - - - -	2	4	3
	Porter's Wages - - - - -	4	-	-
	Mr. Besançele, for Casts from the antique - - - - -	2	-	-
	Robert Simms, Contingencies - - - - -	-	18	8
					14	-	6
May 3	To Check 200, to pay the Expenses of Cold Collations at the Public Examinations - - - - -	17	3	3
	Porter two weeks Wages - - - - -	2	-	-
	Labourers digging Borders, &c. - - - - -	1	8	2
					20	11	5
17.	To Check 201, to pay Dr. Young's Salary to the 1st instant - - - - -	75	-	-
	Mr. Cairns d ^o - - - - d ^o - - - - -	75	-	-
	Mr. Stevelly's d ^o - - - - d ^o - - - - -	75	-	-
	Mr. Bruce's d ^o - - - - d ^o - - - - -	25	-	-
	Rob ^t Simms d ^o for 3 months - - - - -	14	4	4 $\frac{1}{2}$
	Porter for 2 weeks - - - - -	1	-	-
	Smith for mending Locks - - - - -	-	2	1
					265	6	5 $\frac{1}{2}$
31.	To Check 202, to pay for Premiums to the several Classes - - - - -	15	18	6
	Simms & M ^c Intyre for parchments and wax - - - - -	1	-	-
					16	18	6
June 30.	To Interest on advance - - - - -	-	-	-	-	13	6
					£.	931	16 3 $\frac{1}{2}$
July 1.	To Balance from above - - - - -				247	12	8

IT appears to us that a Balance of Fifty Pounds, included in this Account, remains in Belfast Saving Bank.

DISBURSEMENTS, to the 1st July 1825.

Cr.

(signed) Geo. Ash,
Tho' O'Neill, } Auditors.
John Ward,

C c

Appendix, No. 42.

Analysis of the Expenditure.ANALYSIS of the EXPENDITURE of the Belfast Academical Institution, for the Year ended 1st July 1825.

	£.	s.	d.
Professors Salaries - - - - -	500	-	-
Assistant Secretary's d ^o - - - - -	56	17	6
Porter's Wages - - - - -	26	-	-
Advertisements - - - - -	21	2	2
Gold Medals - - - - -	11	7	6
Silver D ^o - - - - -	11	1	-
Repairs - - - - -	12	5	1
Contingencies - - - - -	44	10	8 $\frac{1}{2}$
Apparatus - - - - -	64	18	10
Insurance against Fire - - - - -	13	3	- $\frac{1}{2}$
Deputations to London - - - - -	101	18	5 $\frac{1}{2}$
Premiums to Classes - - - - -	15	18	6
Casts for Drawing School - - - - -	2	-	-
Interest on the Treasurer's Advance - - - - -	-	13	6
Total of Expenditure - - - - - £.	881	16	3 $\frac{1}{2}$
Exclusive of a Sum lodged in Saving Bank - - - - -	50	-	-
Amount of D ^r side of Treasurer's Account - - - - - £.	931	16	3 $\frac{1}{2}$

(signed) Joseph Stevenson,
Secretary.

Appendix, No. 43.

Treasurer's Account of Receipts
and Disbursements.TREASURER'S ACCOUNT of RECEIPTS and DISBURSEMENTS, to the 10th of October 1825.BELFAST ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION, in account with *Tennent, Callwell & Co.*D^r

1825:		£.	s.	d.
June 30.	TO Balance due per Account - - - - -	247	12	8
August 10.	To Cash, per Check N ^o 203 - - - - -	37	-	3
October 4.	To D ^o - - - - - 205 - - - - -	28	17	2
7.	To D ^o - to John Harrison, for Insurance - - - - -	6	16	9
10.	To Interest to this date - - - - -	3	14	7
		£.	324	1 5
-	To Balance due brought down - - - - -	£.	293	19 3

C^r

1825:		£.	s.	d.
August 10.	By Cash - - - - -	8	5	-
October 10.	- D ^o - - - - -	21	17	2
-	By Balance due - - - - -	293	19	3
		£.	324	1 5

E. E. Belfast, 10th October 1825.

(signed) Rob^t Callwell, Treasurer.
Joseph Stevenson, Secretary.

359

FIFTH REPORT

OF THE

COMMISSIONERS

OF

Irish Education Inquiry.

Dated London, 18th May 1827.

(DIOCESAN SCHOOLS.)

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be Printed,
8 June 1827.

THE REPORT	- - - - -	p. 3.
THE APPENDIX	- - - - -	p. 23.

Dated London 10th May 1837.
 I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2nd inst. in relation to the proposed Bill for the better regulation of the National Schools, and in reply to inform you that the same has been forwarded to the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, who are now considering the same.
 I am, Sir, very respectfully,
 Your obedient servant,
 J. D. Wilson, Esq.
 Secretary to the Committee of the Privy Council on Education.

361

F I F T H R E P O R T
OF
THE COMMISSIONERS
OF
IRISH EDUCATION INQUIRY.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY:

WE, the undersigned Commissioners, nominated and appointed by a Commission under the Great Seal, bearing date the Fourteenth day of June, One thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, proceed in this our Fifth Report to lay before Your Majesty the state of the DIOCESAN SCHOOLS of Ireland, together with such recommendations as we feel it our duty to offer for effecting their improvement.

THE Schools now known in Ireland by the name of The DIOCESAN SCHOOLS, derive their origin from an Act passed in the twelfth year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, intituled, "An Act for the erection of Free Schools." By this Act it is provided, that there shall be "a Free School within every Diocese of the realm of Ireland, and that the Schoolmaster shall be an Englishman, or of the English birth of Ireland." Under the provisions of this Act, the Masters in the Dioceses of Armagh, Dublin, Meath, and Kildare, were to be appointed by the Archbishops and Bishops respectively, and in all other Dioceses by the Lord Deputy or Governor. The School-house for every Diocese was directed to be built in the principal shire-town of the Diocese, at the costs and charges of the whole Diocese, and by the "device and oversight of the Ordinaries of the Diocese, or of the Vicars-General (sede vacante), and the Sheriff of the Shire, and the Lord Deputy or Governor, "was to appoint such yearly pension for the Schoolmaster as he should think convenient, whereof the Ordinaries of every Diocese were to provide the third part, "and the Parsons and other Ecclesiastical Persons of the Diocese were to provide the remainder," and all Churches, Parsonages, Vicarages, and other Ecclesiastical Livings, which had come by any means to the Queen or her predecessors were to be charged with this payment in whose hands soever they should be.

A statute was passed in the seventh year of William III. which states, that the above Act (for the erection of Free Schools) had failed to produce the desired effect, and therefore proceeds to enact, that the same "should from thenceforth be "strictly observed and put in execution according to the good intent and design "of the same."

It appears that in the reign of George the First, though Schools were kept in most Dioceses, several Dioceses were unprovided with School-houses. To remedy this defect the statute of 12 Geo. 1. c. 9 (Irish), empowered the several Ecclesiastical Dignitaries to grant sites for the Schools in any parts of their Dioceses, without confining them to the shire-towns, and directed that until such ground should be set out the School should be kept "in such convenient place as the Archbishop or Bishop "should

“ should be able to procure for a yearly rent or otherwise.” And it also empowered the Grand Juries of each County, from time to time, to present reasonable sums towards the building and repairing of the School-houses, to be levied upon the whole County, or such part of it as should be within the particular Diocese in which the School should be placed; and in order to provide for the better payment and support of the Masters, the same statute further enacted that every person, being a beneficed clergyman, bound to contribute to the salary, should pay to the Master at the Annual Diocesan Visitation, his proportion thereof, under pain of sequestration of his benefice.

As presentments to be levied upon portions of Counties were found extremely inconvenient, the Grand Juries were by another Act 29 Geo. 2. cap. 7 (Irish), empowered in all cases to present sums to be levied on the whole of their respective counties for building or repairing the School-houses.

By an Act of 21st and 22d Geo. 3. c. 28 (Irish), it was provided that the Bishop, with the consent of the Patron and Schoolmaster, should be empowered to change the sites of Schools to such other sites as might be granted to the Bishop and his successors for not less than 999 years, at a pepper-corn rent; and the Grand Juries were empowered to present for the building, repairing, and fitting up such Diocesan School-houses; and the Bishops were further empowered, with the consent of the Schoolmasters, to demise the old sites and ground belonging to the Schools, at the best improved rents, to be applied in augmentation of the salaries of the Masters.

The condition of these Schools was the subject of a Report by the Board of Education in Ireland, appointed under the provisions of an Act passed in the 46th year of Geo. III. Their Report was published in 1809, and the Commissioners therein state, that Free Schools had been actually established under the statute of Elizabeth in most, if not all of the Dioceses in Ireland, but that at no time had they appeared to have fully answered the purposes of their institution. The Commissioners added that they had not been able to find any account of these Schools previous to the Restoration, but that it was not probable that they had been regularly kept or usefully conducted. After the Restoration a Commission appears to have been issued by the Lord Lieutenant and Council, directing the Bishops of the several Dioceses to carry the Act of 12 Eliz. into effect, and for that purpose to applot the sums to be paid out of the different Ecclesiastical Livings in each Diocese, for the salary of the Diocesan School-master.

The provisions of the statute of 12th Geo. I. as amended by the 29th Geo. II, above referred to, were stated in that Report to have effected a considerable improvement in the Diocesan Schools, but the Report added that there were several Dioceses still unprovided with proper School-houses, and some without any; and that the general benefit derived from the whole Institution, was far from corresponding with the intention of the Legislature. It appears from an abstract annexed to the Report, that in 1809, out of the 34 Dioceses in Ireland, united into the 22 Sees of the Archbishops and Bishops, there were only ten provided with Diocesan School-houses in tolerable repair. In three other Dioceses the houses were either out of repair, or otherwise insufficient; and the remaining Dioceses were wholly unprovided with School-houses, the Masters of the few schools that were kept in them renting houses for the purpose. In several of the Dioceses there was at the period of the Report no Diocesan School, and in others no effective one: the whole number of effective Schools in all the Dioceses was 13, and the number of scholars did not exceed 380. In the greater part of the Dioceses in which no School was kept there was no contribution from the clergy for the payment of a Master; in some, the salary was actually paid to a person who either kept no School, or one on a different foundation in which the Diocesan was absorbed. In this Report of the Commissioners in 1809, we observe the Diocese of Kilmore is altogether omitted. We do not find that it ever possessed a Diocesan School.

The same Report stated the utter inadequacy of the salaries allotted for the maintenance of the Masters, which in no Diocese exceeded 40 l. per annum, and in some was so low as 25 l.; a circumstance which it was said would account for the non-existence or discontinuance of Schools, except in situations otherwise advantageous, and where Grammar Schools would therefore be established, and flourish without the aid of an endowment so inconsiderable.

The

The Report proceeded to express the doubts of the Commissioners whether a system should be continued which in its principle appeared to them not altogether equitable; which had never been found efficient in practice; and which operated so partially, that 12 out of 34 Dioceses did in fact not contribute any thing towards its object. The Commissioners further suggested, that instead of requiring a School to be kept in every Diocese, a certain number only should be established in each of the Archiepiscopal Provinces, to be supported out of the contributions from the several Dioceses in each. They added, that in fixing on the situations for schools, regard should be had principally to the want of proper Grammar Schools in the different districts, and as far as might be, to the continuance of the best of the Diocesan Schools already existing.

To carry the recommendations of the Report into effect an Act of Parliament 53 Geo. 3, c. 107, was passed, (afterwards amended by the 3d Geo. 4, c. 79,) appointing the Lord Primate, the Lord Chancellor, the Archbishops of Dublin and Tuam, the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, and the Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, all for the time being, and also four of the Bishops of Ireland, and four other persons to be named by the Lord Lieutenant, Commissioners for the regulation of the several endowed Schools of public and private foundation in Ireland. The statute confers upon these Commissioners extensive powers for the control and management of such schools, and also for the management of the Diocesan Schools; and with regard to the latter, the Commissioners were empowered, with the consent and approbation of the Lord Lieutenant, by warrant, under hand and seal, to direct and declare that any two or more Dioceses should be erected into one district, and that the Free Schools of such united Dioceses should be consolidated into one Free School, to be thenceforth kept and held in such place within the Diocese as might be so directed, and that after such union made, the Masters of such district Schools should receive the salaries which would have been payable to the Masters of such several Diocesan Schools, if not consolidated, to be received in the like manner, and payable by the same persons, as if no union had been formed. And by the 24th section it was provided that it should be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant, with the advice of the Privy Council, to appoint what stipend, provision, or salary should be paid to the Master of every Diocesan or District School, and what portion or portions should be paid and raised in each Diocese or District.

The Act then proceeded to enact by whom the payments were to be made, and provided that one third of the yearly sums should be paid by the Bishops of the several Dioceses, and that the remaining two thirds should be levied from the parsons, vicars, prebendaries and other ecclesiastical persons of the Diocese, by an equal contribution according to the values of their respective benefices, to be from time to time ascertained by the bishop of the Diocese, with the consent of the Archbishop of the province, and to be enforced, if necessary, by sequestration.

The Act next proceeded to provide for the sites, and the building of the Diocesan and District Schools, by empowering the persons enumerated in the 26th section to grant land, not exceeding two acres, for the site of a District or Diocesan School, and enabling the Commissioners to sell or demise the old sites for the benefit of the Schools, and to exchange the School-lands for others more convenient; and the commissioners were empowered to purchase houses already built, or lands fit for such buildings.

The Act then proceeded to provide the funds for such purposes, and accordingly the 28th section enacted that it should and might be lawful for the Grand Jury of any county in which the Diocesan or District School, or the site appointed for the same should be, to present on the county any sum or sums which they should think proper for purchasing, providing, building or repairing any such School-house, or a dwelling-house for the Master thereof, or any of the offices or appurtenances properly belonging to the same, or for purchasing or procuring a site for the same, not exceeding two plantation acres.

In pursuance of a direction of the 8th section of this Act, the Commissioners have annually made to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a Report of their proceedings relating both to Schools of public and private foundation, and also to the Diocesan Schools.

In the year 1823 the Commissioners made to His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant a special Report on the Diocesan Schools; and the considerations by which they had been influenced in forming the plan which it proposed, were stated by them in substance as follows :

First, That in fixing on the sites of Diocesan and District Schools due regard should be had to the local situations of other classical Schools of public and private foundation.

Secondly, That Schools for the Dioceses and Districts should be established (so far as might be practicable and consistent with the foregoing principle,) in such of the houses provided for the Diocesan Schools as were in tenantable repair.

And Thirdly, that for the reasons assigned in their former Report on this subject, no consolidation should be made of Schools subjected to the jurisdiction of distinct metropolitans.

The Commissioners then stated their Plan as follows :

First, As to the Schools of the Ecclesiastical

PROVINCE OF ULSTER.

THEY recommended that a District School should be formed by the union of the schools of the Dioceses of Down and Dromore, and that it should be established at Downpatrick, where the Diocesan School of Down was then kept. Neither of these Dioceses had then any Diocesan School-house, but the School of Down was endowed with a few acres of land. The house used at Downpatrick was the private property of the Master.

The Commissioners next recommended that the Diocesan School of Derry should not be united to any other, a large and commodious School-house having been lately erected within the city of Londonderry, and the School receiving aid from the London Society, and from a special grant of the Bishop of Derry.

They recommended that the School for the Diocese of Armagh should be united to that for the Diocese of Connor, and that the School of the district should be fixed at Ballymena, in the county of Antrim, assigning as the reasons for this arrangement that there was no Diocesan School-house in the Diocese of Armagh, and that it was already fully provided with classical schools, namely, two of Royal foundation at Armagh and Dungannon, one on the foundation of Erasmus Smith at Drogheda, and one of private endowment at Dundalk.

They recommended that the Diocesan School of Raphoe, together with that of the Diocese of Kilmore, should be united to the Diocesan School of Clogher; this latter School was then established in the town of Monaghan, in a house appropriated to that purpose, but much in need of repairs; and it was expected that a new site would be provided in the town of Monaghan, for the building of a proper School-house, by the aid of the Grand Jury, and the private donations hereafter to be noticed. The Commissioners added that in neither of the Dioceses of Raphoe or Kilmore was there any Diocesan School; but that in each there was a classical school of Royal foundation.

They further recommended that the School of the Diocese of Ardagh should be united with that of Meath, so as to form a District School to be placed in the populous town of Mullingar, in the Diocese of Meath, and that the School-house of the Diocese of Ardagh at Longford, and the School-house of the Diocese of Meath at Trim, should be sold towards founding the District School at Mullingar.

PROVINCE OF LEINSTER.

THE Commissioners recommended that as the metropolis is and must of course always be fully provided with classical Schools, the Diocesan School of Dublin and Glandelagh should be placed at Wicklow, the chief town of the county of that name, and that the Diocesan School of Kildare, established at Naas, in the county of Kildare, should not be united with any other School.

They recommended that inasmuch as there was in the Diocese of Ossory the great Foundation School or College of Kilkenny, the Diocesan School of Ossory should be united to that of Leighlin, to be held at Carlow.

As to Ferns, the Diocese being extensive, and there being a sufficient School-house at Wexford recently built, and the School being in a flourishing state, they thought that it should remain as a distinct Diocesan School.

PROVINCE OF MUNSTER.

THE Commissioners recommended that the School of the Dioceses of Cashel and Emly should be kept at Thurles in the County of Tipperary. That the Schools of the the Dioceses of Killaloe and Kilfenora should be united to that of Limerick, and should be established in the City of Limerick, where there was an old School-house. That there should be a School established for the Dioceses of Ardfert and Aghadoe, at Tralee in the County of Kerry. That inasmuch as there were already Foundation Schools at Waterford and Lismore, the Diocesan School for those Dioceses, in neither of which was there any Diocesan School-house, should be placed at Dungarvan.

365

They further recommended that the Diocesan Schools of Ross and Cloyne should be united to the School of the Diocese of Cork, and be established in the City of Cork.

PROVINCE OF CONNAUGHT.

THE Commissioners were of opinion that a School for the Dioceses of Killala and Achonry might be properly established at Ballina in the County of Mayo. That the School of the Diocese of Tuam, established in the Town of Tuam, should not be united to the School of any other Diocese. That the School of the Diocese of Clonfert and Kilmacduagh should be fixed at Loughrea; and as to the Diocesan School of Elphin which was kept in the Town of Elphin, with a suitable house and fifteen acres of land, they recommended that it should not be united to any other.

In consequence of these recommendations, and in pursuance of the powers of the before-mentioned Act, his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, by notice in the Dublin Gazette, April 17th 1824, appointed the following annual salaries to be paid to the several Schoolmasters of the Diocesan and District Schools, recommended in the above Report.

PROVINCE.	DIOCESES.	Salaries appointed.	Proportion payable in each Diocese, where a District School shall be established.
ARMAGH	Armagh - - -	One hundred and twenty pounds - - -	Seventy pounds.
	and Connor - - -		Fifty pounds.
	Down - - -		Forty pounds.
	and Dromore - - -	Ninety pounds - - -	Fifty pounds.
	Meath - - -		Eighty-five pounds.
	and Ardagh - - -	One hundred and thirty pounds - - -	Forty-five pounds.
	Kilmore - - -		Forty-five pounds.
	Raphoe - - -	One hundred and thirty pounds - - -	Thirty pounds.
	Clogher - - -		Fifty-five pounds.
	Derry, sole - - -	One hundred pounds - - -	—
DUBLIN	Dublin - - -	One hundred pounds - - -	Fifty-five pounds.
	and Glendelagh - - -		Forty-five pounds.
	Ossory - - -	One hundred and twenty pounds - - -	Seventy pounds.
	and Leighlin - - -		Fifty pounds.
	Kildare, sole - - -	Seventy pounds - - -	—
	Ferns, sole - - -	Seventy pounds - - -	—
CASHEL	Cashel - - -	One hundred pounds - - -	Seventy pounds.
	and Emly - - -		Thirty Pounds.
	Ardfert - - -	Eighty pounds - - -	—
	and Aghadoe - - -		—
	Limerick - - -	One hundred and fifty pounds - - -	Seventy-five pounds.
	Killaloe - - -		Fifty-five pounds.
	Kilfenora - - -		Twenty pounds.
	Cork - - -	Two hundred pounds - - -	Eighty pounds.
	Cloyne - - -		One hundred pounds.
	Ross - - -		Twenty pounds.
	Waterford - - -	Ninety pounds - - -	Twenty pounds.
	and Lismore - - -		Seventy pounds.
TUAM	Killala - - -	Fifty pounds - - -	Thirty-five pounds.
	and Achonry - - -		Fifteen pounds
	Clonfert - - -		Twenty-five pounds.
	and Kilmacduagh - - -	Forty pounds - - -	Fifteen pounds.
	Tuam, sole - - -		—
	Elphin, sole - - -	Eighty pounds - - -	—

The same Commissioners of Education in their Annual Report for the year 1824, again brought the Diocesan Schools under the notice of His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, in the following words :

“ In consequence of the amendment of the Statute of the 53d Geo. 3d by the late Act of His present Majesty’s Reign, this Board was enabled to form a scheme for the formation and arrangement of Diocesan and District Schools, and which, after having been submitted to Your Excellency for your approbation, was promulgated by our Warrants on the 6th May 1823 ; and we have annexed to this our Report, a schedule showing at once the whole arrangement in respect of these Schools, with the salaries which have been allocated for the Masters by your Excellency in Council, and their apportionment on the Bishops and Clergy of each Diocese.

“ On the subject of these most useful Establishments we have to observe, that there are no funds in the power of this Board (except what may arise from the sale of the sites of the present Schools) for the purchase or building and outfit of houses for the Masters of the District and Diocesan Schools, and therefore we took the liberty of suggesting an application to the Judges of Assize, requesting them to recommend to the Grand Juries at the Assizes, the propriety of making Presentments on their Counties for such purposes, pursuant to the provisions of the 12th Eliz.—53d Geo. 3d—and of other Statutes made in the Parliament of Ireland. We are not as yet able to report in many instances satisfactory results from these recommendations, several of the Grand Juries appearing unwilling to lay additional burthens on their Counties, and conceiving (whether rightly or not it is not for us to say) that they have a discretionary power of declining to make such Presentments. The Legislature did not impose on the Bishops and Clergy any duty beyond the providing a salary for the Master of the School, and demonstrated a great anxiety that the Grand Juries should perform their duty, by raising funds for the maintenance of the School Establishments, as will particularly appear from the tenth section of the Irish Statute 7 Will. 3, c. 4, which directed that the above-mentioned Act of the 12th Eliz. for the erection and maintenance of Free Schools should be strictly observed and put in execution, and that the Judges in their Circuits, and the Justices at Sessions, should give these Acts in charge to the Grand Juries, and be very circumspect in seeing the same put into due execution.

“ We have to inform Your Excellency that by the liberality of the Dowager Baroness Rossmore (representative of Alexander Cairns, Esq. deceased, who formerly by will left the annual sum of twenty pounds for a Mathematical Teacher in the Town of Monaghan, wherein the District School for the Dioceses of Raphoe, Clogher and Kilmore has been established under the Warrant of our Board, countersigned by Your Excellency) a convenient site for building a new School-house for that District School has been provided. Towards the erection of the edifice her Ladyship has given a donation of 100 l. in increase of the building-fund which arises from the arrears of the above-mentioned annual sum of 20 l. ; (permitted by her Ladyship to be so employed,) the produce of the sale of the old Diocesan School-house, and the Presentment by the Grand Jury of Monaghan of the sum of 500 l. to be raised by instalments. A Plan of the intended School-house and offices having been approved by us, we have caused advertisements to be inserted in the Newspapers in Town and Country for Contractors to undertake the Building, and we have executed a Deed of Sale of the old Diocesan School-house of Clogher, in the Town of Monaghan, for the consideration of 500 l. which we have caused to be invested in Government Securities as part of the above-mentioned building-fund.

“ His Grace the Archbishop of Tuam having represented the decayed state of the present Diocesan School-house in the town of Tuam, where it has been resolved that the School of the Diocese of Tuam should remain, and having procured the report of an architect of its unfitness for the purposes of a School, and His Grace having offered to grant a piece of ground for the site of a new School-house, we are actively employed on that object, which may be effected when a sufficient fund shall be created by sale of the present building, and by a presentment of the Grand Jury of the County of Galway. which it is hoped will be made at the next assizes, when their attention shall be called to the subject.

“ In

“ In the town of Carlow where the District School of Leighlin and Ossory has been established by the recent arrangement, a change of the site of the School-house has become necessary, chiefly by reason of the improper situation of the old building used as the School-house of the Diocese of Leighlin; and it having been represented to us that a more commodious house, the property of Colonel Rochfort, in a healthful and proper situation in the town of Carlow, and of greater value than the present School-house, would be granted in exchange for it, on the difference in value being paid to Colonel Rochfort, we have intimated our readiness to forward the arrangement, provided the Grand Jury of the County shall previously present, to be raised and paid towards the establishment of the District School, a sum sufficient to pay the amount of such difference in value, and to provide for the outfit and alteration of the house to be so taken in exchange for the District School of Leighlin and Ossory, as we are without funds for such purposes.”

The further progress of the Commissioners in relation to the Diocesan Schools is stated in their next annual Report in the year 1825, in the following manner:

“ We beg leave to advert in the next place to the state of the Diocesan and District Schools referred to by the 53d Geo. 3. cap. 107.

“ We regret to be obliged to report to Your Excellency, that notwithstanding the charges given by the Judges at the several assizes, many of the Grand Juries of Counties in which Schools are to be, or have been established, have (since the making of our warrants of the 6th May 1823), declined to present money for the building and outfit and repairs of the Schools, the Act not being considered imperative on the Grand Juries; and it appears that some of the Grand Juries so declining have been actuated by the belief that a material change is likely to be made in the foundation and sites of the District Schools, in consequence of the appointment of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry.

“ And we beg leave to submit our opinion to Your Excellency, that unless the clause imposing upon Grand Juries the duty of providing for the support and establishment of these Schools, shall have been amended by the Legislature, so as to render it imperative on them to present for such purposes, we entertain no sanguine expectation of aid from the Grand Juries for these most useful classical seminaries.

“ We have to mention, as excepted cases, that the Grand Juries of the Counties of Antrim and Down have presented each 1,000*l.* for the building of the District Schools to be in them respectively erected. The sites of the Schools have been provided with great liberality by Mr. Adair, in the former, and the Lord De Clifford in the latter county; and we have caused our architect to prepare plans of School-houses and offices to afford accommodation suited to the sums presented, which are payable by instalments of 100*l.* a year.

“ The presentment by the County of Monaghan Grand Jury of 500*l.* formerly stated to Your Excellency, forms another of the excepted cases; and we have the satisfaction to state, that by means of that presentment, and the other funds mentioned in our last Report, considerable progress has been made in the building of a suitable house and offices near the town of Monaghan, for the establishment of the School of the District of the Dioceses of Clogher, Kilmore, and Raphoe.

“ With respect to the Diocesan School of Tuam, we do not find that His Grace the Archbishop of Tuam has as yet made any grant of land for the site of the School, as we mentioned to Your Excellency, we expected would have been done, and we have hitherto been unable to procure a proper site from any other person.”

“ No endeavours have been wanting on our part to place the Diocesan and District Schools on a proper foundation, but we have not authority to enforce a compliance with our suggestions.”

The latest steps taken by the same Commissioners with respect to the Diocesan Schools will be found in their next Report, dated 8th April 1826.

“ As to the Diocesan and District Schools, we have to inform Your Excellency, that the same causes which prevented their complete establishment, according to the Proclamation of Your Excellency in Council, still exist. The Grand Juries of

Appendix, No. 42.

Analysis of the Expenditure.ANALYSIS of the EXPENDITURE of the Belfast Academical Institution, for the Year ended 1st July 1825.

	£.	s.	d.
Professors Salaries - - - - -	500	-	-
Assistant Secretary's d ^o - - - - -	56	17	6
Porter's Wages - - - - -	26	-	-
Advertisements - - - - -	21	2	2
Gold Medals - - - - -	11	7	6
Silver D ^o - - - - -	11	1	-
Repairs - - - - -	12	5	1
Contingencies - - - - -	44	10	8 $\frac{1}{2}$
Apparatus - - - - -	64	18	10
Insurance against Fire - - - - -	13	3	- $\frac{1}{2}$
Deputations to London - - - - -	101	18	5 $\frac{1}{2}$
Premiums to Classes - - - - -	15	18	6
Casts for Drawing School - - - - -	2	-	-
Interest on the Treasurer's Advance - - - - -	-	13	6
Total of Expenditure - - - - - £.	881	16	3 $\frac{1}{2}$
Exclusive of a Sum lodged in Saving Bank - - - - -	50	-	-
Amount of D ^r side of Treasurer's Account - - - - - £.	931	16	3 $\frac{1}{2}$

(signed) Joseph Stevenson,
Secretary.

Appendix, No. 43.

Treasurer's Account of Receipts
and Disbursements.TREASURER'S ACCOUNT of RECEIPTS and DISBURSEMENTS, to the 10th of October 1825.BELFAST ACADEMICAL INSTITUTION, in account with *Tennent, Callwell & Co.*D^r

1825:		£.	s.	d.
June 30.	TO Balance due per Account - - - - -	247	12	8
August 10.	To Cash, per Check N ^o 203 - - - - -	37	-	3
October 4.	To D ^o - - - - - 205 - - - - -	28	17	2
7.	To D ^o - to John Harrison, for Insurance - - - - -	6	16	9
10.	To Interest to this date - - - - -	3	14	7
		£.	324	1 5
-	To Balance due brought down - - - - -	£.	293	19 3

C^r

1825:		£.	s.	d.
August 10.	By Cash - - - - -	8	5	-
October 10.	- D ^o - - - - -	21	17	2
-	By Balance due - - - - -	293	19	3
		£.	324	1 5

E. E. Belfast, 10th October 1825.

(signed) Rob^t Callwell, Treasurer.
Joseph Stevenson, Secretary.

FIFTH REPORT

OF THE

COMMISSIONERS

OF

Irish Education Inquiry.

Dated London, 18th May 1827.

(DIOCESAN SCHOOLS.)

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be Printed,
8 June 1827.

“ the Counties, which contain the sites of the District and Diocesan Schools, partly “ from an unwillingness to lay additional burthens on the landholders, but chiefly,
 “ as we can learn, from the apprehension that changes of the sites may be recom“ mended by the Board of Education Inquiry, have declined, except in some few “ instances, to present funds to be raised for the establishment of the Schools which “ they are invited, but not compelled to do by the 53d Geo. 3. c. 107.

“ We have to report, however, that the House and Offices now building for the “ District School established at Monaghan are nearly completed, and will fully “ answer the objects proposed by their erection.

“ The Grand Jury of the County of Down having some months since presented “ a sum of 1,000 l. for building the District School, to be established at Down-“ patrick, to be paid by instalments of 100 l. a year, we caused advertisements to “ be inserted in the public newspapers for contracts to complete the building, but “ without effect, the mode of payment of the 1,000 l. being objected to; we, “ therefore, caused a case to be laid before our counsel for his opinion, whether “ under the Act of 58 Geo 3. c. 88, the said sum of 1,000 l. could be borrowed
 “ by us from Government, on the credit of the said presentment, and such counsel
 “ being of opinion that it was competent for Government to advance that sum,
 “ in case the Grand Jury of the county of Down should again present it in proper “ form, the same has accordingly been at the last assizes again presented in due “ form, and we are about to take the proper measures for commencing the building “ of the School-house of Downpatrick, a site having been agreed to be granted by “ the Right Honourable Lord De Clifford.

“ The statements above made with respect to the School of Downpatrick fully “ apply to the District School of the Dioceses of Armagh and Connor, to be “ established at Ballymena in the county of Antrim, with this difference only, that
 “ the Grand Jury of Antrim have not as yet presented again in the proper form the sum
 “ of 1,000 l. which was before presented for building a School-house at Ballymena,
 “ but we expect that such presentment will be made at the next assizes, as to enable “ us to obtain a loan for building the School-house on a site granted by William “ Adair, esquire, in the town of Ballymena.

“ With respect to the Diocesan School of Tuam, the house which is in an unfit “ situation was (as we noticed in a former report,) occupied at one time by the King’s “ troops, and at another by the police establishment, and had become ruinous “ during such occupation. We have in vain endeavoured to procure a site for “ building a new School-house, it having been our intention to have sold the pre“ sent School-house; and with the produce and aid, if obtained from the Grand “ Jury of the county of Galway, to have erected another, His Grace the Archbishop “ of Tuam, the proprietor of the soil, having declined to grant a site for the purpose;
 “ and we have been impeded in the sale of the Diocesan School-house by reason
 “ of an ejectment intended, as we are informed by His Grace, to be brought by the “ churchwardens of the parish of Tuam for part of the garden of the present School“ house, which we understand has been possessed by the Diocesan Schoolmasters
 “ for a series of years, unless the Master shall give up the possession. We beg leave “ again to suggest, that if on inquiry it shall appear to the satisfaction of Your Excel“ lency that the School-house of Tuam has sustained damage in its occupation by “ the military or the police, some pecuniary aid should be afforded by the Govern“ ment towards the School establishment, or that the present house should be repaired
 “ at the public expense.”

WE now proceed to state the actual condition of each of the Dioceses with respect to its Diocesan School, as we found them on our visits in the year 1824, and the two following years, noticing the cases in which the alterations suggested as above by the Board of Education have been adopted. We shall, at the same time, submit such arrangements as appear to us to be necessary, and state the reasons which induce us to propose a plan in some instances different from that recommended, and in part acted on by that Board. Their plan proceeded upon the principle of uniting the several Diocesan into a smaller number of District Schools, and was adopted chiefly on account of the very limited funds hitherto appropriated to the schools of the several Dioceses. We have the less difficulty in now suggesting the dissolution of some of these unions, and the re-establishment of separate Schools, as it will form a part of our recommendation that more efficient means should be provided for their support.

389

PROVINCE OF ARMAGH.

Archdiocese of Armagh.

THERE does not appear to have ever been a Diocesan School in this Diocese. A school of royal foundation, amply endowed has long existed in the city of Armagh, which has generally been as fully attended as any other endowed classical School in Ireland. The establishment of a Diocesan School in that city is therefore unnecessary, and we recommend that the Diocesan School of this Diocese should be established in the populous town of Newry, part of which is situated in the county of Armagh.

Connor.

This Diocese, which is united to the see of Down, possesses no separate Diocesan School. We have already stated that it was a recommendation of the Board of Education that one should be founded at Ballymena, in the county of Antrim, which is the principal town in the diocese. The Grand Jury of that county have accordingly presented 1,000 l. and an acre of land has been offered by Mr. Adair in a situation well adapted for the site of a school. No Master has as yet been appointed to receive the annual salary of 120 l. appointed in the scheme adopted by the Lord Lieutenant for the District School of the united Dioceses of Armagh and Connor.

We consider Ballymena to be a very desirable situation for the Diocesan School of Connor, but we do not think that there is any necessity for consolidating it with the Diocese of Armagh. It appears to us desirable that each Diocese should have its own school, and pay its own Master.

Down.

In this Diocese a Diocesan School has for a considerable time been kept, but no house or land was appropriated for it until very lately, when Lord De Clifford made a grant of about two acres adjoining Downpatrick. The Board of Education has had it in contemplation to erect a School-house upon this land, and the Grand Jury of the county of Down have presented 1,000 l. for that purpose, to be paid by yearly instalments of 100 l. The School is kept at present in a house rented by the Master, Mr. Bullick, who is in receipt of the salary of 90 l. allotted to the District school of the united Dioceses of Down and Dromore.

Mr. Bullick is Curate of the adjoining parish of Inch; his predecessor, Mr. Bell and Mr. Bell's predecessor, Mr. Kennedy, appear to have had a good attendance of scholars. We consider the town of Downpatrick a favourable situation for the establishment of a Diocesan School, and it does not appear to us expedient that the School of any other Diocese should be united to it.

Dromore.

In the town of Dromore a site appears to have been formerly provided from the See Lands for the use of the Diocesan School, but no School-house now exists, the old building having fallen into decay. A Diocesan School had however been kept by several successive Masters for a length of time in houses rented by them for that purpose. In 1821 we find that there were eight scholars, but in 1823 the School had been discontinued. We consider the town of Dromore as a situation extremely well calculated for a Diocesan School, without being united to that of any other Diocese.

Meath.

The School for this Diocese has long been established in the town of Trim, in a very old building forming part of the quadrangle of Saint Mary's Abbey, and which although massive, is not now in good repair. About half an acre of ground nearly in the centre of the town is attached to it. Mr. Hamilton the present Master is the curate of Trim, and rector of the parish of Almoritia, in the same Diocese. He has had no pupils during the last five years.

It has been proposed by the Board of Education that the Diocesan School of Meath at Trim, and the Diocesan School of Ardagh, hitherto held in the populous town of Longford, should both be discontinued and the premises sold, and that in lieu of those two schools, one should be established at Mullingar, the county town of Westmeath, in the Diocese of Meath. It appears to us, however, that the town of Trim is well entitled to possess an effective Diocesan School, and we therefore consider it a more expedient arrangement that the School for the Diocese of Meath should be continued in that town without being united to any other.

Mr. Hamilton, the Master of the School at Trim, has been appointed to receive the salary of 130 l. allotted for the proposed District School at Mullingar. We do not find, however, that any fund for building a School at Mullingar has as yet been provided.

Ardagh.

The Diocesan School of this Diocese was long held in the county town of Longford, a situation extremely favourable for such a purpose. The School-house which stood upon a site of about half a rood of land was never sufficient for its object; and in the year 1823, when the School was discontinued, the house was fast falling into decay; it is at present a mere ruin, and represented by the inhabitants of the adjoining part of the town as a nuisance. The late Master, Mr. Irwin, upon the suppression of this School, was appointed by the Lord Lieutenant to the Diocesan School of Tuam. A few years previous to Mr. Irwin's departure from Longford, he had fifteen or sixteen scholars. In the time of Doctor Dowdall, the present Master of the Royal School of Dungannon, who was Master shortly before Mr. Irwin's appointment, the School appears to have been so fully attended that he was obliged to rent the contiguous house for the accommodation of his pupils.

We have already stated that the town of Longford appears to be peculiarly well fitted for such an establishment, and we think it desirable that a School for the Diocese of Ardagh, should be again established in it.

Kilmore.

In this Diocese we find no trace of any Diocesan School having existed; it is the less to be regretted, as a Royal School exists in the county town of Cavan. There is no other town within the limits of the Diocese of Kilmore that appears to afford an eligible situation for a classical School, but within one or two miles of its north-western boundary is situated the populous and important town of Sligo, in which there is no endowed School. We think it extremely desirable that the ecclesiastical contributions of the Diocese of Kilmore should be applied towards the maintenance of a Diocesan School in that town.

Raphoe.

In this Diocese there is no Diocesan School, nor do we find that one ever existed. There is a Royal School in the Town of Raphoe, which renders a Diocesan School there unnecessary. The Towns of Ballyshannon or Donegal in this Diocese would however, either of them, present a situation not unsuited to such an establishment, and we recommend that the Diocesan School shall be held at which ever of these places may be thought most expedient by the Bishop.

Clogher.

The Diocesan School of Clogher appears to have been held in the Town of Monaghan, but no adequate means were adopted for providing a suitable house until the year 1823, when under the arrangement already adverted to in the Report of the Board of Education for 1824, a convenient site was provided. By the sale of the old Diocesan Premises a fund for building was created, and the School-house is now in progress.

The present Master, the Rev. Thomas Mooney, holds the School in a private house. He is in the receipt of the salary of 130 l. appointed to be paid to the Master of the District School for the Dioceses of Kilmore, Raphoe and Clogher, which the Board of Education recommended should contribute jointly to the maintenance of a Diocesan School. We think it, however, desirable that there should be separate Schools for each of these Dioceses in the manner we have above recommended.

Derry.

The Diocesan School of this Diocese is kept in a very commodious and handsome building close to the City of Derry. This Building was erected in pursuance of of an Act of Parliament passed in the 49th year of his late Majesty, cap. 59.— By the recital in this Act it appears that there had been for a series of years a School called a Free School, in the city and county of Londonderry, on a site of ground given by the Society of the Governor and Assistants of the New Plantation of Ulster, in Ireland, and the Lord Bishop of Derry and the Dean and Chapter of Derry, were authorized by the said Act to dispose of the same, and take measures for erecting a new School on a more convenient site. The Act of Parliament appointed the Lord Primate, visitor, and provided for the making of Bye-laws, and for the future regulation and management. The several chartered companies subscribed largely, and annual voluntary contributions from the same parties, together with one of 100 l. yearly, given by the Lord Bishop, form the principal support of the School.

The Rev. James Knox was appointed Diocesan Master in 1794, and taught in the old Free School till the present house was opened in 1814. Since this period he has received for himself and assistants certain annual payments from the general funds of the School, in addition to what he receives from the Bishop and Clergy, which on an average of the last three years has been about 50 l. per annum.

At the time of our examination in October 1825, there were twenty-two boarders in the house—Forty-nine day scholars, who paid for their instruction, and twenty-three free scholars. The house is capable of holding sixty boarders. In 1825, a regulation was made, that when Mr. Knox should exhibit on his books the names of twenty free scholars he should receive 100 l. in addition to his other emoluments. The number of free scholars having for the last three years exceeded twenty, Mr. Knox has during that period received accordingly this increase of salary. The free scholars are furnished gratuitously with books and stationery.

This appears to be one of the best conducted and most useful Schools in Ireland.

PROVINCE OF DUBLIN.

Archdiocese of Dublin.

THERE is not any Diocesan School provided for this Diocese. Considering the number of Seminaries of various descriptions with which the Metropolis abounds; we entirely agree with the Board of Education in thinking that the ecclesiastical contributions of this Diocese should be applied in aid of the contiguous Diocese of Glandelagh, which is united to the See of Dublin, and that the School should be established in the Town of Wicklow.

Glandelagh.

Previous to the arrangement made by the Lord Lieutenant in the year 1824, there was neither School-house nor Schoolmaster provided for this Diocese. The Rev. James Corcoran has since been appointed Master, and is in the receipt of the salary of 100 l. appointed for the District School of the united Dioceses of Dublin and Glandelagh. Mr. Corcoran was appointed by the Lord Lieutenant about the year 1818 to a School at Wicklow, known by the name of the Castle School, endowed with about eight acres of land, close to the town, stated to be worth about 40 l. per annum. But no School or School-house upon that endowment appears ever to have existed, and the Grand Jury have refused to present a sum of money for building a Diocesan School-house. No house has in fact been provided for either of the Schools to which Mr. Corcoran has been appointed. He receives the emoluments of both, and has in his private house one boarder and four or five day-boys.

Ossory.

There is not at present any Diocesan School in this Diocese. The Reverend Mr. Graves held the appointment as Diocesan Master previous to 1824, but no residence or school-house being provided, he kept the School in a house which he rented in the town of Kilkenny. He had at one time from twenty to twenty-five day-scholars; latterly he had no pupils.

The Board of Education having recommended that the Diocesan School of Ossory should be united to that of Leighlin, and held at Carlow, the Reverend Joseph Jameson, Diocesan Master at Carlow, was in 1824 appointed Master for the District School of the united Dioceses. Although the existence of the large and flourishing institution of private endowment at Kilkenny, called the College, appears to us a very sufficient reason for not establishing a Diocesan School in that city, yet we think it desirable that separate Schools should be maintained for these two Dioceses. There is not within the Diocese of Ossory any other town except Kilkenny that appears to us proper for such an establishment. But within a few miles of the boundary of the Diocese we find the town of Maryborough in the Queen's county without any endowment for a classical School, and this appears to us to be a desirable situation. Upon the same principle therefore on which we have already recommended the establishment of the Diocesan School of Kilmore in the town of Sligo, we venture to suggest that the ecclesiastical contributions of the Diocese of Ossory should hereafter be applied to the maintenance of a School at Maryborough.

Leighlin.

The School for this Diocese has been held in Carlow as far back as can be traced. The house allotted for the purpose is in a confined situation, close to the Military Hospital, and without sufficient ground for the recreation of the boys. The present Master, Mr. Joseph Jameson, was appointed to it in the year 1810. Under his care the School has increased to upwards of forty boarders, and thirty day-scholars. In the year 1824, Mr. Jameson, as before stated, was appointed also the Diocesan Master of Ossory, and he receives the salary appointed for the District School of the united Dioceses. Mr. Jameson rents a house adjoining to the School-house, for the purpose of increasing the accommodation of his boarders and family; he is also the curate of the town.

We have already recommended that the Diocesan Schools of Ossory and Leighlin should not be united; and we are of opinion that the School for this latter Diocese should be continued at Carlow, separate from any other.

Kildare.

The School of this Diocese has been for a long series of years held in the county town of Naas. The present Master, Mr. Harrison, was appointed in 1809. In 1825, he appears to have had two boarders, and about twenty-four day-boys, but a fever which subsequently occurred appears to have caused the secession of his boarders, and to have reduced the day-boys to fourteen. When he was first appointed he received 40*l.* a year. At present the salary of 70*l.* is apportioned to this School, but the Master states that he has not succeeded in obtaining more than 60*l.*—the remainder, which he conceives ought to have been paid by lay impropiators, has not been received. The School-house, in which the Master resides, has recently had 500*l.* laid out upon it, raised by county presentment, but the building is so old, and was originally so ill constructed, that it is very doubtful whether any repairs would make it sufficient for its purpose. Mr. Harrison is the curate of the adjoining parish of Killishee, within a mile of Naas, and also chaplain and inspector of the Naas Gaol.

Ferns.

The School for this Diocese is kept at Wexford. Mr. Richard Behan was appointed master in 1821, before which time he held a private School in Wexford for several years. The present School-house was built about the year 1801, before which time the School was kept at Enniscorthy. Mr. Behan had at first forty boarders. The number in September 1826, was twenty-six boarders, and thirty-nine day-boys. He receives 70*l.* a year from ecclesiastical contributions. The house has been repaired occasionally by the Master, but the larger repairs have been by presentment of the Grand Jury.

PROVINCE OF CASHEL,

Archdiocese of Cashel.

PRIOR to the year 1813, a Diocesan School appears to have been kept in the city of Cashel, but since that time we do not find evidence of any School being kept, or Master appointed. The Board of Education in their scheme of 1824, have proposed the establishment of a District School for the united Dioceses of Cashel and Emly, in the town of Thurles. His Grace the Archbishop of Cashel, has has however expressed his opinion that it should rather be placed in the city of Cashel, in which opinion we beg leave to express our entire concurrence.

Emly.

In this Diocese we do not find that any School has existed. The See of Emly has long been united to that of Cashel, and we agree in the propriety of the arrangement suggested by the Board of Education that this Diocese should, jointly with that of Cashel, contribute to the support of a District School.

Ardfert.

The School for this Diocese was for some years held at Castle Island, in a small house formerly used for a Charter School. No School has been kept for several years. The Board of Education in their scheme have proposed that in future it should be united to the School for the Diocese of Aghadoe, and be established at Tralee, in the propriety of which recommendation we beg leave to express our concurrence.

Aghadoe.

In this Diocese we do not find that any Diocesan School has ever existed. The Board of Education have recommended that it should contribute to the School to be established as above mentioned at Tralee, in which proposal we have already expressed our concurrence. No Master has been appointed to these united Schools.

Limerick.

The Rev. Dr. Willis was appointed Master for the School of this Diocese in March 1812; and in consequence of the proposed union of the Dioceses of Limerick and Killaloe and Kilfenora, he received a new appointment in 1823 as Master of the District School of those united Dioceses. He has received the contributions of the clergy of Limerick since the date of his last appointment, but not those from the clergy of the Diocese of Killaloe and Kilfenora. No School-house has been provided. The house which formerly existed in Limerick having fallen into decay, Dr. Willis kept his School in a house which he rented. He formerly had ten boarders and about twenty day scholars, but at present he has no boarders, and only four day scholars. About the year 1816, the Grand Juries for the county and city of Limerick began to create a fund by yearly assessment for building a School-house, which fund, it is supposed, now amounts to about 2,000 l. A site for the new School-house on the estate of the Corporation of the City has been approved of by the Bishop of the Diocese, but the title to it has not yet been completed.

Killaloe.

Previous to the union of the Schools of the Dioceses of Limerick and Killaloe in 1823, a Diocesan School was kept at Killaloe by the Rev. H. Allen, who had held it for about thirteen years. The number of pupils varied from sixteen to twenty-two. The house in which it was kept was built by the present Lord Bishop of Derry, when Bishop of this Diocese. It consisted of a School-house and Dormitory intended to accommodate twelve boarders. Mr. Allen also rented a dwelling-house contiguous. Mr. Allen left Killaloe for several years, on being appointed to the curacy of a country parish. During his absence there were two successive Masters in the Diocesan School; but while they held it, few scholars appear to have attended. Mr. Allen having given up the curacy returned to Killaloe, when he received a new appointment to the Diocesan School. He found, however, soon after, that the Rev. Dr. Willis, Master of the Diocesan School at Limerick, had received the Lord Lieutenant's appointment as Master of the District School for the united Dioceses. Since that time, Mr. Allen has not received any salary, and he now carries on a School on his own account, having sixteen boarders, and five or six day scholars. We do not see any sufficient reason for discontinuing the Diocesan School at Killaloe; and we beg leave to recommend the continuance of separate Schools for the respective Dioceses of Killaloe and Limerick.

Kilfenora.

We do not find that any Diocesan School has ever been held in this Diocese, nor does it contain any situation in which we should propose one to be established.

We therefore recommend that hereafter it should continue contributory to the Diocesan School at Killaloe.

Cork.

A Diocesan School appears to have been long kept in this Diocese, in a private house provided in the city of Cork from time to time by the Masters. The number of pupils does not appear to have been considerable. In the year 1821 the Rev. George Armstrong, who had held the Diocesan School at Ross for several years, gave up that situation and came to reside at Cork, where he kept School in a house which he rented. He was soon afterwards appointed Master of the Diocesan School of Cork, which had become vacant, and he received 30 l. a year in that character. At the time of the projected union of the Dioceses of Ross, Cork, and Cloyne, by the Board of Education in 1823, Mr. Armstrong was appointed Master of the District School for the three united Dioceses, and the Schools of Cloyne and Ross were discontinued. Mr. Armstrong received 200 l. a year as salary from the three Dioceses. In the year 1825 he had one hundred and seventeen day-boys, and thirteen boarders; and in 1826 ninety day-boys and seven boarders, and his School was expected still further to decrease in consequence of his having been obliged to remove to a house less conveniently situated; application had been made to the Grand Jury at two different assizes to provide a house for the Diocesan Schoolmaster, but they did not think the Act imperative upon them, and declined to present.

Ross.

This small Diocese has long been united to the See of Cork, but for many years possessed a separate Diocesan School. Like that of Cork, it was held in a private house, and seems to have been respectably attended for many years. At the time of the proposed union of Diocesan Schools into Districts in the year 1823, it was determined, as we have already stated, to suppress this School, and to unite it with that of Cork, to which union the Diocese of Cloyne was also to be added. This arrangement has given great dissatisfaction to the resident gentry and clergy in the vicinity of Ross, and we have received very strong representations from them on the subject. We have examined on the spot several witnesses in relation to the former state of the Ross School, and to the arrangement that has been adopted for its union with Cork. We have inquired also into the probability of a sufficient number of pupils being again collected, if the School should be re-established in Ross; and upon a full review of all the circumstances of this case we have no hesitation in recommending that the proposed union of Cork and Ross and Cloyne should be dissolved, and that the Diocesan School of Ross should be re-established in that town. We feel ourselves the more fortified in the expression of this opinion, as we understand it entirely coincides with the views of the Bishop of Cork, and the late Bishop of Cloyne, who appear not to have concurred in recommending the union.

Cloyne.

A few years prior to the union of the School of this Diocese with that of Cork, there appears to have been a Diocesan School kept in a thatched cabin in the village of Cloyne, but in the year 1822, immediately previous to the union of the Schools, it appears that no pupils attended.

We have already stated, that under the arrangement proposed by the Board of Education, the School of this Diocese was to be suppressed, and the salary transferred to the Diocesan Master of the District School at Cork. It appears, however, to us that there are few Dioceses in Ireland better entitled to the possession of a Diocesan School, or better able to support one than that of Cloyne, and we have no difficulty in assigning the populous and flourishing town of Mallow, nearly in the centre of the Diocese, as the proper situation.

Waterford.

This Diocese does not appear at any time, which we can trace, to have possessed a Diocesan School. We found a large endowed School already in the neighbourhood of the City, called Bishop Foy's Foundation, and we therefore recommend that the contributions of the clergy of this small Diocese should be applied in aid of of the District School, which the Board of Education have recommended should be established at Dungarvan, in the contiguous Diocese of Lismore, which has been long united to the See of Waterford.

Lismore.

This Diocese does not appear ever to have possessed a Diocesan School. It has been recommended in the scheme of the Board of Education that a District School for the united Dioceses of Waterford and Lismore should be established in the town of Dungarvan, and in the propriety of that recommendation we entirely concur. There is already an endowed School at Lismore.

PROVINCE OF TUAM.

Archdiocese of Tuam.

Killala.

No Diocesan School appears ever to have existed in this Diocese. The Board of Education in 1823, proposed that for this and the contiguous united Diocese of Achonry, a District School should be established in the town of Ballina. In the propriety of this recommendation we entirely concur; and are satisfied from our inquiries on the spot that Ballina and its vicinity are likely to afford a sufficient number of pupils for the maintenance of a very respectable School.

Achonry.

This Diocese has never possessed a Diocesan School. We have already noticed under the preceding head of Killala the arrangement which has been proposed with respect to this Diocese.

Clonfert.

It was proposed by the Board of Education that this Diocese, which never possessed a Diocesan School, together with the united Diocese of Kilmacduagh should form a District, and contribute to a Diocesan School to be established at Loughrea, in the former Diocese. This appears to us to be an extremely proper arrangement.

Kilmacduagh.

This Diocese has never possessed a Diocesan School; it is too small in extent, and too thinly inhabited to be otherwise than contributory to the Diocese of Clonfert, to which it is united. We have therefore nothing to propose in addition to the arrangement suggested by the Board of Education.

Tuam.

A Diocesan School was long held in this Diocese, and a large house, and nearly half an acre of ground in the centre of the town of Tuam, were appropriated for that purpose. In 1809 a School appears to have been kept, but in 1823, as before stated, the School-house was reported by the Board of Education to have been recently occupied by the police, and antecedently to have been used as a barrack for soldiers during a period of public disturbance. It is now in such a ruinous condition as to be quite unfit for its purpose, and even unfit to be repaired; the situation, however, being close to the Market-square of the town of Tuam, has been represented to us as extremely valuable. It appears, therefore, an advisable arrangement to sell the present premises, and to apply the proceeds in aid of the endowment of the School.

We have already mentioned that the Diocesan School of Ardagh, which was held in the town of Longford, was suppressed in the year 1823, and united with the School for the Diocese of Meath. The Master of the suppressed School of Ardagh was appointed by the Lord Lieutenant in 1825, to the Diocesan School of Tuam, and has transferred his residence during a portion of the year to the School-house of Tuam even in its present ruinous condition. This has been, however, a subject of remonstrance on his part; and it is quite obvious that he cannot possibly have an effective School in the present condition of the house. Few if any boys now attend the School.

Elphin.

In this Diocese there has long been an efficient and creditable Diocesan School maintained in the town of Elphin. The school-house is old, but when visited by us was in very tolerable repair, in which it had been put principally at the private expense of the Master. It has an endowment of about fifteen acres of land contiguous to the town. It is also endowed with the moiety of an estate of about 300 acres of land in the county of Cavan, devised by the will of the Reverend Doctor Hudson, formerly Bishop of Elphin. We learn that this estate is at present held for the term of two lives, under a lease very improvidently made. From what has been stated to us, we think that the circumstances under which this lease was granted may require the consideration of the Attorney-General, and will justify the recommendation, that the estates annexed to Diocesan Schools should, like the estates of the Royal Schools, be vested in the Board of Education in trust for those institutions.

We found in this School four boarders, and about twenty day-boys. Mr. Smith, the present Master, is the curate of Elphin, and Vicar-General of the Diocese.

It may be collected, as the result of the above statement, that under the arrangements suggested by the Board of Education in 1823, but which have not yet been acted upon to any considerable extent, the number of Diocesan Schools would ultimately be eighteen, and established in the following places.

For the Dioceses of -	{	Armagh and Connor - - -	-	at Ballymena.
		Down and Dromore - - -	-	Downpatrick.
		Meath and Ardagh - - -	-	Mullingar.
		Kilmore, Raphoe, and Clogher - - -	-	Monaghan.
		Derry - - -	-	Londonderry.
For the Dioceses of -	{	Dublin and Glandelagh - - -	-	Wicklow.
		Ossory and Leighlin - - -	-	Carlow.
		Kildare - - -	-	Naas.
		Ferns - - -	-	Wexford.
For the Dioceses of -	{	Cashel and Emly - - -	-	Thurles.
		Ardfert and Aghadoe - - -	-	Tralee.
		Limerick, Killaloe, and Kilfenora - - -	-	Limerick.
		Cork, Cloyne, and Ross - - -	-	Cork.
		Waterford and Lismore - - -	-	Dungarvan.
For the Dioceses of -	{	Killala and Achonry - - -	-	Ballina.
		Clonfert and Kilmacduagh - - -	-	Loughrea.
		Tuam - - -	-	Tuam.
		Elphin - - -	-	Elphin.

Upon the plan which we recommend, the number of Diocesan Schools would be twenty-seven. We subjoin a table, pointing out the places at which the Schools would be established, and the counties which would be contributory towards their support.

377

DIOCESES.				PLACES at which the School is proposed to be established.	COUNTIES CONTRIBUTING.
Province of ARMAGH.	Armagh	-	- - - at	Newry - - -	Armagh.
	Connor	-	- - -	Ballymena - - -	Antrim.
	Down	-	- - -	Downpatrick - - -	Down.
	Dromore	-	- - -	Dromore - - -	Down.
	Meath	-	- - -	Trim - - -	Meath.
	Ardagh	-	- - -	Longford - - -	Longford.
	Kilmore	-	- - -	Sligo - - -	Sligo.
	Raphoe	-	- - -	Ballyshannon or Donegal -	Donegal.
	Clogher	-	- - -	Monaghan - - -	Monaghan.
Province of DUBLIN.	Derry	-	- - -	Derry - - -	Derry, County at large.
	Dublin and Glandelagh	-	- -	Wicklow - - -	Wicklow.
	Ossory	-	- - -	Maryborough - - -	Queen's County.
	Leighlin	-	- - -	Carlow - - -	Carlow.
	Kildare	-	- - -	Naas - - -	Kildare.
Province of CASHEL.	Ferns	-	- - -	Wexford - - -	Wexford.
	Cashel and Emly	-	- - -	Cashel - - -	Tipperary.
	Ardfert and Aghadoe	-	- - -	Tralee - - -	Kerry.
	Limerick	-	- - -	Limerick - - -	Limerick, County at large.
	Killaloe and Kilfenora	-	- - -	Killaloe - - -	Clare.
	Cork	-	- - -	Cork - - -	Cork City.
	Ross	-	- - -	Ross - - -	Cork, County at large.
	Cloyne	-	- - -	Mallow - - -	Cork, County at large.
Province of TUAM.	Waterford and Lismore	-	- -	Dungarvan - - -	Waterford, County at large.
	Killala and Achonry	-	- - -	Ballina - - -	Mayo.
	Clonfert and Kilmacduagh	-	- - -	Loughrea - - -	Galway, County at large.
	Tuam	-	- - -	Tuam - - -	Galway, County at large.
Province of TUAM.	Elphin	-	- - -	Elphin - - -	Roscommon.

It will be observed, that in the list of counties contributing to the support of Schools there are three of the most opulent and extensive, namely, Down, Cork and Galway, which contribute to the support of more than one School, and that some other counties are exempted. This however is not an inequality consequent on our plan, but results from the general law upon the subject.

The arrangement here suggested will give nine Schools more than the plan proposed by the Board of Education, and will distribute the several Schools more equally throughout the kingdom. We anticipate, however, a much greater proportionate increase in the number of scholars than of Schools, under the regulations which we shall now beg leave to propose, and which we should hope would be found effectual to ensure to each School, upon an average of years, a full and respectable attendance.

We consider it extremely doubtful, whether any attempt to establish permanent School-houses, appropriated for the Diocesan Schools, will be found ultimately successful. It has been seen that every endeavour hitherto made for that purpose from the reign of Elizabeth has failed, and that in fact there never were so few, either of Schools or scholars, as at the present moment.

Although the several statutes referred to in the early part of the Report have imposed upon the counties the burden of providing school-houses, yet there has been a general disinclination on the part of Grand Juries to present large sums of money for establishments, of the efficiency of which they have entertained some distrust, and from which, in many cases, owing to the situation of the Schools in a remote part of the Diocese, their own counties were not likely to receive any benefit. Besides, even where the first expenses of purchasing sites and erecting School-houses have been provided, the system of annual presentment for repairs forms a subject of continued and mutual dissatisfaction between the Grand Juries and the Masters. It occurs to us, that it would be a much more desirable principle that the Schoolmasters should be left to provide themselves with suitable School-houses and dwelling-houses, taking upon themselves all charges for repairs, and every other expense; and that the counties in which the Schools are held should provide, in addition to the salary paid by the Clergy, a sum proportionate to the real efficiency of the School, such efficiency to be estimated by the average number of boarders and day-scholars that had resorted to it in the twelve months preceding each Assizes, at which the Grand Jury should be called upon to present.

In every one of the towns in which we propose Diocesan Schools to be established, we are convinced that houses may be easily obtained, sufficiently adapted for such a purpose; and the Grand Juries could not reasonably object to present a moderate annual charge in support of a classical School within their respective counties, if it were secured, as a part of the system, that such charge should never be imposed, until by the attendance of pupils it should be proved that the School was efficient, and had obtained public approbation.

With these views we propose that the counties should be exonerated from all expenses for procuring sites, or building or repairing School-houses, and that in lieu thereof an annual presentment should be made of 3*l.* in respect of every day-boy, and 4*l.* in respect of every boarder, as allowance to the Master over and above the sum paid by such Scholars; the payment, however, in no case to exceed the sum of 100*l.* in any one year, and such scholars only to be reckoned as are exclusive of the family of the Master, and who have been fairly in attendance upon the School for twelve months preceding the Master's application for a presentment. This amount of presentment from the Grand Jury, varying, as it necessarily must, according to the success of the School, added to the salary derived from the ecclesiastical contributions of the Diocese (which according to the scale proposed will vary from 40*l.* to 120*l.* per annum) would probably be found sufficient to ensure a supply of Masters well qualified for the important duties of their office.

It would, in our view, form a necessary part of such arrangement, that every Master should be removable whenever from any cause his School should become inefficient, and be no longer attended. Instances have occurred in which there is reason to believe that Masters of Diocesan Schools have even discouraged the attendance of pupils, being content with the salary, however small, when connected with the further advantage of a dispensation from ecclesiastical residence, which has hitherto been considered as attaching to their situation.

In order to provide for the future against the recurrence of such instances, we propose, that if any Master should for two successive years be unable to obtain more than 40*l.* per annum from the Grand Jury, (an amount which even fourteen day-boys or ten boarders would ensure) another person should be appointed Diocesan Master in his stead.

We make this recommendation under an impression that there are very few, if any, of those towns now proposed by us for the sites of Diocesan Schools, that would not at present be found to supply at least from twenty to thirty pupils, desirous of attending a good Latin School, as day-scholars, independently of the number which might be expected to resort to such a School as boarders.

In the very few instances where adequate and proper buildings are now provided for the Diocesan Schools, we propose to leave it optional for the Masters, with the consent of the Bishop, either to establish themselves in those houses, or to provide others. We should however recommend, that a Master, who should live in the Diocesan School-house, should be bound to keep it in repair at his own expense, and be also subject in respect of such house to the law of dilapidations, as it now affects ecclesiastical persons.

With

379

With respect to such Diocesan Houses as may be deemed by the Masters unfit for their occupation, it may be observed that the sites of those buildings, being generally in populous county towns, might be sold advantageously; and in such cases we recommend that the produce of the sale should be invested in the public funds, and the interest applied by the Board of Education for the use of the School.

It appears to us, for the same reason, that if upon any future occasion the Master should prefer to rent a house, and deem it inexpedient to take possession of a Diocesan School-house, which had been occupied by his predecessor, the Board of Education should in like manner proceed to the sale of such house, and the produce be applied as above mentioned.

We recommend that the rates payable by the several Dioceses shall be those appointed by the Lord Lieutenant in the Dublin Gazette of the 17th April 1824, with the difference merely of their being henceforward payable in British currency.

We recommend further, that the bishop shall in all instances certify to his registrar under his episcopal seal, the proportions payable by each of the Clergy of his Diocese, according to the provisions of the Act 53 Geo. 3, c. 107, and that such certificate, or an examined copy of it, shall be evidence in any court of justice.

We recommend also, that the Diocesan Master should in every case be subject to the Bishop's visitation, and that it shall be a part of the duty of the Bishop's Registrar to collect the several contributions from the Bishop and Clergy, and to pay them to the Master at the visitation, being allowed 5 per cent. upon all sums actually collected before the close of the visitation. Any Clergyman neglecting to pay on such occasion to be liable to payment of double the amount, to be recovered by civil bill, if the Diocesan Master should be under the necessity of resorting to that proceeding.

The Master, we think, should be obliged to state to the Bishop, or his Vicar-general, at each annual visitation, the amount of the allowances which he shall have received from the Grand Jury for each of the two years preceding; and if in any instance it should appear that two successive years have elapsed without his having become entitled to 40 l. in either year, the Bishop should certify to the Lord-Lieutenant in the case of schools to which His Excellency has the right of appointment, that a vacancy has occurred; but if the right of nomination be in the Bishop himself, that he should immediately proceed to appoint another Master. We propose, that a similar duty of communicating the fact of a vacancy to the patron shall be imposed upon the Grand Jury, and that in case no claim for a presentment, founded on the Master's affidavit, shall be made and allowed for two years successively, amounting as above suggested to 40 l. at the least in one year, they should certify the fact of the vacancy having occurred through a letter from their Secretary to the Patron.

As to those few Diocesan Schools which have small landed estates annexed to them, we have already stated it as a very necessary regulation, that no lease of such lands shall hereafter be made, except by the Board of Education, and that it would be proper that all such estates should be vested in that Board.

We recommend that in future, no Diocesan Master should have any cure of souls, or be employed as curate, apprehending that it is scarcely possible for him adequately to discharge the duties of the two offices. We do not propose, however, that this regulation should extend to any of the present Masters.

It appears to us desirable that the Bishop of the Diocese should in all cases be empowered to fix or approve of the rates of payment both for boarders and day-boys, as it has been a subject of complaint, that in some instances terms have been proposed by the Masters intentionally so high as to deter pupils from attending. In cases where the Bishop shall not otherwise arrange it, we think that the sum of thirty-two guineas for Boarders, and six guineas for day-boys, which is the average of the rates paid in respectable classical Schools in Ireland, may be charged by the Masters of Diocesan Schools. We do not propose that the Masters should be obliged to receive any pupils gratuitously.

We have already stated that the Grand Juries of some counties have, within these few years, raised certain sums of money for the purpose of purchasing sites for School-houses, or for the expense of building them. If the plan suggested by us shall be adopted, it will be proper that those sums should be placed at the disposal of the Grand Juries of such counties to be re-presented by them for any other county purposes.

It appears to us that it would be a regulation likely to be attended with beneficial consequences, if the Board of Education should appoint an Inspector annually to visit the Diocesan Schools, and report their state to the Board, and that the Board should give their directions generally with respect to the system of instruction, and the regulations to be observed. We think further, that every Diocesan School should be subjected to their visitation, as well as to that of the several Bishops, and that the Masters should be liable to be removed by the authority of the Board, if circumstances should require it.

The dissolution of the union of Schools lately adopted, will necessarily occasion a diminution of the salaries recently allotted to some of the Masters; but when it is considered that they have not enjoyed this advantage above one or two years, and that we are now recommending superior emoluments for all Masters disposed to execute their duties, and which will more than counterbalance any loss resulting from the adoption of another part of our plan, we trust that this circumstance will not be found an objection of any weight to the scheme which we propose.

T. FRANKLAND LEWIS (L. S.)

J. LESLIE FOSTER (L. S.)

W. GRANT (L. S.)

J. GLASSFORD (L. S.)

A. R. BLAKE (L. S.)

London, 18th May, 1827.

381

A P P E N D I X.

N^o 1.—LIST of all the present Diocesan Schoolmasters of Ireland receiving Salary; together with the number of Scholars in their respective Schools on the 25th of March 1826.

2.—LIST of the Diocesan or District Schools, the Appointment of Masters to which has not been notified to the Board of Education in Ireland.

— N° 1. —

A LIST of all the present Diocesan Schoolmasters of IRELAND receiving Salary; together with the Number of Scholars in their respective Schools, on the 25th of March 1826.

PROVINCE.	DIOCESE, OR DISTRICT.	PLACE designated by the Lord Lieutenant's Warrant for the School.	MASTER.	Number of Boarders.	Number of Day Scholars.		OBSERVATIONS.
ARMAGH	Derry - - -	Londonderry -	Rev. James Knox -	32	59	27 free.
	Down and Dromore - - -	Downpatrick -	Rev. Alexander Bullick -	6	4	-	No house.
	Raphoe, Kilmore and Clogher -	Monaghan -	Rev. Thomas Mooney -	2	3	-	School-house nearly finished.
	Ardagh and Meath - - -	Mullingar -	Rev. James Hamilton -	-	-	-	There being no house provided by the County Westmeath Grand Jury, the master remains at Trim.
DUBLIN	Dublin and Glandelagh - - -	Wicklow -	Rev. James Corcoran -	3	6	-	No house provided.
	Ferns - - -	Wexford -	Mr. Richard Behan -	31	41	-
	Kildare - - -	Naas -	Rev. J. Harrison -	1	20	-
	Leighlin and Ossory - - -	Carlow -	Rev. Joseph Jameson -	44	41	4 free	An old house, in an improper site for a school.
CASHEL	Cork, Ross and Cloyne - - -	Cork -	Rev. George Armstrong -	7	90	12 free	No house.
	Limerick, Killaloe, and Kilfenora -	Limerick -	Rev. Dr. Willis -	-	4	-	No house.
TUAM	Tuam - - -	Tuam -	Rev. George Irwin -	-	-	-	Site of old house condemned, and house ruinous.
	Elphin - - -	Elphin -	Rev. William Smith -	5	23	16 free
				131	291	59 free.

January 18th, 1827.

Chas. W. Walker;

383

— N° 2. —

A LIST of the Diocesan or District Schools, the appointment of Masters to which has not been notified to the Board of Education in IRELAND.

NAMES.	Where Placed by Warrant.	OBSERVATIONS.
Armagh and Connor - -	Ballymena, county Antrim	- - £. 1,000 granted by the Grand Jury of Antrim at £. 50, to be raised each Assizes, for building a house.
Cashel and Emly - -	Thurles - - - -	- - No house provided by the county of Tipperary.
Waterford and Lismore -	Dungarvon, co. Waterford	- - No house provided by the county of Waterford.
Ardfert and Aghadoe - -	Tralee - - - -	- - No house provided by the county of Kerry.
Kilalla and Achonry - -	Ballina - - - -	- - No house provided by the county of Mayo.
Clonfert and Kilmacduagh -	Loughrea - - - -	- - No house provided by the county of Galway.

Cham. W. Walker,

18th January 1827.

SIXTH REPORT

COMMISSIONERS

Irish Education Inquiry.

Printed by J. G. & J. H. G. 1851

EDUCATION

INQUIRY

SIXTH REPORT

COMMISSIONERS

Irish Education Inquiry

Printed by J. G. & J. H. G.

1851

Printed by J. G. & J. H. G.

Printed by J. G. & J. H. G.

1851

Printed by J. G. & J. H. G.

EDUCATION, IRELAND.

FIFTH REPORT
OF THE
COMMISSIONERS

Irish Education Inquiry.

Dated London, 18th May 1827.

(DIOCESAN SCHOOLS.)

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be Printed,
8 June 1827.

387

SIXTH REPORT

OF THE

COMMISSIONERS

OF

Irish Education Inquiry.

—
Dated London, 18th May 1827.
—

THE HIBERNIAN SOCIETY FOR THE CARE OF SOLDIERS CHILDREN; &c.

Ordered, by The House of Commons, to be Printed,
8 June 1827.

SIXTH REPORT

THE COMMISSIONERS

IRISH EDUCATION

THE REPORT	p. 3
THE APPENDIX	p. 15

Irish Education Inquiry.

Dated London 18th May 1857

THE HUMANITARIAN SOCIETY FOR THE CARE OF

SOLDIERS CHILDREN

THE HUMANITARIAN SOCIETY FOR THE CARE OF

SOLDIERS CHILDREN

THIS Society has been incorporated by Letters Patent from Her Majesty in the year 1840 under the name of "The Humanitarian Society for the Care of Soldiers Children" and has since that time been engaged in the most successful manner in the promotion of the education and moral improvement of the children of British soldiers. The Society has been very successful in its operations, and has been able to secure for the children of British soldiers a more liberal and useful education than was formerly the case. The Society has also been successful in securing for the children of British soldiers a more liberal and useful education than was formerly the case. The Society has also been successful in securing for the children of British soldiers a more liberal and useful education than was formerly the case.

The Society has been very successful in its operations, and has been able to secure for the children of British soldiers a more liberal and useful education than was formerly the case. The Society has also been successful in securing for the children of British soldiers a more liberal and useful education than was formerly the case. The Society has also been successful in securing for the children of British soldiers a more liberal and useful education than was formerly the case. The Society has also been successful in securing for the children of British soldiers a more liberal and useful education than was formerly the case. The Society has also been successful in securing for the children of British soldiers a more liberal and useful education than was formerly the case.

389

SIXTH REPORT

OF

THE COMMISSIONERS

OF

IRISH EDUCATION INQUIRY.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY :

WE, the undersigned Commissioners, nominated and appointed by a Commission under the Great Seal, bearing date the Fourteenth day of June, One thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, proceed in this our Sixth Report, to lay before Your Majesty the result of our Examinations as to Three Institutions receiving Grants of Public Money, for the Maintenance and Instruction of Orphans and other destitute Children :—

THE HIBERNIAN SOCIETY, FOR THE CARE OF SOLDIERS CHILDREN.

THE HIBERNIAN MARINE SOCIETY, FOR THE CARE OF THE CHILDREN OF SAILORS; AND

THE FEMALE ORPHAN HOUSE.

The Hibernian Society for the Care of Soldiers Children.

THIS Society was first incorporated by Letters Patent from His late Majesty, in the year 1769, under the name of "The Hibernian Society, in Dublin, for maintaining, educating and apprenticing the Orphans and Children of Soldiers, in Ireland, for ever." By this Charter, the Governors and Subscribers were authorised to purchase lands and tenements, not exceeding the amount of £.2,000 per annum, to receive donations and bequests, and to erect and support in any places in Ireland, such Hospitals as they should think fit, for the reception of the destitute Children of non-commissioned Officers and private Soldiers of the Army in Ireland.

Appendix,
N^o 1.

By a second Charter, bearing date the 6th of February 1808, the Society was incorporated anew, and with additional powers, under the name of "The Hibernian Society, in Dublin, for maintaining, educating and apprenticing, or placing in our regular Army as private Soldiers, in such Corps as from time to time we shall please to appoint, the Orphans and Children of Soldiers in Ireland, for ever." By this Charter it was declared, that the future Members, instead of being elective, as before, should be such only as should be added by His Majesty, or by the special appointment of the Lord Lieutenant or Chief Governor of Ireland.

Appendix,
N^o 2.

In addition to the powers conferred by the former Letters Patent, this Charter authorised the Society, either to apprentice the children when educated, or to place them in the regular army as private soldiers, in such corps as His Majesty should be pleased to appoint. It provided further, that the Governor General of Ireland for the time being should always be President, and the Commander of the Forces, or the General Officer commanding the troops, the Vice President; it appointed the periods for the General Meetings of the Members, and of the yearly Committees; invested the General Meetings with power to frame rules and ordinances for the Corporation; regulated the mode of granting leases and managing the property of the Society; and finally prescribed the rules and conditions to be observed in the selection of the children to be admitted to the benefits of the Institution.

Appendix,
N^o 3.

In the year 1818, a new or amended Charter was granted, by which some alteration of the former Charter was made, and some additional powers were conferred upon the Governors; by it, the Society is incorporated under the name of "The Hibernian Society, for the Care of Soldiers Children." Authority is given to the standing Committees, in addition to the appointment of Chaplain and Teachers, to employ fit and able artificers to teach the children such trades as the Society might think proper. And the Corporation is empowered to sell or dispose of lands or other hereditaments, and to vest the money or produce thereof in the Government funds.

The Society is formed and conducted in all its details on the plan of a military establishment.

The Governors are at present upwards of eighty in number. A Committee of fifteen members is elected annually by them, and meets on the first Tuesday of every month. Three members constitute a quorum. The general meeting of Governors is by the Charter appointed to be held four times in each year.

At their meeting in November, they elect their Committee of fifteen, who at their first meeting appoint the officers of the Establishment. The election of all the officers is annual.

The principal officer to whom the superintendence of the whole Establishment is committed, under the Governors, is the Commandant. His authority is required for all purchases to be made on account of the Establishment. He has power to draw upon the Treasurer for the payment of certain stated expenses; and it is his duty, when the yearly and quarterly accounts are made up, to see that the articles charged are such as were previously authorised. He has a general superintendence also over the School department, and has power to suspend any of the Teachers, if necessary, till an opportunity occurs of taking the directions of the Governors.

Appendix,
N^o 5.

The emoluments of the Commandant are a salary of £.300 per annum, an allowance of 2s. per diem for a horse, a house partially furnished, within the Establishment, with a piece of garden ground, and allowances of fuel, soap and candles. Next under the Commandant, the active management is conducted by an Adjutant, who is also Secretary; he attends to the regulation of the children, and government of the subordinate officers, carries on the correspondence, keeps minutes of the proceedings, and registers of the admission and subsequent disposal of the children. His emoluments are a salary of £.182. 10s. per annum, with 2s. per diem as forage for a horse, a house in the Establishment, partially furnished, with a piece of garden ground, and allowances similar to those of the Commandant.

There is a Chaplain attached to the Institution, who also resides within the Hospital. In addition to performing divine service on Sundays and the holidays of the Church, he reads prayers twice a week in the school, directs the education of the children, more particularly their religious instruction, and superintends their morals and general conduct. His emoluments are a yearly salary of £.250, a house partly furnished, a piece of garden ground, and an allowance for coals, &c. and provender for a cow.

The Society keep their accounts with the Bank of Ireland. There is an acting Treasurer, who has a yearly salary of £.80; he does not reside in the Hospital, nor has he any other allowances.

The

The other officers and servants of the Establishment are a Quarter Master, a Surgeon, an Assistant Surgeon, a Serjeant Major of Instruction (or Schoolmaster), five Serjeants Assistants (or Assistant Teachers), together with several other officers and servants, whose occupations and emoluments are stated in a Table which will be found in the Appendix.

Exact rules are laid down for regulating the employment and duties of all officers and servants connected with the Establishment, and printed copies are delivered to the several persons on their appointment.

There is no limitation by the Charter of the number of children to be received into the Hospital. The present establishment is six hundred; viz. four hundred boys and two hundred girls. When the Commissioners of the Board of Education reported the state of this School in 1809, the number of children was four hundred and fifty, viz.; three hundred boys and one hundred and fifty girls.

By the provisions of the Charter, no child can be received without a certificate from some commissioned officer or person of credit, that such applicant is the child of a non-commissioned officer or soldier of the line, in actual service, or of a soldier deceased or reduced, or removed to foreign service.

In the selection of children for admission, it is prescribed by the same authority, that preference shall be given; first, to children who have lost both their parents; secondly, to those whose fathers have been killed, or have died in foreign service; thirdly, to those who have lost their mothers, and whose fathers are absent on duty abroad; fourthly, to those whose fathers are ordered on foreign service, or whose parents have other children to maintain.

It is also an express proviso, that the relations or other friends making application, shall sign a declaration of their consent, that the child shall remain in the Hospital as long as the Governors think fit, and be, when of proper age, disposed of at their discretion, as apprentices or servants; or in the case of boys, be placed, with their own consent, as private soldiers in the regular army. Certificates of the marriage of the parents, and of the birth and baptism of the child, must also be produced along with the application. These several requisites and conditions appear on the printed forms of petition.

The children are admissible between the ages of seven and twelve, and usually leave the Hospital between fourteen and sixteen.

It is provided by the Charter, that all the children shall be educated as members of the Established Church. And this condition is, by the forms of admission, made known in all cases to the relations or other persons who present the application. No question is asked respecting the religion of the parent or relation who applies. It is known, however, to the Managers, that a large proportion of the children are the offspring of Roman Catholic parents. The Charter provides for the appointment of Schoolmasters, "to teach the Orphans and other unfortunate Children of Soldiers in the said Hospitals, to read, especially the Holy Scriptures, and to instruct them in the principles of the Protestant religion, established in Ireland, and in Arithmetic, and such other parts of Education," as the Society shall think proper.

The school instruction consists chiefly of reading, writing, and the first rules of arithmetic. Those boys who are intended for the corps of Miners are taught practical geometry. The girls receive instruction in reading, writing, and needlework.

It was the practice till lately, in selecting Schoolmasters, to prefer in all cases persons who had served in the army; but it has been found necessary, as the Secretary, Captain Irving, informs us, to provide a head teacher of greater attainments, and better acquainted with the improved methods of instruction. The present Head Master is the first who has been appointed since that alteration of plan. The five Masters, or Serjeants of Instruction, as they are called, must all be qualified to teach. Three are regularly attached to the school, the other two have charge of the children out of school. Every Master is received on trial for one month, within which time it is the duty of the Chaplain to report to the Governors as to his fitness, before his appointment takes place. The female teachers are appointed in the same manner.

Appendix,
N° 6.

It is part of the Chaplain's duty to superintend the general course of education of all the children. He catechises them, and gives them religious instruction once a week. A considerable number of the children also, about one-third of the whole Establishment, attend the yearly public examinations, which are held in Dublin by the Association for Discountenancing Vice. The Scriptures are read in the school by the two senior classes for about an hour and a half daily. Besides their education in school, all the boys, when of suitable age, are instructed in some trade. For this purpose, a tailor, a shoemaker, and a gardener, are attached to the Establishment, and reside on the premises. The Serjeant Tailor, and Serjeant Shoemaker, as they are called, have each £. 1. 4s. weekly pay, with a moderate allowance of coals, candles, and clothing. The Serjeant Gardener has £. 40 per annum, with similar allowances.

There are also two Serjeant Artificers, viz. ; a mason and a carpenter, resident in the Institution, having the same rate of pay and allowances.

All the boys, in rotation, as they become able for the work, are instructed in some one of the employments which have been mentioned. The whole of the clothing and shoes required in the Establishment are made by the boys. The materials for the clothing are supplied by contract. The children are allowed a full suit of clothing in the year.

The occupation of the children is divided according to certain prescribed rules, between school instruction and labour. Those employed in the garden, or in tailor's work, are two days in the school, and one day at work. Those employed in shoe-making are alternate days in school, and at work. At the evening hours, from five to seven o'clock, all the children are in school. According to the evidence of Mr. Lefanu, the late Chaplain, this arrangement does not materially impede the advancement of the children in their education, as a considerable progress has commonly been made in the latter before the boys are capable of being set to work. The longest time during which they work, at one season of the year, is about nine hours. In winter, from seven to eight hours. The usual period of remaining in school is about six hours and a half during the day.

The instruction of the girls is conducted by a head Schoolmistress and two Assistants.

The food required for the Establishment is supplied by yearly contract, and in order to meet the case of any considerable fluctuation of prices during its continuance, it is stipulated, that the contractor may surrender his contract on a notice of two months, or the Governors put an end to it on a notice of one month. This stipulation has been thought advisable, in consequence of the frequent applications made by contractors for indemnity on account of the increased prices, during the year, of the articles for which they had contracted.

When we visited this Establishment, we found the buildings in good condition and well arranged. The appearance of the children bore a very favourable testimony to the general management and kind treatment which they experienced. We have in no other school observed such decided appearances of health, activity, and animation amongst the children. The military habits to which they are accustomed, and a regular series of gymnastic exercises, to which they are trained, are, we have no doubt, amongst the most efficient causes which have produced this result.

Although the children are not so confined as to render elopement difficult, they seldom endeavour to escape from the bounds. Three boys lately attempted to escape, but this was explained by circumstances unconnected with any feeling of hardship or discontent.

The children are permitted to see their relations and friends under due regulations as to the time of their visits, and as stated to us by the Commandant and other officers, this communication is desired and encouraged by the Governors.

The whole expense of maintaining, clothing, and educating each child, is estimated at £. 10. 10s. or from that to £. 11 per annum.

Appendix,
N° 4.

According to the evidence of Major Spottiswoode, the present Commandant, the Governors find no difficulty in disposing of the boys from this Establishment, and the applications for them are more numerous than can at times be complied with. The boys have their option, either to be bound as apprentices at home, or to go into the the army or navy. Of those who prefer being apprenticed, the majority are sent out as servants; but a large proportion of the whole prefer to go into the regular army, commencing generally as drummers or musicians; and even of those who leave the Institution, in the first instance, as servants or apprentices, it is the opinion of the Commandant, that by far the greater number, after the expiration of their service, ultimately join the army. This may be accounted for by the habits acquired in the Hospital, conducted, as we have before observed, altogether on a military plan, not only as to the establishment of officers, but the forms of discipline maintained in its daily routine, the language and terms employed, the dress worn, the movements to which the boys are drilled, and all those circumstances by which the mind at their age is naturally impressed.

393

More difficulty, as might be expected, is experienced in providing for the girls, at the time when their school education is finished. When we visited the Hospital, a considerable number of them remained in the Establishment, for whom, although above the age of fourteen, at which period the Governors are desirous to place them out, no suitable situations had been found. In general they are apprenticed as servants; a few are occasionally bound to milliners, or to other trades. No fee is given, nor is it now the practice of this Institution, as it was formerly, to grant a premium to such apprentices as complete the period of their service to the satisfaction of their masters. By the rules of the Institution, the children can only be placed with Protestants. But in some cases, where a Roman Catholic, (being a relation of the child and a respectable tradesman,) is desirous of taking him, and has the parents consent, the Governors have authorized the child to be given to the latter, to be disposed of as they think proper.

The number of children admitted yearly, on an average of three years, ending 1st November 1825, was one hundred and seven. The number given out yearly, on an average of the same years, was one hundred and eight. The general health of the children is matter of satisfaction, as we have already observed. There were, however, on the 6th November 1825, in the infirmary, twenty-two boys and thirteen girls. Cutaneous eruptions, and a species of ophthalmia, are in this, as in the other extensive establishments which we have examined, the prevalent diseases.

Appendix,
N° 14.Appendix,
N° 13.

This Institution is supported chiefly by annual parliamentary grants. The Corporation is also possessed of a small estate in the country, and of stock in the public funds; there have also been occasional bequests made to the Society. Whatever is produced by the labour of the workmen or children, and is not wanted for the use of the Establishment, is sold, and the money carried to account. Since the Society has received regular aid from the State, the private contributions have ceased.

The interest which this Society has in the small estate alluded to, is possessed by them jointly with the Hibernian Marine School. This property was bequeathed by the late Henry Waddell, esq. in the year 1783. It consists of about sixteen acres of land in the county of Carlow, which were held under leases for lives renewable for ever, subject to a head-rent of £. 19. They are now let for the yearly rent of £. 49. 5s. 9d. yielding therefore after deduction of the head-rent, £. 30. 5s. 9d. to be divided between the Hibernian Military and Hibernian Marine Societies.

Among the private pecuniary bequests was one of £. 3,000, by an English lady, Mrs. Wolfe, which is invested in government securities. The Society also possesses an annuity of £. 40, charged upon lands in the county of Kilkenny, bequeathed to them in perpetuity by Dr. Downes, formerly Bishop of Waterford.

Appendix,
N° 15.Appendix,
N° 16.

The amount of the parliamentary grants has varied in different years. In the year 1815, the period of the first grant, the sum was £. 14,160 Irish currency, since which time it has been from £. 8,000 to £. 9,000. The sum for each of the years 1824, 1825, and 1826, was £. 8,125 Irish currency, and for the year ending 5th of January 1827, £. 7,500 British, sterling. In the year 1819, the sum of £. 6,279. 6s. 7½d. Irish, being savings from the parliamentary grants of former years, was deducted from the amount of the Estimate, and reduced the grant of that year to £. 3,824. 3s. 4d.

The total receipts and expenditure of the Society, for the years ending 5th of January 1825, 1826, and 1827, will be found in the Appendix.

Appendix,
N° 17, 18 & 19.

The total receipts of the Society, for the last year, ending 5th of January 1827, were £.7,782. 17s. 4d. British, sterling, viz.

Parliamentary Grant	-	-	-	-	-	£.7,500	-	-
From other sources	-	-	-	-	-	282	17	4
						£.7,782 17 4

The total expenditure for the same year was £.7,918. 15s. 7d. British.

The Accounts are made up quarterly, and examined by the Adjutant and Quarter Master, and afterwards by the Commandant. The Treasurer then makes out the order, which is signed by the Chairman of the Committee, and ultimately, three of the Governors sign a check for the amount upon the Bank of Ireland. The general Accounts for the year are examined and signed by the Governors, before they are presented for audit at the Imprest Office.

Besides the acting Officers and Masters at present receiving pay, there are two Schoolmistresses placed on retired allowances from the funds of the Society; one of them receives £.30 per annum, the other £.25.

We cannot conclude our account of this Institution without repeating, that its general appearance afforded us great satisfaction, and bore decided testimony to the excellent management under which it is at present placed.

Hibernian Marine Society.

Appendix,
N^o 20.

THIS Society originated among a few individuals, merchants in Dublin, with the view of rescuing from idleness and vice the destitute boys who frequented the quays of that city. The subscribers were afterwards, in the year 1775, incorporated by Royal Charter, for carrying into effect, as the preamble of the Charter expresses it, "a plan of a more extensive and permanent use, that of establishing a nursery and school for the maintenance and instruction of the orphans and children of those seamen who had perished, or become disabled by age or infirmity, of being of further use, either in His Majesty's or the merchants service, where they were to be lodged, fed, clothed, educated in the Protestant religion, and instructed so as to fit them for the sea service, in order to their being apprenticed to sea-faring men."

The preamble further states, that pursuant to this plan, several sums of money were subscribed, by means of which, and other voluntary benefactions, they had been enabled to receive a number of children, and provide for them in the manner described; and that the bounty of Parliament had enabled them to build a house in the city of Dublin, near the sea, capable of containing 200 children and upwards, when their funds should be sufficient for giving a relief so extensive.

By this Charter, which incorporates the Society under the title of "The Hibernian Marine Society in Dublin, for maintaining, educating and apprenticing the Orphans and Children of decayed Seamen in the Royal Navy and Merchants Service," the usual powers and privileges are conferred, and they are authorized to purchase or take lands to the yearly value of £.2,000, and money or chattels to any amount, to establish schools and nurseries in any part of Ireland, to elect a President and other officers, and to make bye-laws.

The establishment is calculated for the reception of one hundred and eighty boys. At the time of our examination the number was one hundred and seventy; a reduction which was stated to be rendered necessary in the course of the last year, by the increased price of provisions, and the state of the funds.

On the 31st of January 1827, the number was still further reduced to one hundred and forty-eight. The form of admission is by petition to the Society; and previous to the admission of any boy, a certificate must be signed and authenticated, on oath, by three masters of ships, or respectable householders, that he is the son of a deceased or decayed seaman. It is required also, that the relation or friend who applies on behalf of the child, should enter into bond for him, under the penalty of ten pounds, that he will submit to the rules of the Institution, continue in it till he is of proper age age, and will then enter into the Royal Navy, or sign indentures of apprenticeship for the merchant service, as the Governors shall direct.

395

It appears from the Report of the Commissioners of the Board of Education, dated in 1809, that the number of children admitted during the ten years preceding was three hundred and twenty-three, giving an average of about thirty-two yearly. According to a Return made to us by the Registrar, the admissions for the sixteen years ending 5th January 1825, were four hundred and ninety-five, giving an average of thirty-one yearly. Of these four hundred and ninety-five, admitted since the 5th January 1809, it appears from the Returns made to us, that ninety-six entered the Royal Navy, two hundred and forty-six were apprenticed, eight volunteered into the merchant service, (being allowed to do so without indentures of apprenticeship), and seventy-six eloped from the Institution. Of these numerous elopements it is proper to observe, that by far the largest proportion was during the first three years of the period in question. Since 1811 there have been comparatively few, and there has been no case of elopement since 1823.

The condition prescribed by the Charter, as to the class of children received, is said to be strictly complied with, none but the children of seamen being on any account admitted. We are informed that frequent impositions were at one period practised in this respect, but that the regulations of the Governors, as to the evidence required, have been effectual in checking them. It is not in the power of the Society to receive all, or nearly all, who seek admission; and it appears, from the evidence of the Registrar, and other officers, that they are under the necessity, on almost every occasion where vacancies are to be supplied, of rejecting not merely a few, but many applications, the number of vacancies being always exceeded by the number of applicants.

Appendix,
N^o 22 & 23.

The Charter provides for the appointment of suitable persons "to instruct and teach the children to read, especially the Holy Scriptures, and to instruct them in the principles of the Protestant Established Religion, and in writing, arithmetic, navigation, and such other parts of erudition, as to the said Corporation shall seem meet."

The officers connected with this part of the duty, and who receive salaries or allowances on the Establishment, are;—a Chaplain, who has a salary of £.100; a Master, who has a salary of £.150, with furnished apartments in the house, and certain fixed allowances; and an Usher, with £.80 salary, furnished apartments, and allowances.

With respect to the important office of Chaplain, it is proper for us to state, that at the time of examining the Institution, we found it on a footing by no means satisfactory. The gentleman who held the appointment, the Rev. Dr. Gamble, and who received it about twelve or thirteen years before, had for some time been altogether incapable, from mental infirmity, of discharging the duties of the office. Having permission from the Governors to appoint a deputy, he granted a nomination, about two years before, to the Rev. George Wright, to be his assistant, and Dr. Gamble had ceased to give any attendance.

Mr. Wright, to whose evidence in the Appendix we beg leave to refer, undertook, at the request of the Chaplain, without any concurrence from the Governors, or interference on their part, to give his assistance gratuitously. As Mr. Wright had a considerable private school under his own care, the duty which he was enabled to perform at the Marine School appears to have been very limited. He only engaged to preach in the Chapel of the Hospital every alternate Sunday; and as to the instruction of the children, no definite time for catechising was prescribed. He was engaged merely to assist in the discharge of the Sunday duty. Not having been recognized by the Society, he received no instruction from them as to the course which he was to pursue, or the nature of the assistance expected from him. He was in the practice, however, of catechising the children, and lecturing to them, or rather to a class of them, who were most advanced, on Sundays, for about half an hour before the church service. He gave no attendance on other days.

Appendix,
N^o 25.

As might be expected, under these circumstances, the progress of the children in that instruction which it is the more peculiar duty of the Chaplain and Catechist to give, was by no means such as the appointment is intended to secure. They had not attended the catechetical examinations in St. Mary's church since Mr. Wright's appointment. It appears, that he addressed a letter to the Governors in 1824, stating his reasons for not presenting them for examination, in consequence of which he received an official communication from the Board, that it was not their wish that any of the boys should attend the examinations which were to take place in the month of June of that year. The reason which Mr. Wright assigned for not wishing the attendance of the children, at this examination, was the extent of the subjects prescribed by the Association, for which he conceived that it was impossible for him to prepare them duly within the time between his appointment and the day fixed for the examination.

It is to be observed, that a special clause in the Charter of Incorporation authorizes the Society to remove and displace any of the Officers of the Corporation for such cause as they shall deem just and reasonable. The manner and condition of the appointments to all these offices, as prescribed by the Charter, is by annual election, and necessarily gives a further opportunity for remedying any defect in the Establishment.

We have now to add, that soon after the date of our inquiry into this Institution, the situation in which the office of Chaplain then stood, engaged the particular attention of the Governors, and that an arrangement of a satisfactory nature has now taken place.

In January 1826, a resolution was entered into for the election of an Assistant Chaplain, in place of Mr. Wright, whose resignation of the office was then intimated; and on the 6th of March thereafter, the Committee of the Society were directed to prepare a set of regulations for the duty of the Chaplain. The regulations so prepared, were, on the 27th of that month, submitted to a General Meeting; and with some amendments, were ultimately adopted by the Governors on the 21st August 1826. At an intermediate General Meeting, on the 3d April 1826, the Rev. William Faussit was elected Assistant Chaplain, under the proviso that he should be continued in the office, but that he should not receive salary or allowance until the first Monday in November following, being the regular time appointed for the annual election of officers.

On the 6th November 1826, Mr. Faussit was accordingly appointed Chaplain to the Society.

The following is a copy of the Regulations made respecting his duties:—"Resolved, " That the 19th Bye-Law, which specifies the duty of Chaplain, be repealed; and " that the following be substituted in lieu thereof; viz.—

" That the Chaplain, previous to entering on the duties of his office, do produce " a licence from His Grace the Archbishop of Dublin.

" That the duty of Chaplain be, to have prayers, according to the rites and ceremonies of the United Church of England and Ireland, read; and have a sermon " preached on every Sunday, and on Christmas Day, and Good Friday; to have " the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper administered in the Chapel, upon Christmas " Day, and Easter and Whit-Sundays, and such other times as may be deemed " proper; to catechise and examine the children three times in each week, in the " principles of the Christian religion for two hours in each day, viz., from two till " four o'clock on every Monday, Wednesday and Friday; and such of the boys as " may be qualified for examination to be divided into four classes, each class to be " examined for half an hour. To catechise the children at large every Sunday for " half an hour, between divine service and the time for dinner; and to attend such " of the officers, servants and children as may be ill; for which duties he is to " receive a salary of £. 100, Irish, per annum."

The duties of the Master are not confined entirely to the School department; he has a general direction of the Establishment, and is the chief resident officer. Mr. Baker, the present Master, served for many years in the army. He has a salary of £. 150 per annum, with apartments in the Hospital, some furniture, and allowance of fuel, &c.; one Usher is allowed by the Society; Mr. Baker has another assistant in the school, paid by himself.

On the subject of education, and connected with the nautical instruction of the boys, we have only further to state, that a vessel was at one time given by the Lords of the Admiralty for the use of the Institution. It was a vessel of considerable size, size, intended to serve as a school for a certain number of the boys, who were to live on board and be regularly trained. The plan was connected with a proposed increase of the school, and application was made to Government for an enlarged grant of money.

This application was, however, unsuccessful, and as the funds of the Institution were not sufficient to defray the additional expense, which would have been occasioned, the Governors found it necessary to return the vessel.

When the boys have made the requisite progress in school, and are of a suitable age, they are further instructed in trades, chiefly those of shoemaker and tailor, which are taught in the house by the persons employed for the Establishment.

The materials for the childrens clothing are supplied by contract ; but the clothes are made in the house, so also are their shoes. A shoemaker contracts for them, at £. 1. 1s. 8d. yearly, for each boy ; he finds all the requisite materials ; and is bound to instruct a certain number of the boys, having in return the benefit of their work. It appears from the evidence of Mr. Baker, that before this arrangement, the expense of shoes and repairing them, was as high as 1l. 14s. 6d. for each boy. The contract is renewed every year.

According to Mr. Baker's calculation, the total yearly expense of clothing each boy, including in that estimate the whole establishment of one hundred and eighty, is somewhat under £. 3.

The provisions are supplied by contract, from the dealers in each article.

Mr. Baker, the Master, has, besides his duties in the school department, the superintendence of the clothing and diet.

A Surgeon is in attendance on the Institution, who has a salary of £. 100 per annum. There was formerly a Physician also ; but that appointment was discontinued in the year 1820. It is stated to us, that the children are in general very healthy. At the time of our inquiry, there was only one boy in the Infirmary.

We shall now shortly state the funds belonging to the Society :—

They possess £. 8,600 Bank Stock, producing a yearly dividend of £. 860.—£. 3,846. 10s. 5d. of 3½ per cent. Stock, producing £. 134. 12s. 7d., and £. 105 in the £. 4 per cents, producing £. 4. 4s.

Appendix,
N° 22.

They also receive from lands in the county of Carlow, a rent of £. 15. 2s. 10½d., being a moiety of the small estate mentioned in the preceding Report of the Hibernian Society for the care of Soldiers Children. From ground on Rogerson's Quay, Dublin, a rent of £. 144. 16s. From a small piece of ground adjoining their nursery, £. 8 per annum.

They likewise hold an annuity of £. 5, yearly, bequeathed by the late Mr. Cranfield. And a bond for £. 407. 8s. 7d. executed by two individuals, which ought to yield an interest of £. 24. 9s. But as the property upon which it has been secured, has been for many years in the Court of Chancery, nothing is at present received from this source.

The ground on Rogerson's Quay is held by a lease renewable for ever, without fine, at a yearly rent of £. 90. Part of the ground so demised, is occupied by the Society's buildings ; and the remainder is let by them at the rent above-mentioned, of £. 144. 16s.

The Bank and other Stock held by the Society, was made up originally from subscriptions and bequests, increased afterwards by the bonus, and other profits accruing on the capital invested.

From the different sources which have been mentioned, the Corporation possesses a yearly income of about £. 1,196. 4s. 5½d.

Besides these permanent funds, they have since the year 1816, inclusive, received public aid by an annual grant from Parliament. The amount of this grant for the last seven years, ending 5th January 1827, has been £. 1,600 per annum, British.

Appendix,
N° 33.

They likewise derive a fluctuating income from voluntary contributions. These have not of late years amounted to more than about £. 36 per annum.

The books and accounts of the Society are kept by the Registrar, who acts as Secretary at all Meetings of the Board, and carries on the necessary correspondence.

Appendix,
N^o 29, 30 & 31.

The total expenditure of the Society for the years 1824, 1825, and 1826, appears, according to the Returns with which we have been furnished, to have been as follows : viz.—

For 1824	-	-	-	£. 3,342	19s.	5d.	Irish currency.
1825	-	-	-	£. 3,087	3s.	11½d.	British.
1826	-	-	-	£. 2,963	16s.	3d.	British.

The estimate of the probable charge of the Establishment for the present year is, £. 3,344. 11s. 7d. British.

About thirty boys have entered the navy or merchant service in each of the three last years. They are allowed to volunteer to the revenue cruizers, without indentures of apprenticeship, and a boy who has reached the age of sixteen, and who has attended the school for six years, and a trade for one year, is allowed to volunteer without indenture to a merchant vessel. It appears that a difficulty occurred, some years ago, in disposing of them in this way, from the unwillingness of the masters of merchant ships to bind themselves by indentures, in consequence of which, the above relaxation was made from the strict rule previously observed.

According to the information given to us, the boys have in general turned out well. Some of them have advanced to be lieutenants in the navy, and many become masters and mates in the merchants service.

The Female Orphan House.

Appendix,
N^o 40.

THIS Institution was established originally by voluntary association in 1790. The Governors and Governesses were incorporated by an Act of the 40th of his late Majesty, and received power to take lands to the value of £. 5,000 yearly; to hold regular meetings; to elect additional members; appoint officers and servants; and make bye-laws.

The officers provided by this Act were a President, four Vice Presidents, a Treasurer, a Secretary and Registrar.

The object of the Society is to provide maintenance and education for poor Female Orphans, and apprentice them as servants. The house is fitted for the reception of one hundred and sixty-eight girls, and the Establishment is at present full. By the regulations of the Governors, the children are admitted from the age of five years to ten; are instructed in the principles of the Established Religion, taught reading, writing, cyphering, needle-work, geography, and every part of household work, that may render them useful servants, and are afterwards apprenticed or put out to service from the age of sixteen to twenty-one.

Every candidate for admission must be recommended by a Subscriber, and is required to appear at one of the monthly meetings of the Managers, and to produce a certificate from the Minister and Churchwardens of the parish to which she belongs, attesting that she is an orphan, and stating her age, the place of her birth, and the religion of her parents. It is required also, that the persons who recommend the child, shall enter into a bond for the payment of £. 50 sterling, in case it should appear that the child had either father or mother living at the time of her admission.

Besides the officers named in the Act of Incorporation, there is a resident Matron appointed by the Governors, to whom, with the aid of an assistant Schoolmistress, is committed the direction and superintendence of the House and Establishment.

The interior management of the House is carried on, according to precise regulations established by the Governesses, a copy of which, as well as of the bye-laws, will be found in the Appendix.

There is also a Chaplain appointed by the Board of Governors, under whose direction the education of the children is conducted, and to whom their religious instruction is particularly entrusted.

We derived great satisfaction in our visit to this Establishment, from witnessing, not only the order and cleanliness which prevailed in every department, but also an appearance appearance of health, cheerfulness, and comfort among the inmates, which plainly denoted the judicious and parental system of management on which it is conducted. From our examination generally into the plan of the Institution, and the results of it, we are led to the conclusion, that it has fully answered the expectation of its promoters, and attained the benevolent object for which it was designed.

399

It appears, from the evidence of Alexander Knox, Esq. who has been a Governor for many years, as well as that of Mr. Malins, who has long held the office of Registrar, and from the testimony of other officers connected with the Institution, that there are at all times more applications for servants from the Female Orphan House than the Managers have it in their power to comply with; that the young women apprenticed from the House, have with very few exceptions, given proof in their after conduct of the benefits which they derived from the Institution, and have in many cases returned voluntarily, to express to the Governors their sense of obligation on this account. Of the feeling which they entertain towards the Establishment, an illustration is afforded in the following passage of Mr. Knox's Examination: "It may be right for me to state, that the cordial feelings which I am ascribing to our orphans are by no means of recent origin. I have already mentioned the sense of shame likely to be felt by young persons bred in Charitable Institutions, but during many years we have had a pleasing proof that the Female Orphan House creates no such apprehension. It is always observed, that at the annual charity sermon, when the children walk into church, such of the girls as are at service in Dublin, or its near neighbourhood, come regularly for the purpose of walking into church with them, as if they felt it an honour to have been connected with the Female Orphan House. I have often seen them from their number form an interesting group at the rear of the procession."

Appendix,
N° 46.

Much of the success attending the operations of this Society is to be ascribed to the personal exertions of those Managers who have devoted a large portion of their time and attention to its objects. We feel it our duty to apply this remark particularly to Mrs. La Touche, the Vice President, who has taken the leading direction of the Institution, and to whose unremitting watchfulness over its interests, the Establishment has, during its whole course, been deeply indebted. On this point we refer to the Evidence of the Managers and Officers of the Society, as given in the Appendix. One important circumstance in the superintendence taken by Mrs. La Touche, and which can scarcely be hoped for on the part of the Managers of Public Institutions of a similar nature, is the attention which she pays to the children individually, not merely while they remain in the Orphan House, but after the time of their leaving it; not even confined to the period of their apprenticeship, but extending to their future life. By thus discharging in a great measure the duty of a parent, she is enabled to preserve an influence over their affections, while the assurance that they still have a friend to whose counsel and aid they may on occasions of difficulty resort, cannot fail to operate powerfully upon their conduct.

No apprentice fee is given with the children; but if they serve faithfully during the whole period of apprenticeship, a premium of five guineas is payable by the master or mistress, and almost all the girls, according to the evidence of the Registrar, have received this premium.

The admissions into the House are at the rate of from twenty to twenty-five yearly. No elopement from the Orphan House has occurred within the last ten years.

We proceed to give a short account of the Officers of the Institution, and of the Funds by which it is supported.

The Registrar and Accountant, Mr. Malins, has a yearly salary of £.75; his duties are sufficiently denoted by the title of his office.

Appendix,
N° 43.

The present Chaplain, the Rev. Charles Dickinson, was appointed by the Board in 1822. He officiates in the Chapel connected with the Institution, which is a considerable building, and fitted for the accommodation of the public, as well as of the inmates of the Orphan House. His duty, connected with the School, is to lecture and catechise the children, for which purpose he attends twice a week at least, for two hours on each day. The emoluments of the Chaplain consist in a yearly salary of £.150.

Appendix,
N° 44.

The domestic arrangements and charge of the children are committed to the Matron. Miss Sarah Stephens, the present Matron, appears to be peculiarly well fitted for carrying into effect the plans of the Managers. She discharges the duties of principal Schoolmistress as well as of Matron, which were, before her appointment, separate offices. Miss Stephens has a permanent salary of £.60, and a further sum of £.20, while she continues to give satisfaction to the Governors. She has regularly received the full allowance of £.80.

Appendix,
N° 45.

The Assistant Schoolmistress, Miss Graham, has a salary of forty guineas.

The girls are constantly instructed in needle-work, but care is taken at the same time that they shall not remain unpractised in the equally necessary duties of the kitchen, the laundry, and the dairy, and in the cleaning of the apartments; all which they perform by weekly rotation. One servant only, in addition, is kept for the kitchen.

In the School department, besides the elementary reading, and religious instruction, some historical books, and others of a miscellaneous nature, are used.

The only permanent Fund belonging to the Society, is a small capital arising from a bequest of £.1,800, left by Lady Cremorne, and another bequest from Mr. De Courcy, which, with some savings from annual contributions, amount together to about £.3,000, and are vested in Government securities.

The other funds are derived from voluntary subscriptions, the collection at an annual sermon, and parliamentary grants, which have been voted to them annually since the year 1800. The grant for that year was £.484. 12s. 11½d.; and the amount for subsequent years has varied from that sum to £.3,758, being the largest vote in any one year.

Appendix,
N° 52.

A statement of the income of the Society from these different sources, since its commencement in 1791, will be found in the Appendix.

Appendix,
N° 52.

The total Estimate of Expenses for the year ended 5th January 1826, was £.2,462. 15s. 7½d. British. The grant from Parliament for that year was £.1,760. 7s. 8d.

Appendix,
N° 49.

The total Estimate of Expenses for the year ended 5th January 1827, was £.2,680. 4s. British, and the grant from Parliament was £.1,599. 7s. 8d. The Estimate of Expenses for the current year, ending 5th January 1828, is £.2,673. 16s.

Appendix,
N° 50.

The buildings of the Female Orphan House are well arranged, and in good condition. They were considerably enlarged some years ago, having been originally intended for the reception of one hundred children only; for this purpose, and for the building of the Chapel, additional funds were, during three successive years, afforded by Parliament. This aid, however, was discontinued before the completion of these buildings, and the Governors found it necessary to apply part of their capital for accomplishing the work.

The cost of maintaining and educating each child, including the total expenses of the Establishment, is calculated by the Registrar at about £.15 yearly.

In conclusion of this Report, we have only to observe, that the three Institutions to which it relates are favourably circumstanced, in being enabled to provide, to a great extent, an appropriate destination for their inmates. The sons of soldiers, educated, as we have observed, upon a system, all the details of which are strictly military, naturally resort to the army. The sons of sailors, who are educated in the Marine School, are almost all finally employed in the navy or merchant service, while the girls in the Female Orphan House have hitherto been indebted to the peculiar benevolence and care of an individual, for being placed in situations which have in most instances realized her hopes for their welfare.

T. FRANKLAND LEWIS.	(L. S.)
J. LESLIE FOSTER.	(L. S.)
W. GRANT.	(L. S.)
J. GLASSFORD.	(L. S.)
A. R. BLAKE.	(L. S.)

London, 18th May 1827.

LIST OF APPENDIX.

THE HIBERNIAN SOCIETY, FOR THE CARE OF SOLDIERS CHILDREN.

Appendix.

Nº 1.—CHARTER of Incorporation, 1769	- - - - -	p. 17
Nº 2.— - - - ditto - - - - 1808	- - - - -	p. 20
Nº 3.— - - - ditto - - - - 1818	- - - - -	p. 23
Nº 4.—EXAMINATION of Major George Spottiswoode, 29th November 1825	-	p. 26
Nº 5.—Examination of Captain Martin Irving, 18th November 1825	- -	p. 29
Nº 6.—Examination of the Rev. Thomas Philip Lefanu, 21st November 1825	- -	p. 36
Nº 7.—General Regulations	- - - - -	p. 41
Nº 8.—AN ACCOUNT of the Pay and Allowances of the several Officers, Assistants and Servants of the Royal Hibernian Military School	- -	p. 42
Nº 9.—Diet Table	- - - - -	p. 43
Nº 10.—Table of Time	- - - - -	p. 44
Nº 11.—Form of Petition for the Admission of a Boy	- - - - -	p. 45
Nº 12.— - - ditto - - for the Admission of a Girl	- - - - -	p. 47
Nº 13.—Return of the Number of Children in the Infirmary, from the 6th of January to the 6th November 1825	- - - - -	p. 49
Nº 14.—Return of the Number of Children received into and given from the Esta- blishment, for the years 1823, 1824 and 1825	- - - - -	p. 50
Nº 15.—Letters from Major Spottiswoode, dated 7th and 9th December 1825	- -	ibid.
Nº 16.—Return of the Amount of the Annual Parliamentary Grants to the Society, from 5th January 1815 to 5th January 1827	- - - - -	p. 51
Nº 17.—The Accounts of the Hibernian Society for the Care of Soldiers Children, for one year, ending 5th January 1825	- - - - -	ibid.
Nº 18.—The same, for one year, ending 5th January 1826	- - - - -	p. 52
Nº 19.—The same, for one year, ending 5th January 1827	- - - - -	p. 53

THE HIBERNIAN MARINE SOCIETY, FOR THE CARE OF THE CHILDREN OF SAILORS.

Nº 20.—CHARTER and Bye-Laws	- - - - -	p. 54
Nº 21.—EXAMINATION of John Barclay Alloway, Esq. 22d November 1825	-	p. 62
Nº 22.—Examination of Alexander Worthington, Esq. 23d November 1825	-	p. 63
Nº 23.—Further Examination of Dº, 21st January 1826	- - - - -	p. 67
Nº 24.—Examination of Mr. John Baker, 22d November 1825	- - - - -	p. 68
Nº 25.—Examination of the Rev. George Newnham Wright, 2d December 1825	-	p. 75
Nº 26.—A Return of such Officers and Servants of the Hibernian Marine Society in Dublin, as have Salaries, Wages, or Allowances	- - - - -	p. 77

Appendix.

N° 27.—Statement of the existing Contracts for Food	- - - - -	p. 78
N° 28.—Return of the number of Boys admitted and apprenticed from 1809 to 1825	- - - - -	ibid.
N° 29.—An Account of the Expenditure of the Hibernian Marine Society in Dublin, for three years, ending 5th January 1825	- - - - -	p. 82
N° 30.—The same, for one year, ending 5th January 1826	- - - - -	ibid.
N° 31.—The same, for one year, ending 5th January 1827	- - - - -	p. 83
N° 32.—Estimate of the probable Charge of the Hibernian Marine Society in Dublin, for one year, ending 5th January 1828	- - - - -	ibid.
N° 33.—Return of the Amount of the several Grants of Parliament to the Hibernian Marine Society in Dublin, from the year 1815 to 1827, inclusive	- - - - -	p. 84
N° 34.—Will of Mr. Henry Waddell	- - - - -	ibid.
N° 35.—An Account of Rental of certain Lands and Premises in the County of Carlow	- - - - -	p. 86
N° 36.—Account of Carlow Rents, to the 29th September 1824	- - - - -	p. 87
N° 37.—Abstract of Title to Premises on Rogerson's Quay	- - - - -	p. 88
N° 38.—Form of Certificate of Admission	- - - - -	ibid.
N° 39.—Form of Bond	- - - - -	p. 89

THE FEMALE ORPHAN HOUSE.

N° 40.—ACT of Incorporation	- - - - -	p. 90
N° 41.—Resolutions and Bye-Laws	- - - - -	p. 92
N° 42.—Rules for the interior Management of the House	- - - - -	p. 93
N° 43.—Examination of Mr. Richard Malins, 29th November 1824	- - - - -	p. 95
N° 44.—Examination of the Rev. Charles Dickinson, 27th January 1826	- - - - -	p. 97
N° 45.—Examination of Miss Sarah Stephens, 27th January 1826	- - - - -	p. 101
N° 46.—Examination of Alexander Knox, Esq. 28th January 1826	- - - - -	p. 105
N° 47.—Form of Bond	- - - - -	p. 110
N° 48.—Form of Certificate of Admission	- - - - -	p. 111
N° 49.—Estimate of the Expenses of the Female Orphan House, for one year, from 5th January 1825 to 5th January 1826	- - - - -	p. 112
N° 50.—The same, for one year, from 5th January 1826 to 5th January 1827	- - - - -	p. 113
N° 51.—The same, for one year, from 5th January 1827 to 5th January 1828	- - - - -	ibid.
N° 52.—A Statement of the Amount of Parliamentary Grants to the Female Orphan House;—also, the Amount of Donations, Subscriptions, &c. from the Commencement of the Institution to the year 1825, inclusive	- - - - -	p. 115
N° 53.—The same for the year 1826	- - - - -	p. 116

103

A P P E N D I X.

Appendix, N° 1.

The CHARTER for Incorporating the HIBERNIAN SOCIETY in Dublin, for maintaining, educating and apprenticing, the Orphans and Children of Soldiers in Ireland, for ever.

GEORGE the Third, by the grace of God, of Great Britain France and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth: To all unto whom these presents shall come greeting: Whereas, We are informed by the humble Petition of the most Reverend Father in God our right trusty and right entirely beloved Counsellor Richard Lord Archbishop of Armagh Primate of all Ireland, our right trusty and well beloved Counsellor James Lord Baron Lifford our Chancellor of our said kingdom of Ireland, the most Reverend Father in God our right trusty and right entirely beloved Counsellor Arthur Lord Archbishop of Dublin Primate of Ireland, our right trusty and right entirely beloved Cousin and Counsellor James Duke of Leinster, and divers Noblemen, Bishops, Judges, Gentry and Clergy, of our said kingdom of Ireland, that upon the death of non-commissioned officers and private men of our army in our said kingdom of Ireland, and upon removal of regiments and of drafts from regiments to foreign service, great numbers of children have been heretofore left destitute of all means of subsistence, and that a subscription was set on foot in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-four, for raising a fund to support the establishment of an hospital in order to preserve children left in such circumstances from popery, beggary and idleness, and the subscribers had received great encouragement from Parliament and the public; and the said petitioners by their petition prayed, that we would be graciously pleased, by letters patent under our great seal of our said kingdom of Ireland, to incorporate the said petitioners and other subscribers to the said Charitable Institution: And we being graciously pleased to approve of the said Institution, and desirous that the same should be conducted with such economy and regularity as may render it a real and lasting benefit to our military service, and to our said kingdom of Ireland in general; Know ye therefore, that we of our special grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, by and with the advice and consent of our right trusty and well beloved Cousin and Counsellor George Viscount Townshend, our Lieutenant General and General Governor of our said kingdom of Ireland, and according to the tenor and effect of our letters, our privy signet and sign manuel, bearing date at our Court at St. James's, the third day of May one thousand seven hundred and sixty-nine, in the ninth year of our reign, and now enrolled in the rolls of our High Court of Chancery in our said kingdom of Ireland, have ordained, constituted and appointed, and by these presents, for us our heirs and successors, We do ordain, constitute and appoint, our right trusty and well beloved Cousin and Counsellor George Viscount Townshend our Lieutenant General and General Governor of our said kingdom of Ireland, and other our chief Governor or Governors of our said kingdom of Ireland for the time being, the most Reverend Father in God our right trusty and right entirely beloved Counsellor Richard Lord Archbishop of Armagh Primate of all Ireland, the most Reverend Father in God our right trusty and right entirely beloved Counsellor Arthur Lord Archbishop of Dublin Primate of Ireland, and the Archbishops of Armagh and Dublin respectively for the time being, our right trusty and well beloved Counsellor James Baron Lifford our Chancellor of our said kingdom of Ireland, and the Chancellor of our said kingdom of Ireland for the time being; the right Reverend Father in God Charles Bishop of Kildare, and the Bishop of Kildare for the time being, our right trusty and well beloved Counsellor John Lord Annaly, Chief Justice of our Court of King's Bench in our said kingdom of Ireland; our right trusty and well beloved Counsellor Richard Clayton, Esq., Chief Justice of our Court of Common Pleas in our said kingdom of Ireland, our right trusty and well beloved Counsellor Anthony Foster, Esq., Chief Baron of our Court of Exchequer in our said kingdom of Ireland, and the Chief Justices of our said Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, and the Chief Baron of our said Court of Exchequer respectively for the time being, our right trusty and well beloved the Lord Mayor of our city of Dublin, the Chief Secretary to our Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of our said kingdom of Ireland, our Prime Serjeant at Law, our Attorney and Solicitor General in our said kingdom of Ireland, the Commander in Chief and Lieutenant General of our Forces on the establishment of our said kingdom of Ireland, the Adjutant General, the Quarter Master General, the Dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, the Reverend the Archdeacon of Dublin, the Field Officers of the respective regiments doing duty in the Appendix, N° 1.

—
 Charter of the Hibernian Society
 for maintaining, &c.
 Orphan Children
 of Soldiers.

Appendix, N^o 1.

Charter of the Hibernian Society
for maintaining, &c.
Orphan Children
of Soldiers.

garrison of our city of Dublin, and the Recorder of our said city of Dublin, all for the time being, our right trusty and right entirely beloved Cousin and Councillor James Duke of Leinster, our trusty and well beloved Nathaniel Clements, Esq., Thomas Waite, Esq., Major General Edward Sandford, William Bury, Esq., Henry Meredyth, Esq., Charles O'Hara, Esq., the Reverend Brabazon Disney, doctor in divinity, rector of St. Paul's Dublin, Colonel James Gisborne, Colonel John Pomeroy, Colonel Hunt Walsh, Colonel Robert Cunningham, Lieutenant Colonel William Burton, Samuel Burrowes, Esq., James Span, doctor of physic, Francis Foreside and Archibald Richardson, surgeons, and such others as shall be from time to time by them added to the number of the said persons, or nominated or elected in and to the places and stead of such of them as shall die, to be one body politic and corporate, in deed and in name, by the name of "The Hibernian Society in Dublin," for maintaining, educating, and apprenticing the Orphans and Children of Soldiers in Ireland for ever, and by the same name to have perpetual succession; and also by the same name to sue and to be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered unto, defend and be defended, in all the courts and places whatsoever of us, our Heirs and Successors, in all suits, plaints and demands whatsoever, in the same manner and form, and as amply as any of our subjects, bodies politic or corporate, within our realm of Ireland may or can do: And we do further grant, that they and their successors may have and use such common seal as they shall think proper, and that it may be lawful for them, and their successors, to change, break, alter and make new the same from time to time as they shall think fit: And we do further grant, that it may be lawful for them, and their successors, by that name to purchase, have, take, receive and enjoy to them, and their successors in fee, and in perpetuity, any manors, lands, tenements, rents, annuities, pensions, tithes or other hereditaments, in our said kingdom of Ireland, not exceeding in the whole the clear yearly value of two thousand pounds, and to take and receive any sum or sums of money, or any manner or portion of goods or chattels that shall to them be given, granted, devised or bequeathed, by any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, capable of making a gift or devise thereof, and therewith, and thereout, to erect, maintain and support in all places of our said kingdom of Ireland where they shall judge the same to be most necessary and convenient, such and so many hospitals as they shall think proper: And we direct, that the said body corporate shall have a general meeting of the members thereof quarterly in Dublin, at such place or places as they shall think proper, the first Monday in May, August, November, and February, yearly, in all times coming, and oftener when and where the said body corporate shall think meet; and any seven members of the said body who shall convene at the said times and places shall be a quorum of the said general meeting, and be able and capable to do and transact all matters and things relating to the affairs of the said Corporation: And we direct, that the first general meeting of the said body corporate shall be on the first of the said quarterly days that shall be thirty days next after the date of these our letters patent, intimation whereof the said Lord Primate, Lord Chancellor, or the Commissioners of the great seal of our said kingdom of Ireland for the time being, are hereby empowered and required to give to the members of the said Corporation, by a notice to be published in the Dublin Gazette six days before the holding of such general meeting.

And we do hereby empower and authorize the said body corporate, when they shall be so assembled, to elect from amongst themselves by plurality of voices a President and Vice President, and a Treasurer, and such other officers as they shall find needful, to continue till the first Monday in November next thereafter, and until others shall be chosen to succeed them.

And we do empower and authorize the said President or Vice President, or in case of the sickness or absence of the said President or Vice President, any two members of the said corporate body, to administer an oath or oaths to the said Treasurer and other officers, which they shall be and are hereby required to take for the due and faithful execution of their respective offices.

And we do further empower the said Corporation, upon the first Monday in November in all time coming, or in case of any emergency preventing their meeting on that day, then at the next quarterly meeting thereafter, to make a new election of persons to serve in the said offices, or to continue the former officers, as they shall think most convenient.

And we do hereby empower the said body corporate, at their first general meeting, to nominate and appoint fifteen of the said body to be a committee, to meet in Dublin the first Tuesday in every month, or oftener as need shall require, in such place or places as shall be agreed on by the said Corporation, which committee are hereby authorized and empowered to carry into execution such orders rules and directions as shall from time to time be made by the said Corporation, and which committee shall continue till the first Monday in November next following the first general meeting, at which time and afterwards on every first Monday in November yearly, the said Corporation shall nominate fifteen of their members to be a committee for one year for the purposes aforesaid: And we do also empower, authorize and require the said Corporation, at their general meetings to nominate and appoint lesser committees in all places where any hospitals shall be hereafter erected, for the purposes in these our letters patent, which lesser committees shall be appointed at such time and place, and continue for such time or times, as the said Corporation shall think proper: And we do also empower the said Corporation, at their general meetings to nominate and appoint fit persons in any place of our dominions or elsewhere, to receive subscriptions,

scriptions, money or other things contributed towards the said institution: And we do empower and authorize the committee of fifteen in the city of Dublin, and the lesser committees in all places where hospitals for the purposes aforesaid shall hereafter be erected, to nominate and appoint chaplains for their respective hospitals, and also fit and able persons to be schoolmasters of the said hospitals during the will of the said Corporation, to teach the orphans and other unfortunate children of soldiers in the said hospitals to read, especially the Holy Scriptures, and to instruct them in the principles of the Protestant religion established in our said kingdom, and in arithmetic, and such other part of erudition as to the said Society shall seem meet; such chaplains and schoolmasters nevertheless to be licensed by the ordinaries of our said kingdom of Ireland in their respective dioceses, and to be approved by the said corporate body, otherwise such nomination or appointment by the said committee to be void: And our further will is, that the treasurer and other officers shall be accountable to the committee of fifteen at all times when required by the said committee: And the said committee are hereby required to report annually, at such time as the said Corporation shall think proper to the said corporate body, the state of the funds of the said Corporation, the receipts and disbursements of the year, in order that they may be examined and entered in a book to be kept for that purpose, the said book and all other the books and papers of the said Corporation to be at all times open and free for the perusal of the several members thereof.

And we do also empower and authorize the said Corporation, at their quarterly meetings in all times coming, and at no other meetings, to make such rules and ordinances, and from time to time to alter the same, as they shall judge most convenient and needful for the good government of the said Corporation, and management of the affairs thereof, and the effectual promotion of the good ends intended thereby, and to give such instructions, directions, encouragements and salaries to those they employ as they shall judge needful and reasonable; provided that the said rules, ordinances, instructions and directions, be not repugnant to the laws and statutes in force in our said kingdom of Ireland, and that the same be confirmed and approved of by the Archbishop of Armagh, or the Chancellor of our said kingdom of Ireland for the time being, and the Chief Justice of our court of King's Bench, the Chief Justice of our court of Common Pleas, or the Chief Baron of our court of Exchequer, in our said kingdom of Ireland, or one of them, such approbation to be signified under their hands and seals: And our will is, and we do empower and authorize the said corporate body and their successors, or the major part of them, in a general assembly, to remove and displace the President or any of the officers of the said Corporation, for any reasonable cause, and to elect others in the place or places of the person or persons so removed; and that as often as it shall happen, that the President, Vice President, or any of the officers of the said Corporation for the time being shall die, or be removed for reasonable cause as aforesaid, or that any vacancy of a President, Vice President, or other officer of the said Corporation, it shall and may be lawful to and for the members of the said Corporation, and they are hereby required, within forty days (ten days notice being given) to chuse and elect into his or their place or places, some other person or persons of the said Corporation in the manner herein before mentioned, to continue in his or their office or offices till the first Monday in November next following his or their election or elections, and till some other person or persons shall be elected into his or their office or offices: And our further will is, and we empower and authorize the Corporation aforesaid, at any of their quarterly meetings, to assume into their body such persons, being Protestants, as they shall judge fit to assist in carrying on the design aforesaid, which persons shall be deemed members of the said body corporate to all intents and purposes, as if particularly named in these our letters patent: And we do also constitute and appoint every Protestant donor of any sum not less than twenty guineas, for the use of the said Hospitals, a member of the said body corporate from the time of such donation: And we do also constitute every Protestant who shall subscribe and pay any sum not less than three guineas towards the support of the said Hospitals, a member of the said body corporate, for and during one year from the day next following such payment: And our further will is, and we do direct, that no lease or leases of any lands or tenements belonging to the said Corporation, shall be made or executed but at some general quarterly meeting, with the approbation of the major part of the members then present, such major part being at least seven in number.

And our will is, that every lease so to be made, shall be of lands, tenements and hereditaments in possession, and not in reversion, and for a term not exceeding three lives, or thirty-one years, whereon shall be reserved the best yearly rent that can be had for the said lands or tenements at the time of making such leases respectively, without any fine or other income to be taken or had for the same: And our will is, that it shall not be lawful for the said body corporate to diminish their capital stock arising from the annual rent or income of any manors, lands, tenements, annuities, pensions, tithes or other hereditaments, whereof they shall at any time be seised or possessed, but that they shall confine their expenses yearly to such annual rent or income, and to such sum of money, goods and chattels, as shall from year to year be subscribed or given to them, or the interests and profits thereof: And our will is, that no child or children shall be received into any Hospital now erected or hereafter to be erected for the said charity, unless an affidavit shall first be made by some commissioned officer or other credible person or persons, that such child or children is or are the child or children of non-commissioned officers or soldiers deceased, or reduced or removed to foreign service: Provided always, That these our letters patent be enrolled in the rolls of our High Court of Chancery in our said kingdom of Ireland within the space of six months next ensuing the date of these presents: In witness whereof we have caused these our

Appendix, N^o 1.
 Charter of the Hibernian Society
 for maintaining, &c.
 Orphan Children
 of Soldiers.

letters to be made patent. Witness our aforesaid Lieutenant General and General Governor of our said kingdom of Ireland, at Dublin, the fifteenth day of July in the ninth year of our reign.

Examined, Michael Nowlan,
 Clerk of the Crown and Hanaper.

Nowlan,
 Clerk of the Crown and Hanaper.

Enrolled in the Office of the Rolls of His Majesty's High Court of Chancery in Ireland, the seventeenth day of July, in the ninth year of the reign of King George the Third, and examined by

John Lodge,
 Deputy Clerk and Keeper of the Rolls.

Appendix. No. 2.

CHARTER OF INCORPORATION:—1808.

Appendix, N^o 2.
 Charter of Incorporation:—1808.

GEORGE the Third, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth, To all unto whom those presents shall come, greeting: Whereas, by our letters patent, enrolled in our High Court of Chancery of Ireland, the fourteenth day of July, in the ninth year of our reign, We did grant, ordain, constitute and appoint George Viscount Townshend, our Lieutenant General and General Governor of our Kingdom of Ireland, and our Chief Governor or Governors of our said kingdom for the time being, and the several other officers and persons in the said letters patent particularly mentioned, and their successors for ever, to be one body politic and corporate, in deed and in name, by the name of "The Hibernian Society, in Dublin, for maintaining, educating and apprenticing the Orphans and Children of Soldiers in Ireland for ever, and by the same name to have perpetual succession:" And whereas it has been represented unto us, that the ends and purposes for which the said letters patent were granted, may be more effectually promoted, and our military service in that part of our said United Kingdom called Ireland, more essentially and permanently benefited, if We should be pleased to grant new letters patent, with further and other qualifications, to the effect hereinafter mentioned, to the said Hibernian Society; and the said Corporation having besought us to grant unto them new letters patent, to the effect and with the powers and qualifications hereinafter mentioned, We are graciously pleased to condescend thereto; Know ye therefore, that We, of our special grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, by and with the advice and consent of our right trusty and right entirely beloved Cousin and Counsellor, Charles Duke of Richmond, our Lieutenant General and General Governor of that part of our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland, have made, ordained, authorized, constituted and appointed, and by these Presents for us, our Heirs and Successors, We do make, ordain, authorize, constitute and appoint, our right trusty and right entirely beloved Cousin and Counsellor, Charles Duke of Richmond, our Lieutenant General and General Governor of Ireland, and other our Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, for the time being, our most dearly beloved son, George Prince of Wales, our most dearly beloved son, Field Marshal Frederick Duke of York and Albany, Commander in Chief of all our Forces in our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; the most Reverend Father in God, our right trusty and right well beloved Counsellor, William Lord Archbishop of Armagh, Primate of all Ireland; the most Reverend Father in God, our right trusty and right entirely beloved Counsellor, Charles Lord Archbishop of Dublin, Primate of Ireland; and the Archbishops of Armagh and Dublin respectively for the time being; our right trusty and well beloved Counsellor, Thomas Lord Manners, our Chancellor of Ireland, and the Chancellor of Ireland for the time being; the Right Reverend Father in God, our right trusty and well beloved Counsellor, Charles Bishop of Kildare, and the Bishop of Kildare for the time being; our right trusty and well beloved Counsellor, William Downes, Chief Justice of our Court of King's Bench in Ireland; our right trusty and well beloved Counsellor, John Baron Norbury, Chief Justice of our Court of Common Pleas in Ireland; our right trusty and well beloved Counsellor, Standish O'Grady, Chief Baron of our Court of Exchequer in Ireland; and the Chief Justices of our said Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas; and the Chief Baron of our said Exchequer respectively, for the time being; our right trusty and well beloved the Lord Mayor of our city of Dublin; the Chief Secretary of our Lieutenant General or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland; our Attorney and Solicitor General in Ireland; our first Serjeant at Law; the Commander of our Forces, or in his absence, the General commanding the Troops in Ireland; the Adjutant General; the Quarter Master General; the Dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin; the Reverend Archdeacon of Dublin; the Under Secretary for the Civil Department; the Under Secretary of the War Department; the Secretary to the Commander of the Forces; the Judge Advocate General; the Officer at the head of the Barrack Department; the Director General of Military Hospitals; the Commissary General; the Deputy Adjutant General; the Deputy Quarter Master General; the General Officers on the Staff of Ireland; the Deputy Inspector General of Recruits; the Field Officers of the respective regiments doing duty in the garrison of the city of Dublin; the the Recorder of the city of Dublin, all for the time being; our right trusty and well beloved Cousin and Counsellor Charles Marquis of Drogheda, our right trusty and entirely beloved Cousin and Counsellor George Marquis of Buckingham, our right trusty and well beloved Cousin and Counsellor John Marquis of Sligo, our right trusty and right well beloved Cousin Richard Earl of Shannon, our right trusty and well beloved Cousin Thomas Viscount Cremorne, our right trusty and well beloved John Lord de Blacquiere, the Right Reverend Father in God, our right trusty and well beloved Counsellor William Lord Bishop of Derry, our right trusty and well beloved Counsellor Thomas Lord Bolton, the Right Honourable David Latouche, Sir Charles Burton, Baronet, General Charles Vallancy, Dean Blundell, Singleton Harpur, clerk, Major Edward Cane, Major George Vallancy, Reverend Doctor H. L. Walsh, Major George Nicolls, Major General Faucett, George Stewart, Esquire, Charles William Quin, Esquire, Major General Pratt, Archdeacon Burrowes, Captain Joseph Atkinson, Reverend Thomas Cradock, Colonel Wright, Major Faviere, Luke White, Esquire, Colonel J. D. Arabin, General Peter Craig, the Honourable Thomas Pakenham, the Right Honourable William Elliot, George Ball, Esquire, Patrick Duigenan, Esquire, LL. D. Reverend John Lyster, Brigadier General Brownrigg, John Grant, clerk, Major Sirr, Major Sandys, Major General Dunn, Major Dunn, Thomas Jones, Esquire, Right Honourable Charles Abbott, Major Swan, Alexander Marsden, Esquire, Major Stewart, Reverend Doctor O'Connor, James Henthorn, Esquire, Edward Haughton, Esquire, Doctor William Brook, William Farren, Esquire, Colonel Charles Handfield, Colonel Benjamin Fisher, William O'Connor, clerk, Major General Manly, Major Alexander Taylor, William Johnson, Esquire, Robert Slade, Esquire, our right trusty and well beloved Hely Lord Hutchinson, Robert King, clerk, Colonel Gore, Reverend Mr. Littlehales, Major Ormsby, Captain Richardson, Captain Woodward, Colonel Talbot, Colonel Clinton, Brigadier General Freeman, Colonel Anstruther, George Renny, Esquire, M. D. Major Shortall, Captain Gorges, Sir John Carden, Baronet, Alderman King, the Honourable Baron Smith, the Bishop of Limerick, John Egan, Esquire, Samuel Burrowes, Esquire, Admiral Bowen, Joseph Jameson, Esquire, Edward C. Browne, G. D. Yates, Esquire, M. D. Alexander Jackson, Esquire, M. D. and such others only as shall from time to time be added to the number of the said persons by Us, or by the special appointment of the Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland for the time being, (any thing in our former letters patent to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding,) to be one body politic and corporate, in deed and in name, by the name of "The Hibernian Society in Dublin, for maintaining, educating and apprenticing, or placing in our regular Army as private Soldiers, in such Corps as from time to time we shall please to appoint, the Orphans and Children of Soldiers in Ireland, for ever;" and by the same name to sue and to be sued, plead and to be pleaded, answer and be answered unto, defend and be defended, in all the courts and places whatsoever of Us, our Heirs and Successors, in all suits, plaints and demands whatsoever, in the same manner and form, and as amply as any of our subjects, bodies politic or corporate, in Ireland, may or can do: And further, We do hereby declare and grant, that they and their successors may have and use such common seal as they shall think proper, and that it may be lawful for them and their successors to change, break, alter and make new the same, as they shall think fit: And further, We do hereby declare and grant, that it may be lawful for them and their successors, by that name, to purchase, have, take, receive and enjoy, to them and their successors, in fee and in perpetuity, any manors, lands, tenements, rents, annuities, pensions, tithes, and other hereditaments in Ireland, not exceeding in the whole the clear yearly value of Two thousand Pounds; and to take and receive any sum or sums of money, or any manner or portion of goods or chattels, that shall to them be given, granted, devised or bequeathed by any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, capable of making a gift or devise thereof, and therewith and thereout to erect, maintain and support, in all places in Ireland where they shall judge the same to be most necessary and convenient, such and so many Hospitals as they shall think proper: And We do hereby direct, that the said body corporate shall have a general meeting of the members thereof quarterly, at such place or places as they shall think proper, the first Monday in May, August, November and February, yearly, in all times coming, and oftener when and where the same body corporate shall think meet; and any seven of the members of the said body, who shall convene or assemble at the said times and places, to be a quorum of the said general meeting, and be able and capable to do and transact all matters and things relating to the affairs of the said corporation: And further, We do hereby direct, that the first general meeting of the said body corporate shall be on the first of the said quarterly days that shall be thirty days after the date of these our letters patent: And our further will and pleasure is, and We do hereby declare and grant, that our Lieutenant General and General Governor of Ireland for the time being, shall be always the President; and the Commander of the Forces, or, in his absence, the General Officer commanding the troops in Ireland, shall be always the Vice President of our said Society; any thing in our former letters patent to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding: And we do hereby empower, authorize and require the said body corporate, when they shall be assembled, to elect by plurality of voices such other officers as they shall find needful, to continue till the first Monday in November next thereafter, and until others shall be chosen to succeed them: And we do hereby empower, authorize and require the said President and Vice President, or, in the absence of the said President or Vice President, any two members of the said corporate body, to administer an oath or oaths to the said officers, which they shall be thereby required to take for the due and faithful execution of their respective offices: And we do hereby further empower, authorize and require the said corporation, upon the first Monday in November, in all times coming, or in case of any emergency preventing their meeting on that day, then, at the next quarterly meeting thereafter, to make a new election of persons to serve in the said offices, or to continue the former officers, as they shall think most convenient: And we do hereby empower, authorize and require the said body corporate, at their first general meeting, to nominate and appoint fifteen of the said body to be a committee, to meet in Dublin the first Tuesday in every month, or oftner, as need shall require, in such place or places as shall be agreed on by the said corporation, which committee are to be authorized and empowered to carry into execution such orders, rules and directions as shall from time to time be made by the said corporation, and which committee shall continue till the first Monday in November next following the first general meeting; at which time, and afterwards, on every first Monday in November, yearly, the said corporation shall nominate fifteen of their members to be a committee for one year, for the purposes aforesaid: And our further will and pleasure is, and we do hereby empower, authorize and require the said corporation, at their general meetings, to nominate and appoint lesser committees in all places where any hospitals shall hereafter be erected for the purposes expressed in the said letters patent; which lesser committees shall be appointed at such times and places, and continue for such time or times, as the said corporation shall think proper: And we hereby further empower, authorize and require the said corporation, at their general meetings, to nominate and appoint fit persons in any place of our dominions, or elsewhere, to receive subscriptions, money or other things contributed towards the said Institution: And we hereby empower and authorize the said committee of fifteen, in the city of Dublin, and the lesser committees, in all places where hospitals for the purposes aforesaid shall hereafter be erected, to nominate and appoint chaplains for their respective hospitals; and also fit and able persons to be schoolmasters of the said hospitals, during the will of the said corporation, to teach the orphans and other unfortunate children of soldiers in the said hospitals to read, especially the Holy Scriptures, and to instruct them in the principles of the Protestant religion, established in Ireland, and in arithmetic, and such other parts of education as to the said Society shall seem meet; such chaplains, and schoolmasters, nevertheless, to be licensed by the ordinaries in Ireland, in their respective dioceses, and to be approved by the said corporate body, otherwise such nomination or appointment by the said committee to be void: And our further will and pleasure is, and we do hereby direct, that the treasurer, and other officers, shall be accountable to the committee of fifteen, at all times when required by the said committee; and the said committee are hereby required to report annually, at such times as the said corporation shall think proper, to the said corporate body, the state of the funds of the said corporation, the receipts and disbursements of the year, in order that they may be examined and entered in a book to be kept for that purpose; the said book, and all other the books and papers of the said corporation, to be at all times open and free for the perusal of the several members thereof: And our further will is, and we do hereby empower, authorize and require the said corporation, at their quarterly meetings, in all times coming, and at no other meetings, to make such rules and ordinances, and from time to time to alter the same, as they shall judge most convenient and needful for the good government of the said corporation, and management of the affairs thereof, and the effectual promotion of the good ends intended thereby, and to give such instructions, directions, encouragements and salaries to those they employ, as they shall judge needful and reasonable, provided that the said rules, ordinances, instructions and directions be not repugnant to the laws and statutes in force in Ireland; such rules, ordinances, instructions and directions not to require any confirmation or approval by any person or persons whatsoever, any thing in our former letters patent to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding: And our further will and pleasure is, and we do hereby empower and authorize the said corporate body, and their successors, and the major part of them, in a general assembly, to remove and displace any of the officers of the said corporation for any reasonable cause, the president and vice-president only excepted, and to elect others in the place or places of the person or persons so removed; and that as often as it shall happen that any of the officers of the said corporation for the time being shall die, or be removed for reasonable cause, as aforesaid, or that any vacancy shall occur of an officer or officers of the said corporation, it shall and may be lawful for the members of the said corporation, and they shall be required within forty days (ten days notice being given) to choose and elect in his or their place or places, some other person or persons of the said corporation, in the manner hereinbefore mentioned, to continue in his or their office or offices till the first Monday of November next following his or their election or elections, and until some other person or persons shall be elected into his or their office or offices: And our further will and pleasure is, and we do hereby direct, that in case the president and vice president shall be absent from any general meeting, that the said corporation, or any seven or more of them, shall have power to appoint one of the members, then present, to preside for such time; and such president, vice president or chairman, shall have a casting voice in case of any equality of votes; and said president, vice president, or chairman, at any of the said general meetings, shall have power to administer an oath to any person or persons for discovering the truth of any matter or thing offered or proposed to the said corporation: And our further will and pleasure is, and we do hereby direct, that no lease or leases of any lands or tenements belonging to the said corporation shall be made or executed but at some general quarterly meeting, with the approbation of the members then present, or the majority of them, such major part being at least seven in number; and that every lease so to be made, shall be of lands, tenements and hereditaments in possession, and not in reversion, and for a term not exceeding three lives or thirty-one years, whereon shall be reserved the best yearly rent that can be had for the said lands or tenements at the time of making such leases respectively, without any fine or other income to be taken or had for the same: And that that it shall not be lawful for the said body corporate to diminish their capital stock arising from the annual rent or income of any manors, lands, tenements, annuities, pensions, tythes, or other hereditaments, whereof they shall at any time be seised or possessed; but that they shall confine their expenses yearly to such annual rent or income, and to such sum of money, goods and chattels, as shall from year to year be subscribed or given to them, or the interests or profits thereof: And that that no child or children shall be received into any hospital now erected or hereafter to be erected, unless a certificate shall first be obtained from some commissioned officer or other creditable person or persons, that such child or children is or are, to the best of his belief, the child or children of non-commissioned officers or soldiers of the line in actual service, or of soldiers deceased, or reduced or removed to foreign service; but that upon such certificate, such child or children may be received and admitted, anything in our former letters patent to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding: And our further will is, and we do hereby direct, that in the selection of children for admission, preference in general shall be given,—

Appendix, N^o 2.

Charter of Incorporation:—1808.

First. To orphans.

Secondly. To those whose fathers have been killed, or have died on foreign service.

Thirdly. To those who have lost their mothers, and whose fathers are absent on duty abroad.

Fourthly. To those whose fathers are ordered on foreign service, or whose parents have other children to maintain.

And that the parents or friends applying for the admission of children shall be required to sign their consent to such children remaining in the said Hibernian Society as long as the said governors thereof may think fit, and to their being disposed of, when of proper age, at the discretion of the governors, as apprentices or servants, or if boys, to their being placed, with their own free consent, in our regular army, as private soldiers, in such corps as it may be our royal pleasure to appoint.

And lastly, our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby declare and ordain, that these our letters patent, and every clause, sentence, and article therein contained, or the enrolment thereof, shall be in all things firm, good, valid, sufficient, and effectual in the law, unto the said corporation, according to the purport and tenor thereof, without any further grant, license or toleration from us, our heirs or successors, to be had, provided or obtained: Provided always, that these our letters patent be enrolled in the rolls of our high court of Chancery, in that part of our said United Kingdom called Ireland, within the space of six months from the date hereof, otherwise these our letters patent to be null, void and of none effect, anything herein contained to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding.

In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patent, witness our aforesaid Lieutenant General and General Governor of Ireland, at Dublin, the sixth day of February, in the forty-eighth year of our reign.

WESTMEATH.

Enrolled in the office of the Rolls of His Majesty's high court of Chancery in Ireland, the eighth day of February, in the forty-eighth year of the reign of King George the Third, and examined by Richard Hetherington, Deputy Keeper of the Rolls.

Entered by Thomas Bouchiere, Deputy Clerk of the Hanaper.

(A true copy.)

Leslie Lawson, Secretary.

Appendix, No. 3.

CHARTER :—Granted 1818.

GEORGE the Third by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth: To all to whom these presents shall come greeting: Whereas by our letters patent enrolled in our high court of Chancery of Ireland, the fourteenth day of July, in the ninth year of our reign, We did grant, ordain, constitute and appoint George Viscount Townshend our lieutenant general and general governor of our kingdom of Ireland, and our chief governor or governors of our said kingdom for the time being, and the several other officers and persons in the letters patent particularly mentioned and their successors, for ever, to be one body politic and corporate, in deed and in name, by the name of "The Hibernian Society," in Dublin, for maintaining, educating and apprenticing the orphans and children of soldiers in Ireland, for ever; and, by the same name, to have perpetual succession: And whereas by our letters patent enrolled in our high court of Chancery in Ireland, the sixth day of February, in the forty-eighth year of our reign, We did grant, ordain, constitute and appoint our right trusty and well beloved cousin and counsellor Charles Duke of Richmond, our lieutenant general and general governor of Ireland, and other our chief governor or governors of Ireland for the time being, and the several other officers and persons in the said letters patent particularly mentioned, being the persons who then composed the said hereinbefore mentioned corporation, and their successors, for ever, to be one body politic and corporate, in deed and in name, by the name of "The Hibernian Society," in Dublin, for maintaining, educating and apprenticing, or placing in our regular

Appendix, N° 3.

Charter :—Granted 1818.

Appendix, N^o 3.Charter:—Granted 1818.

army as private soldiers, in such corps as from time to time we shall please to appoint, the orphans and children of soldiers in Ireland, for ever, and by the same name to have perpetual succession: And whereas our said letters patent last mentioned were duly accepted by the said corporation first hereinbefore mentioned: And whereas it hath been represented unto us, that the ends and purposes for which the said letters patent were granted, may be more effectually promoted, and our military service in that part of our said United Kingdom called Ireland more essentially and permanently benefited, if We should be pleased to grant to the said corporation new letters patent, with further and other clauses and powers, to the effect hereinafter mentioned; and the said corporation having besought us to grant unto them new letters patent, to the effect and with the powers and clauses hereinafter mentioned, We are graciously pleased to condescend thereto: Know ye, therefore, that We, of our special grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, by and with the advice and consent of our right trusty and right well beloved cousin and counsellor Charles Chetwynd Earl Talbot, our lieutenant general and general governor of that part of our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland, do hereby give and grant unto the said society and corporation, and their successors, for ever, that they shall be and be deemed and taken to be, and We do, for Us, our Heirs and Successors, hereby ordain, constitute and appoint the said society and corporation, and their successors, to be henceforth one body politic and corporate, in deed and in name, by the name of "The Hibernian Society," for the care of soldiers children, and by no other name whatsoever; and by the said name to sue and be sued, plead and be pleaded, to answer and be answered, to defend and be defended, in all courts, and in all suits, plaints and demeanors whatsoever, any thing in any of our said letters patent aforesaid to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding: And We do hereby ordain, direct and provide, that the said name shall from henceforth stand and be in the place and stead of the name so given as aforesaid, in and by our said letters patent last recited; and that all and every the clauses, matters and things in our said letters patent contained, shall be applicable and applied to the said corporation by their said name of "The Hibernian Society," for the care of soldiers children, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if the said name and no other had been given to them in and by the said letters patent: And We do by these presents, for Us, our Heirs and Successors, hereby confirm the said letters patent, in all other respects, save as far as the same, or any of the premises thereof, is or are hereinafter expressly altered: And whereas We did, by our said letters patent last mentioned, empower, authorize and require the said body corporate, at their first general meeting, to nominate and appoint fifteen of the said body to be a committee, to meet in Dublin the first Tuesday in every month, or oftener, as need should require, in such place or places as should be agreed on by the said corporation, which committee were to be authorized and empowered to carry into execution such orders, rules and directions as should from time to time be made by the said corporation, and which committee should continue until the first Monday in November next following the first general meeting at which time and afterwards, on every first Monday in November yearly, the said corporation should nominate fifteen of their members to be a committee for one year, for the purposes aforesaid: And We did, by our said letters patent, further empower, authorize and require the said corporation, at their general meetings, to nominate and appoint lesser committees in all places where any hospitals should thereafter be erected, for the purposes expressed in the said letters patent, which lesser committees were to be appointed at such times and places, and continued for such time or times as the said corporation should think proper; our further will and pleasure is, and We do hereby further empower, authorize, direct and require the said corporation, that whenever a vacancy shall take place, in the said committee of fifteen, or in any of the said lesser committees, by death, resignation or otherwise howsoever, then and in every such case, the president or vice president of the said corporation, shall and do, within ten days after such vacancy shall be notified or known to him, summon a meeting of the said corporation, to elect one of their body to supply such vacancy, and become and be a member of such committee respectively, from thence in like manner, and for the same period, as the person whose place shall be so filled would have been, if such vacancy had not taken place: And whereas, We did by our said last hereinbefore mentioned letters patent, authorize and empower the said committee of fifteen, in the said city of Dublin, and the lesser committees, in all places where hospitals for the purposes aforesaid should thereafter be erected, to nominate and appoint chaplains for their respective hospitals, and also fit and able persons to be schoolmasters of the said hospitals during the will of the said corporation, to teach the orphans and other unfortunate children of soldiers in said hospitals to read, especially the Holy Scriptures, and to instruct them in the principles of the Protestant religion established in Ireland, and in arithmetic, and such other parts of education as to the said society shall seem meet; such chaplains and schoolmasters nevertheless to be licensed by the ordinaries in Ireland in their respective dioceses; we do hereby further authorize and empower the said committees respectively, to nominate and appoint fit and able artificers, to teach the orphans and other unfortunate children of soldiers in said hospitals respectively, such trades as may seem meet to the said society: And whereas, We did by our said letters patent last mentioned, empower and authorize the said body corporate when they should be assembled, to elect by plurality of voices such officers, other than the president and the vice president of the said society, as they should find needful, to continue until the first Monday in November next thereafter, and until others should be chosen to succeed them: And did also thereby empower, authorize and require the said president and vice president, or in their absence, any two members of the said corporate body, to administer an oath or oaths to the said officers, which they were thereby required to take, for due and faithful execution of their respective offices; and did

